The Prime Minister said that he wanted the highest standards in public life. He appointed the Chairman of the Committee on Standards in Public Life. The Committee has made clear recommendations. Why has not the Prime Minister accepted them?

The Prime Minister: We did not accept this recommendation because we believe that it is better to appoint people on an individual, case-by-case basis. The right hon. and learned Gentleman talks about the speed of the inquiry's being set up, but the allegations were made on the Sunday in the newspapers, and that day, at the insistence of the Home Secretary, somebody was appointed to examine them. I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman agrees that Sir Alan Budd is a man of independence and unimpeachable integrity. He will have the opportunity to look at the facts of the case and to make those facts known to the public. I cannot see what is wrong with that way of proceeding.

Kali Mountford (Colne Valley) (Lab): Is there not a huge amount of untapped potential in our secondary schools? When my right hon. Friend looks at schools' results, will he see what more can be done to ensure that that untapped potential is a resource for the community and that an arbitrary cap is not put on it?

The Prime Minister: I entirely agree that there is still a great deal to do in improving the standards in our school system. However, in her constituency, as in other constituencies up and down the country, we now have the best ever primary school results, the best ever GCSE results and the best ever A-level results. As opposed to the previous Conservative Government, who in the time before they left office were actually cutting spending per pupil, we have increased it by £800 per pupil in real terms since taking office. That is the difference between a Government who believe in education and a Government who do not.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): How much will each individual end up having to pay for their identity card?

The Prime Minister: As I have already explained, the reason we should introduce identity cards is that in any event we will have to introduce biometric passports. Of the £85 cost, £70 is attributable to the biometric passport, and only £15 to the additional amount for the identity card. Given what that does for us as a country, in terms not only of security but of access to services and tackling issues such as illegal immigration, I think that that is money well spent.

Mr. Kennedy: Two years ago, the Home Office said that the entire scheme would cost £3 billion. Two days ago, it said that the revised estimate, which is not a final maximum figure, was now running at almost twice that amount. Given the history of this Government when it comes to introducing complex information technology systems, not least for the Child Support Agency and tax credits, will the Prime Minister rule out any company that has had its hands in those fiascos having anything to do with identity card systems? Does not all this, financially and in terms of potential complication for the individual citizen, have all the hallmarks of another Government fiasco in the making, with the individual being left to pick up the tab?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is simply wrong on the costs. The ID card element is around £85 million a year, and that is spread over several years.

Let me go back to the point that I am trying to make to him. In any event, because many countries—the United States, those in Europe and elsewhere—are introducing a requirement for biometric visas, it is important that we introduce biometric passports here. That will already mean considerable change over the next few years. It makes sense in those circumstances, given the new biometric technology, also to have an identity card. The additional cost of that is quite small in relation to the overall cost. We think it is necessary not only because of issues to do with security and terrorism but, as I said to the right hon. Gentleman a moment ago, because of issues relating to access to services—for example, ensuring that people who use the national health service are entitled to do so.

We think that it is legitimate and right, in this day and age, to ask people to carry identity cards, and that is why we will proceed with it. However, there will be a very full debate in the House of Commons.

I think that Sir David Steel got it right. When he was asked about it, he said:

"I don't quite take the party line on this . . . I think the people will find them very useful."

Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the huge anger and disappointment in my constituency about the eleventh-hour proposal from the director of infantry to cut the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers? My right hon. Friend knows about the huge recruiting footprints in towns such as Rochdale that the Lancashire Fusiliers and the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers have had. Will he assure me that the top four success criteria, which the Army Board set out, will be adhered to, thus kicking the poor decision into touch?

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that no decisions have yet been taken on the future of the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers. She knows that the review is being conducted by the Army, which wants to ensure that it maintains the traditions of the regiment and much of the history to do with it, which is tremendously valuable to people, but have greater flexibility in the way in which our armed forces are deployed. That is the balance that it is trying to strike. The Army should be allowed to reach its decisions, which it will do over the next few weeks. I think and hope that, once the decisions are properly explained to people, they will accept their wisdom.

2. [200668] Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): On 21 June, the Prime Minister wrote to me following two tragic road deaths at Ashton in my constituency. He said that the Highways Agency would consider what measures would improve safety at the location. On 13 August, the Under-Secretary of State for Transport wrote to tell me that the Highways Agency would report in two months. He said the same on 13 September and on 16 November. On 17 November, Ian Lycett was killed at Ashton in the same place. Does the Prime Minister wonder why people say that he is all talk?

The Prime Minister: First, I should like to express my deep regret about what has happened to the hon. Gentleman's constituent and to others who have been killed at that place. I am not aware of the subsequent correspondence. I shall have to look into it and get back to him.

3. [200669] Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Will the Prime Minister join me in paying tribute to Mrs. Rosy Garnett from York, who today will receive a cheque for £1,000 as a reward for taking a stand against drug dealers in her neighbourhood and giving evidence against them in court? Does he agree that it is essential to maintain strong crime fighting partnerships between the police, the local authority and the public, such as the Safer York partnership, and will the Government fulfil their part of the bargain by continuing to provide additional resources for the North Yorkshire police?

The Prime Minister: First, I congratulate Rosy Garnett and all those others who have won awards for taking a stand against antisocial behaviour. In my hon. Friend's constituency and in many others, the new legislation has been well used by the police, local authorities and, most important, local people. There are also record numbers of police officers in my hon. Friend's authority and elsewhere in the country. I assure him that we shall continue to supplement them with community support officers. When the idea of community support officers along with record numbers of police was first introduced in the House, many people opposed it. People are now beginning to see that community support officers are a worthwhile addition to our policing force.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): This week, yet another horrific murder occurred in London. Sadly, it was not an isolated incident: 211 people were murdered in London last year. The Prime Minister promised to be "tough on crime and tough on the causes of crime".

What has happened to violent crime and gun crime since he became Prime Minister?

The Prime Minister: First, in respect of the horrific murder that took place a short time ago in London, I think we would all like to express our sympathy to the family concerned.

According to the British crime survey, violent crime is down. It is correct that, on recorded crime, it is up. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that that is largely because of changes that have been made, for example, in recording domestic violence. Of course, violent crime and gun crime are too high. That is precisely why we have introduced new measures in criminal justice legislation to provide that anyone who is caught in possession of a firearm will be given a minimum sentence of five years.

Mr. Howard: The British crime survey figures do not include murder, rape, drug offences or crimes against children, which is why the Prime Minister never mentioned them when he was Leader of the Opposition and why he then used the recorded crime figures only. On the recorded crime figures, violent crime is up by 83 per cent., 1 million violent crimes are committed every year and gun crime too has doubled. He said:

"We will increase the rate at which we catch and convict people".

Can he tell us what has happened to detection rates since 1997?

The Prime Minister: I do not have the figure in front of me for what has happened since 1997. I do have the figure for the last year, when the rate of detection increased. However, I have to say to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the British crime survey is taken as the most authoritative crime survey overall. That is why it is used.

In respect of crime, let me just remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that when the Conservatives were in power crime doubled, and when he was Home Secretary police numbers fell. In relation to violent crime, when he was Home Secretary—on both recorded crime and the British crime survey—it rose, which is simply to say that this is an issue here and in many other countries. We are taking action on it. The new legislation that we are introducing now, as well as that which we have introduced over the past couple of years, has tightened the law considerably. We will continue to do it. Let me just draw the contrast: on any basis, crime under this Government has fallen; it rose and doubled under him.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister, to make his point against the last Government, has just used the recorded crime figures. On those figures, crime fell by 18 per cent. when I was Home Secretary; it has risen by 16 per cent. under this Government. Now, let me tell him what has happened to detection rates under his Government. For violent crime, they are down 35 per cent.; for sexual offences, they have fallen by half; overall, detection rates have fallen by more than 10 per cent. since he took office.

Criminals now have a better chance of committing a crime and getting away with it than at any time for the last 25 years. Now, the Prime Minister—

The Prime Minister rose—

Mr. Howard: He will have to wait a moment longer.

The Prime Minister promised to make criminals face up to their offending behaviour. How many crimes have been committed by prisoners let out before the end of their sentence on his early release scheme?

The Prime Minister: First, let me just correct the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It is true that recorded crime went up under the last Conservative Government, but if he wants to take the British crime survey, it also went up by over 50 per cent. under the last Government. In respect of his record, I said that violent crime went up when he was Home Secretary, and it did. Recorded crime went up by 18 per cent. So, let us have no more from him about how he managed to achieve this great reduction when he was Home Secretary.

The fact is that violent crime has been rising for a number of years. In relation to early release, fewer than 2 per cent. reoffend. These are people who are going to be released in any event. I might just say that when that early release scheme was introduced to the House, it was supported by everyone, including Conservative Members.

Mr. Howard: More than 3,500 crimes have been committed by prisoners released early under this scheme. The Prime Minister says that that does not matter, because they are only 2 per cent. of the crimes committed in this country. That is a disgraceful thing to say, and it will be no consolation at all to the victims of those crimes. The failure rate under the early release scheme has almost doubled since the Home Secretary extended it. Is not it the simple truth that under this Prime Minister the fight against crime is being lost and crime is out of control?

The Prime Minister: Let us just be quite clear: overall, crime has been falling, not rising. That is not simply my view; it is the view of any independent analyst who has looked at the crime statistics. It is also the case that crime doubled under the Conservatives or, if the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to use the British crime survey, it rose by over 50 per cent.

The point is that under this Government we have record numbers of police officers and the new antisocial behaviour legislation. We now have new measures on drugs and drug addiction and crime. We have community support officers. I did not say it does not matter if people commit crimes; of course it matters. It is no consolation to anyone who is a victim of crime to be told that crime has fallen, but neither is it any consolation to have a former Home Secretary who cut police numbers lecture the rest of us on crime when he was part of a Government who doubled it.

4. [200670] Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I have a remarkable and courageous constituent called Jane Tomlinson, who, despite being diagnosed with inoperable cancer, and despite the great pain that she suffers, has set about raising £1 million, and has almost achieved that total, for four organisations that help to alleviate the pain and suffering of those with cancer. Will he join me in paying tribute to Jane, and will he also—perhaps the greatest tribute of all—rededicate the Government's efforts to improve cancer services in the NHS?

The Prime Minister: I would like to join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the work of Jane Tomlinson in raising money for and awareness of cancer. She serves as a true inspiration to those suffering from cancer. I assure my hon. Friend that we will continue to make this a priority. Ninety-nine per cent. of patients with suspected cancer are now seen by specialists within two weeks of being referred by their GP, which is up from 63 per cent. in 1997. We are investing in the region of £600 million extra a year in cancer services, with more than 1,000 extra cancer consultants. Since 1996, premature deaths from cancer are down by 12.2 per cent., which represents 33,000 lives. We now have the fastest falling death rates in the world for lung cancer in men and breast cancer in women.

5. [200671] Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): Can it possibly be right that after £500,000 of taxpayers' money has already been spent on establishing and promoting a new microsystems company in Plymouth, the entire project has now been lured to Scotland by the promise of additional grants, which are also out of taxpayers' funds? Apart from the crushing blow that that decision has caused to the economy of Plymouth, is it not a terrible waste of public money? If I write to the Prime Minister with more detail about this case—I do not expect him to know the detail today—will he please investigate and find out whether a serious misuse of taxpayers' money has taken place?

The Prime Minister: Certainly, I will examine the matter for the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot give him a guarantee as to what I will decide when I have done so.

6. [200672] Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Four years ago, on 23 December 2000, an 18-year-old student in my constituency was knocked down and killed by a taxi. On Monday this week, the papers informed us that the taxi driver intends to sue the parents of the dead boy for the trauma that he suffered as a result of that. I spoke to the parents last night, and they are devastated by the actions of this taxi driver. Does the Prime Minister agree that this is the compensation culture gone mad? What actions can be taken to curb such excesses?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, I do not know the exact circumstances to which my hon. Friend refers, but if they are as he says, it is an extraordinary thing to have happen. The Government's view is that in relation to causing death by dangerous driving, it is extremely important that we toughen up the measures, not weaken them. I cannot comment on the particular case, and it would not be right for me to do so. Obviously, however, I agree with him on his general point that some idea of the compensation culture should not offend common sense.

Animal Rights Extremists

7. [200673] Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What assessment the Government have made of the activities of animal rights extremists.

The Prime Minister: The Government take the threat posed by animal rights extremists very seriously, and have taken every opportunity to make it clear that their illegal activities will not be tolerated. We are tightening up the law with provisions in the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill, which it is important that we emphasise. First, it will introduce a new offence of protesting outside homes in such a way that causes harassment, alarm or distress to residents. Secondly, it will amend the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 to extend it to the harassment of two or more persons who are connected, such as employees of the same company. Thirdly, it will provide an additional power for the police to direct a protester to leave the vicinity of a home and not return to it within a specified period up to three months. I assure the hon. Gentleman that if we need to do so, we will legislate even further.

Michael Fabricant: I am grateful to the Prime Minister for his reply, and my constituents in Yoxall, Newborough and Newchurch, who have been terrorised by animal rights extremists now for five years, will also be grateful. We welcome the legislation, although, as with everything, the devil will be in the detail. But does the Prime Minister also accept that there are genuine animal rights campaigners? What does he say to those who read the pamphlet, "Labour Britain: New Life for Animals", which made the pledge in 1997 that a Labour Government "will support a Royal Commission to review the effectiveness and justification of animal experiments"?

Does the Prime Minister not stick to what he promised, or was that just talk again?

The Prime Minister: I was going to say that we could dissect that question, but it is probably not the right thing to say.

We pledged to ensure better welfare and better safeguards in animal experiments, and we delivered on that pledge. We have made sure that all experiments are conducted according to the tightest possible regulations. It is for precisely that reason that we are in a strong position to say to animal rights extremists that we have tough measures in this country, so there can be no justification whatever for harassing and intimidating people who are going about their lawful business.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): My constituent, Richard Belmar, has now spent nearly three years in Guantanamo Bay without charge and now with no hope whatsoever—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must stop the hon. Lady there. Questions must relate to animal welfare.

Engagements

8. [200674] Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): Yesterday two people were convicted in the Irish Republic. One was described as a branch secretary of Sinn Fein in Dublin. He was found in possession of surveillance details of Irish politicians.

On 27 November 2002, the Prime Minister said in the House that everyone must be satisfied that violence had been given up for good. Does not yesterday's court decision in the Republic undermine that?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that I can comment on the individual arrest or the details, but I can say that what I said back in November 2002 still holds. That is why we have not yet been able to get the devolved institutions in Northern Ireland up and running again. Let me make it clear again that there can be no place in a proper democratic Government for people who are engaged in paramilitarism. Let us hope that we can secure clear agreements on all sides that make it absolutely clear that the only basis on which people can participate in a devolved Government is a commitment, which they implement, to exclusively democratic and peaceful means.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): Tomorrow, around midnight, will be the 20th anniversary of the Bhopal poisonous gas leak which killed thousands of people and is causing suffering to this day. Will the Prime Minister pledge to strive for a clean-up of the site, for proper compensation for survivors and families of victims, and for new law, regulations and safeguards to prevent industrial hazards, both nationally and internationally?

The Prime Minister: I shall have to write to my hon. Friend to tell him what issues we have taken up with the Indian Government. Obviously the primary responsibility must lie with them.

9. [200675] Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell) (Con): In a moment I shall go downstairs to join two of the Prime Minister's closest friends, Carole Caplin and Jenny Seagrove, to continue our campaign against the food supplements directive and the threat to vitamin supplements in this country. Given that even the Prime Minister's close friends think that the Government have got this wrong, will he now act to remove the unwanted threat to vitamins taken by millions of people all over the country?

The Prime Minister: As ever, we must proceed according to the science, and the position set out by the Government is the one that I support.

10. [200676] Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Given that a massive school building programme was announced yesterday, that all the indications today suggest that primary school results will be excellent, and that tomorrow's local government settlement will put even more money into education, does the Prime Minister agree that it really is education, education, education? Is there not a straight choice between further investment in education in the future, and the bad old days of cuts under the Tories?

The Prime Minister: I am glad that my hon. Friend has said that. In addition to the excellent school results, there has been record capital funding for our schools. Indeed, there will be £17 billion of capital over the next three years. It is possible to visit primary and secondary schools in any constituency and see the results of investment in extra classrooms, extra teachers, extra teaching assistants and, in many cases, new school wings or even new schools.

According to the shadow Chancellor, there would be £35 billion-worth of cuts in spending over the next few years. Therefore, the choice is very simple: keeping up this investment in our schools system under this Labour Government, or returning to the bad old days of cuts under the Tories.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Does the Prime Minister understand the level of concern in Scotland caused by the Secretary of State for Defence's apparent dismissal of the substantive case for keeping historic Scottish regiments as merely the tartan question? How can Labour be trusted to represent Scottish interests if that is an example of the standard of senior Ministers' thinking? Does the Prime Minister accept that, ultimately, this will be a matter for his personal decision, and according to what time scale does he intend to make it?

The Prime Minister: We have made it clear, as I said earlier, that we have got to balance the Army's requirement for more flexible deployment of troops with maintaining regiments' traditions. I have listened, and will listen, very carefully to what my hon. Friends say and to what Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members say. However, the idea that the Scottish National party should lecture us on the British Army is one of the most absurd that I have ever heard. If the hon. Gentleman had his way, there would not be a British Army. So we will take these decisions in the best interest of the British Army and the United Kingdom.

Point of Order

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. On 27 October, the Prime Minister told my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the Opposition that millions of jobs depend on UK membership of the EU. On 2 November, I asked the Prime Minister what the evidential basis was for that assertion, and he referred me to an answer given by the Minister for Europe to my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) on 5 July. On looking at that answer, I discovered that all that it refers to is the number of jobs

"linked, directly and indirectly, to the export of goods and services to the European Union". [Official Report, 6 July 2004; Vol. 423, c.594W]

Either the Prime Minister got his answer wrong or he got the reference wrong. What should I do about it, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: There is nothing that I can do about it, but we are now in a new Session and the hon. Gentleman could table more parliamentary questions to the Prime Minister.

Orders of the Day

Debate on the Address

[SIXTH DAY]

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Question [23 November],

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:

Most Gracious Sovereign,

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament—[Mr. George Howarth.]

Question again proposed.

Economic Affairs

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected for debate the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. Standing Order No. 33 provides that on the last day of the debate on the motion for an Address to Her Majesty, the House may also vote on a second amendment selected by the Speaker. I have selected the amendment in the name of the leader of the Liberal Democrats for that purpose. The vote on that amendment will take place at the end of the debate, after the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition has been disposed of.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): I beg to move, as an amendment to the Address, at the end of the Question to add:—

"but regret that the Gracious Speech contains nothing that will reduce regulation, cut excessive bureaucracy or give the taxpayer value for money; condemn the Treasury for sponsoring 70 new regulations per working day, for blocking real reform of public services and for the consequent failure to deliver cleaner hospitals, school discipline, controlled immigration, more police on the streets and a lower tax economy; further regret that the Gracious Speech contains no measures to reverse the Chancellor's punitive taxation of pension funds and reductions in tax incentives to save which have contributed to cutting the savings ratio by one third whilst household debt now exceeds one trillion pounds; are disturbed that more pensioners are means tested than ever before whilst 2 million pensioners live in poverty; note that the Treasury's failure to provide taxpayer value and the waste of billions of pounds on unnecessary expenditure means that another round of stealth tax rises is inevitable under this Government; and further deplore the fact that there are no measures in the Gracious Speech to reverse the Government's policy of high levels of regulation and taxation which have resulted in the UK slipping from fourth to eleventh in the international competitiveness league and having a lower GDP per head than Ireland.".

Before I begin discussing the main substance of today's debate, I want to make a few remarks about the Bills in the Queen's Speech relating to the economy. The Treasury's Bill on the merger of the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise carries our general support, as the Chancellor is aware, although we remain concerned about its practical implementation. We are dealing with two organisations that have between them 250 legacy computer systems and some 13 million customers. It is no mean feat to put them together, and we will want to look at the details extremely carefully.

Before dealing with the Bills relating to the Department of Trade and Industry, I want to point out that the Queen's Speech does not include two Bills that might conceivably have been expected to be included.

One is the provision for real estate investment trust rights, and I hope that the Chancellor will confirm that clauses will be forthcoming to deal with the introduction of such rights either in the Finance Bill or by some other means. The Opposition believe that those new vehicles have a great deal to offer to our economy. We would want to ensure that the means by which they are introduced are not over-bureaucratic and restrictive, but we would want to support measures to introduce them into the capital markets.

Also notable by its absence—it was not present in the Queen's Speech—was any reference to a statistics Bill. I hope that the Government will draw up proposals to deal with the issues raised by the Statistics Commission about the transparency of national statistics. We shall produce proposals in that connection in the next few weeks and I hope that the House will have the opportunity to discuss and debate such matters during this Session.

In respect of Department of Trade and Industry legislation, the consumer credit Bill carries our general support. We are particularly keen to see some change in the extortionate credit test. As long as the Bill moves towards increasing transparency rather than imposing undue bureaucratic burdens, we will support its gist.

The equality Bill is in much the same position. The CBI, as the Chancellor will be aware, has warned that the new proposed commission for equality and human rights could too easily become too concerned with enforcement, too bureaucratic and not sufficiently concerned with promoting good practice. We will want to see whether those dangers are apparent in the Bill and we will want to debate the provisions in Committee.

I now turn to the main subject of today's debate. Tomorrow we will have an opportunity to see the Chancellor launch his personal election campaign with his customary brio and to discuss the very poor fiscal position that he is in. Today I want to take the opportunity to do something different and examine the Chancellor's economic record, which he is both pleased about and proud of. He frequently presents his economic record as being all for the best in the best of all possible worlds—[Interruption.] Government Front Benchers seem to be very happy about the situation. The Chancellor tells us that it will go on getting better for ever.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): Under Labour.

Mr. Letwin: Yes, indeed. Under Labour, as the hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position; that is the mythology perpetuated by the Chancellor. The hon. Gentleman says that it is true, so let me read him and Government Members an alternative viewpoint. In respect of the Chancellor, this view states:

"His economic inheritance in 1997 was better than that of any previous Chancellor in living memory."

I believe that the Chancellor once asked one of the Treasury officials whether he would like him to write a thank you letter for what had been done for the Chancellor before 1997. However, the person I am quoting continues:

"But there are limits to the length of time that public spending can increase at a faster rate than growth in GDP without causing problems. By the time I left Downing Street, Britain was approaching or had perhaps passed that limit. The regulatory burden had been increased, the tax system had become more complicated and the tax burden was rising too. Over the medium term, all this matters: it is easier for governments to mess up an economy than to improve it."

That was, as the Chancellor has recognised—

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op) rose—

Mr. Letwin: Just a moment. Those were the words not of a Conservative spokesman or even of an independent person, but of someone who was working as the Prime Minister's economic adviser.

Mr. Foulkes: On the question of messing up economies, on 1 March 2000—perhaps it should have been 1 April 2000—the right hon. Gentleman said:

"We made the most dreadful mistakes . . . we spent too much money in 1990 and we did many other things of which we are deeply ashamed".—[Official Report, 1 March 2000; Vol. 345, c.492].

Why should we expect anything better from the Conservatives next time?

Mr. Letwin: The right hon. Gentleman has the uncanny knack of falling into the very trap that I am seeking to set for him. It is perfectly true that we are willing to admit it when things go wrong. The problem that I am about to illustrate is the fact that the Chancellor does not know how to do that.

The Chancellor is incapable of recognising that the inheritance we built up after the ERM fiasco—I admit that it was a fiasco—was the strongest inheritance that any Chancellor has had in living memory, as is attested by the Prime Minister's economic adviser. As that adviser points out, there is a question mark over the Chancellor's economic performance. Neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the Chancellor is very keen to admit it, so I shall go through the record.

It is fair to say that the Chancellor is especially proud of his record on stability. He speaks about stability on almost every available occasion. That record of stability has two aspects—fiscal and monetary. However, the remarkable fact about both those forms of stability is that they are due to the fact that the Chancellor has allowed someone else to set the policy. His fiscal stability, which is now running out—we will talk about that tomorrow—derives almost exclusively from the fact that for the first two years the Government's policy on spending was set by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the previous Chancellor, whose spending plans the Chancellor obeyed for two years. Had he not done so, he would not be within a million miles of adhering to his golden rule today. Indeed, he would be in the most terrible trouble.

[Mr. Letwin]

Monetary stability is admirable, but again that is because the Chancellor has allowed someone else to run monetary policy—the Bank of England.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): You opposed that.

Mr. Letwin: I personally never opposed the decision—[HON. MEMBERS: "You did."] I did not. I was in favour of the decision from the beginning and I was part of the group of people who persuaded my party to adopt the position of being in favour of it. It was the right move. The point I am making about the decision, which the Chancellor is in no position to deny, is that the effect—

Mr. Brown: You voted against it.

Mr. Letwin: One does things out of party loyalty that one does not necessarily—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I have never personally opposed the decision. [Interruption.] I have been in favour of it— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very noisy. We must hear the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Letwin: The Chancellor is perfectly aware that the reason monetary stability has been achieved is that someone else has been running monetary policy, and that is a very good thing.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): On the subject of fiscal stability, can the right hon. Gentleman remind us what proportion of GDP Government debt was when his party was in office?

Mr. Letwin: Fiscal stability has to do with obeying a set of fiscal rules, and the Chancellor would not have come close to obeying his fiscal rules had he not followed the policies of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe.

If we want to find the policies that the Chancellor himself has adopted—his policies—we have to look beneath the surface of the two forms of stability that have been created by other people. What do we see when we turn to the question of what the Chancellor himself has been responsible for? Let us take productivity.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No, I am going to continue for a while.

The Chancellor's pre-Budget report of 1998 said:

"Productivity . . . is a fundamental yardstick of economic performance."

Well, what has his record been on productivity growth? It has dropped by a third. The Chancellor shakes his head. Why does the Chancellor shake his head? It is because here we have a classic case of the manipulation of statistics by the Treasury and the contrast between the way in which the Treasury does business and the way in which the Office for National Statistics does business. The Treasury uses the so-called underlying trend rate of growth of productivity and it seeks to persuade itself that the productivity growth rate is reasonable. But the ONS, which is not in this respect governed entirely by Treasury diktats—thank God—produces a different series of actual productivity growth rates which show that they have dropped by a third.

The Deloitte UK productivity index—the latest figures—shows that productivity growth in the UK is now at its slowest for two and a half years and is below the EU average.

Let us turn to competitiveness. The Chancellor has frequently told us that his great vision, which he has been adumbrating in various newspapers recently, is to increase Britain's competitiveness—a very laudable ambition and one indeed that the 1997 Labour manifesto told us would be one of the Government's main hallmarks. It stated:

"We will build a new partnership with business to improve the competitiveness of British industry for the 21st century".

[Interruption.] The Chief Secretary comforts himself with the illusion that he has done some such thing, whereas in fact the Government have brought about a condition in our economy such that we have dropped from fourth to 11th in the international competitiveness league, we have record trade deficits and we have lost 790,000 manufacturing jobs. If that is competitiveness—

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: Of course.

Jim Knight: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his generosity. Does he accept that his plans to slash the business support programme of the Department of Trade and Industry by £500 million would damage British competitiveness?

Mr. Letwin: Absolutely not at all. The hon. Gentleman suffers from the most astonishing delusion if he believes that the Department of Trade and Industry is currently assisting British competitiveness. It is in fact the Department that has presided over the fall in our competitiveness. The DTI is causing extra costs for businesses through extra taxes and is producing astonishing little result. Our plans to reduce the bureaucracy of the DTI by four fifths will assist British business by reducing the tax on British business and by reducing the degree of unnecessary interference in British business, thereby promoting its interests—long overdue.

Let us turn to growth. The Chancellor is proud of his record on growth, too—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear".] Yes, his hon. Friends are very pleased about it, too, but they do not spend much time noticing that about six sevenths of the growth in the last quarter was due to the public sector. They do not do much comparison of our growth rates with countries that are growing fast. The Chancellor likes to compare us with the eurosclerotic zone; by those standards, he says, we are doing brilliantly. But what about the rest of the world? What about the other major English-speaking countries; how does our economic growth compare with theirs? It is slower than that in any other major English-speaking country. It is half the rate of growth in Ireland since 1997; our per capita income is now below that of Ireland. Why? Because in Ireland they have been following quite different economic policies from those of the Chancellor. They have gone for low regulation and low tax and have ended up with people investing in Ireland. The Chancellor has not achieved a similar growth rate because his policies were not designed to the same ends.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): The right hon. Gentleman talks of low regulation in Ireland and the Conservative amendment refers to reducing regulation and cutting excessive bureaucracy, so can he give the House three examples of regulation that should be abolished forthwith?

Mr. Letwin: I can give the hon. Gentleman not three but thousands and thousands of examples. I will send him a very long list. My hon. Friends and I do not intend merely to cut regulation; we intend to cut the drivers of regulation. We intend to change the culture that creates regulation by cutting the bureaucracies that produce it. As the hon. Gentleman wants to talk about regulation and the question of what we shall abolish, he tempts me to move immediately to the very question of the Chancellor's statements about regulation—[Interruption.]

Huw Irranca-Davies rose—

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is not giving way.

Mr. Letwin: I was referring to the Chancellor's statements in the last pre-Budget report. He did not limit himself to three regulations. No, he said that he would abolish 147 regulations. Some interesting facts have come to light about those 147 regulations. The starting point of that interest is that the Chancellor was for once—I think it was unique—unduly modest.

Actually, when we got hold of the list it turned out that he was claiming to be abolishing 159.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Letwin: I am sorry; the right hon. Gentleman has already intervened once and he did not do very well last time. I am not going to give him another go.

The Ernst and Young team looked at what the Chancellor had suggested and they said this:

"Unfortunately, with one hand the PBR adds much more to the regulatory burden than it subtracts with the other . . . The PBR announcement of an enquiry into reforming or reviewing 147 different regulations was announced with optimism . . . the devil was . . . in the detail: only 25% of the 147 referred to tax and red tape issues."

In fact, the Ernst and Young team were pretty kind to the Chancellor, because when we asked parliamentary questions of the Treasury, the Treasury was able to name only one business measure in the 147, and when we checked on that measure, it turned out that it had already been announced in 2000 and again in 2002, and that it was not in the list of 147 or 159. So we asked—

Huw Irranca-Davies rose—

Mr. Letwin: No, I am not going to give way; I am going to continue this rather amusing sequence—amusing to me. So we asked the DTI, and for once we got a parliamentary answer from that Department. I do congratulate any DTI Minister who may see this set of remarks in Hansard on the fact that we got an answer—a very unusual thing to get from the DTI. And what did it tell us? It told us that there were six of the 147 or 159 that it would like to name. Unfortunately, five of the six were not in the list of 147 or 159. But one was—the Price Marking Order 2004. We went to look at it, and we got the regulatory impact assessment relating to it. What did it show? It showed very clearly that this measure increased the costs on business by £20 million; it did not reduce them at all.

If there is a problem about mentioning regulations that are for abolition, the problem lies with the Chancellor. From 1998 up to the end of 2003, the Government have passed 23,322 new regulations. I admit that in this one respect the motion is insufficiently generous to the Government, because that translates into 70 per week or 15 per working day, which is an increase of 53 per cent. on the figures for 1979 to 1996.

Huw Irranca-Davies rose—

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Letwin: I will not give way for the moment; I intend to make progress.

The fact is that the Government have produced these dismal figures on productivity, competitiveness and growth in very large part because they have over-regulated our economy. They have overtaxed our economy, with 66 tax rises including many on business. The CBI, which has assessed the annual business tax bill at £54 billion in the year 2005-06 on current trends, points out that this is a rise of £7.6 billion from 1997, and adds that to the cost of the additional regulations to show that this Chancellor, who prides himself on being a friend of business, has actually added £15 billion a year of costs through extra regulation and extra tax on business.

There is somebody who is not one of the Prime Minister's advisers, and never was one of the Prime Minister's advisers, who had something to say about this problem of excessive tax and regulation on business. He said:

"An incompetent economy ends you up with higher taxes. A high tax economy is a low success economy".

That was not one of the Prime Minister's advisers; that was the Prime Minister, in 1994.

The fact is, of course, that the Chancellor does not like listening to the Prime Minister and he did not listen to him about that. This is the Chancellor who has imposed tax and regulation on business.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Letwin: But it is not just by regulating and taxing that the Chancellor has undermined the foundations of our economy. The tale is even worse when it comes to savings and pensions. Next to the Chancellor sits the new Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, and he prides himself no doubt on presiding over some kind of miracle of savings and pensions. That is not the view of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who very rightly pointed out that in 1997, just as we had the best inheritance of any Chancellor in living memory, we had the best system of savings and pensions in western Europe, and now, in the right hon. Gentleman's memorable phrase, we have "one of the worst".

Our savings ratio has dropped by a third; it is now half the EU average. We have a massive imbalance in the economy, with a low propensity to save and a high propensity to borrow, and about £1 trillion of household indebtedness. We all know what has happened. There is the £5 billion a year raid on the pension funds, there is the reduction of the tax advantages of saving in individual savings accounts compared with tax exempt special savings accounts and personal equity plans, and there is the vast expansion of means-testing, which has provided a huge disincentive to saving for people coming up to pensionable age—the three hammer-blows that the Chancellor administered to the already brittle glass of longevity and persistent low inflation. Finally—

Mr. Foulkes: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Letwin: No. The right hon. Gentleman is dying to speak and he will have an opportunity to do so.

The Chancellor has blocked every effort at radical reform of the public services to try to overcome the vast productivity gap there. He destroyed foundation hospitals. He destroyed them so much that he even led to the removal, by his own will, of the then Secretary of State for Health. What does the Chancellor do about this? He tries to deal with the figures rather than the facts. The broad fact is that we have had a 25 per cent. increase in spending on our hospitals in real terms, and only a 5 per cent. increase in the number of treatments or finished consultant episodes. And what happens as a result? The national statistician is called in, and he is asked to redo the productivity figures for the health service; and he calls in Sir Tony Atkinson. What does Sir Tony Atkinson do? He tries to create 10 different measures by which he could prove that the productivity of the national health service has not gone down. And what emerges as a result? On every one of the 10 measures, the productivity of the national health service is shown to have gone down.

So I return to my original question—what is the reality behind the myth? The reality is this. The stability that the Chancellor is so proud of is due exclusively to his allowing other people to determine his fiscal policy in the first two years and his monetary policy throughout. Underneath the stability, he has failed on productivity, failed on competitiveness—

Mr. Foulkes rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman has indicated that he is not giving way. The Government Back Benches are far too noisy. [Interruption.] Order.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a debate and I know what debates are like.

Mr. Letwin: I am sure that Labour Members will have their opportunity to be less noisy and more coherent in due course, Mr. Speaker.

The Chancellor has failed—failed on productivity, failed on competitiveness, failed on growth. Why? Because he has over-regulated and overtaxed. Why? Because he is funding a vast and wasteful bureaucracy which will be the subject of tomorrow's statement and our debate following it, and he has destroyed or all but destroyed the savings culture in this country. The radical reform of public services has been blocked. He has presided not over the economic miracle that is his mythology, but over the gradual erosion of our economic fundamentals.

It is not just we who have noticed these things. Mr. Scott, to whom I referred at the beginning of my remarks, noticed them. The Prime Minister, whom I have quoted, has noticed them, and that is probably why we now have the bizarre situation of having two Chancellors—the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. It is a sort of mediaeval joust, made even more bizarre by fact that the former Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who once reported to this Chancellor, now reports to the other Chancellor, and this Chancellor has to report to her as Minister for the Cabinet Office The message from No. 10 is clear: time's up, time to head to the Foreign Office—not a moment too soon for the British economy.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): I will come to all of the shadow Chancellor's claims later in the debate, but is it not remarkable, in a debate about the economy, that he will not concede that we have the lowest inflation for 40 years, that we have the lowest interest rates for 40 years, that we have the highest ever recorded employment in our country's history, and that standards of living have been rising by over 3 per cent. a year—far higher than under the Major Administration?

I know that the shadow Chancellor may yearn for the good old days of the early 1990s—the good old days when we had 16 per cent. interest rates, the good old days when, under his economic advice, there were 3 million unemployed, the good old days when there were 1¼ million people with negative equity—but any comparison between the record of his Government and the record of ours shows us the facts. On inflation, consumer prices are averaging just 1.3 per cent. on the new index, 2.4 per cent. on the old index, contrasted with 6 per cent. average under the Conservative years. And inflation peaked at 21 per cent. under the party that he represents.

Interest rates have averaged 5.3 per cent. under Labour. They averaged more than 10 per cent. under the Conservative Government. The mortgage rate—what people have to pay to own their homes—has been 6.1 per cent. under Labour and 11.4 per cent. under the Conservatives. Debt has fallen to just under a third of GDP under Labour. It was 45 per cent. under the Conservatives. We are happy to draw a contrast between the Labour party and the Conservative party: we are the party of sustained growth; they are the party of the two worst recessions since the war.

The shadow Chancellor has the nerve to give the impression that the good record of the Labour Government exists because we adopted his policies. It is because we refused to adopt his policies that we have a good record. When we froze spending in the first two years of the Labour Government, the last Conservative Chancellor said that he would never have gone through with it.

As for the independence of the Bank of England, I hope that the shadow Chancellor will have the good grace to apologise to the House because on 11 November 1997 he voted against the Second Reading of the Bill to grant it independence. Not only did he vote against it, but so did the current Leader of the Opposition, who said:

"The new Labour Government is taking action which I believe is going to damage the future of this country."

That was not a party that wanted to give the impression, either in private or in public, that it supported the major decision on monetary policy that was taken by Labour.

I am glad that the shadow deregulation Minister has returned to the shadow Cabinet so that it has a more moderate image and looks more centrist, and therefore appeals to the middle ground. As recently as 30 October 2004 he said about the previous Conservative Government:

"15 per cent. interest rates, sky-high mortgage arrears, negative equity, bankruptcies, entrepreneurs giving up the ghost on private-run companies and a lot of people losing their jobs. I don't think there was a family in the country that didn't experience at least one of those anguishes. My parents lost their jobs in the recession. A lot of my neighbours lost their houses".

That is the indictment of the Conservative party, and that is what would happen if it came back into power. I am happy to give way to the shadow deregulation Minister if he wishes to correct that.

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs) (Con) rose—

Mr. Brown: I am happy to give way to the former shadow Chief Secretary. I remind the House that a few months ago he predicted that we were heading for a crisis analogous to the great crash of the 1920s.

Mr. Flight: First, I am sorry that the Chancellor misquoted what I said. I said that the effect on the stock market was as bad as in the 1920s—which it is, because it fell 20 per cent. Secondly, did the Chancellor support membership of the exchange rate mechanism, which led to the problems that this country experienced in the early 1990s?

Mr. Brown: Of course we supported membership of the ERM, but we did not choose the rate at which that Government joined it, and on which they could not deliver.

The shadow Chancellor tells us that this Government have a bad record on tax, regulation and productivity. Let us look at what the shadow Cabinet member responsible for deregulation has been telling the City. At the Techlocate conference in London on 13 October 2004, he agreed that the single most important consideration—I hope that the shadow Chancellor is listening, because he may have to adapt his policies as a result of this—is the cost impact of government. He said:

"Businesses are reluctant to locate in places where: tax rates are high . . . Places like Ireland, the USA, Hong Kong, Singapore and the UK attract because their tax rates for business are low."

So the shadow deregulation Minister does not describe the condition of the British economy as does the shadow Chancellor, who says that our tax rates are unacceptable, and has told an audience outside the House that tax rates are low.

The shadow deregulation Minister went on to say:

"The second most important consideration is a flexible and willing work force. The third issue is access to market and to supplies. The fourth issue is ease of doing business—do you feel happy there? . . . The UK's strong academic links around the world are an important part of our network" in finding jobs. Then he said:

"What are the most attractive locations today?"

The answer to the shadow Chancellor, who got his figures wrong on productivity and who imagines that every regulation damages business, although business often asks for things to be done, is, according to the shadow deregulation Minister:

"The lure of the USA; of China; of India; of the UK."

I am grateful to him, because he has given us a verdict on the Government that we will be able to use during the election campaign. It answers in substantial detail just about every point made by the shadow Chancellor, who claims that he is responsible for the good things that the Labour Government have done.

What of the next stage: the Queen's Speech itself, and our policies? The shadow Chancellor did not mention the child benefit Bill. It will enable the Government to extend financial support to trainees who are unwaged and to 19-year-olds completing a course of non-advanced educational training. That will remove the disincentives in financial support for young people to stay on in education while at work. With the growth of education maintenance allowances, it will help many of the 100,000 who do not stay in education and training. I hope that the Opposition will support the Bill, even though the right hon. Gentleman did not mention it.

That leads me to the difference between us and the Conservatives on the other issue of training, employment and opportunities for the future. Our policy is to expand the new deal so that there is a new deal for skills as well as for jobs. In the pre-Budget report tomorrow I shall announce measures that will enable more of the unemployed and those who are inactive, including incapacity benefit claimants, to get the skills to return to work.

Our policies have created 200,000 more jobs in the UK since a year ago. Two million more people are in work than in 1997—

Mr. Flight: In the public sector.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman uses "public sector" as a term of abuse. There are 80,000 more nurses and 20,000 more doctors. Surely with its new policies, the Conservative party should welcome that. Does he not also realise that two thirds of the jobs have been created in the private sector, which he should support?

[Mr. Brown]

The unemployment rate—the claimant count—in the shadow Chancellor's constituency is 0.7 per cent. He might have been better off congratulating a Labour Government on the jobs that have been created. Unemployment in the shadow Chief Secretary's constituency is 1 per cent.—a reduction of 50 per cent. under the Labour Government. Is it not therefore an outrage that when all those things have been happening to get 2 million people into jobs, the Conservative party now wants to abolish the new deal?

The shadow Chancellor says that the new deal has been an expensive failure, yet 1.2 million people have been helped by it. He said:

"We have got to take painful cuts in the new deal"— which suggests that it might have been doing some good—

"to fund David Willetts' pension reforms."

Abolishing the new deal would cost money because the new deal for single parents, which, as an employment Minister, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions was responsible for developing and is now responsible for taking further, saves £40 million a year by getting people off benefit and into work. Abolishing it is hardly a saving. Will not the shadow Chancellor take into account what the former shadow Chancellor said:

"It's not bad. It's based on programmes that we developed to put young people into jobs"?

Will he not even listen to the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee—a Conservative—the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), to whom I shall be happy to give way, because I am going to quote him? He said:

"The programme has been effective in reducing long-term youth unemployment."

I hope he still agrees with that sentiment, and therefore agrees that to abolish the new deal would be a bad thing.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): The Chancellor well knows that in attempting to run the Public Accounts Committee I try to rule by consensus, so we take a balanced view. If he is going to quote reports issued by the PAC, he should quote from the entire report. If he read the report, he would realise that we are prepared to see the good parts of the new deal, but we are also prepared to criticise it. We made a point of saying that the evidence was not clear as to how many real jobs the scheme had created.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that, but it is a bad practice for the Chairman of a Committee to disown himself from a report. I was actually quoting what he said to the Lincolnshire Echo. I shall also quote what he said in The Birmingham Post, which shows that the Opposition are prepared to say things outside the House that they are not prepared to say inside it. The nearer they get to their constituencies, the nearer they get to some truth about what is happening. He stated:

"Clearly many young people have been helped by this programme and it has led to a fall in the overall level of long-term youth unemployment."

If that is not an acceptance on the part of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee of the importance of the new deal, I do not know what is.

Notwithstanding the fact that we are running up to a general election, we had hoped that we would have all-party consensus on the future of the new deal. It is unfortunate that both the Conservative party and the Liberal party, which is disowning the traditions of Lloyd George, who proposed a new deal to conquer unemployment, are opposing the new deal, which has done so much good.

Mr. Flight rose—

Mr. Brown: If the former shadow Chief Secretary, who has just left the Front Bench, is the only person who will intervene on behalf of the Conservatives—

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con) rose—

Mr. Brown: Ah—perhaps there is more talent on the Back Benches. I shall take both interventions.

Mr. Flight: The Chancellor has just illustrated the fact that the economy is pretty much at full capacity. Given that fact, is he concerned that our fiscal deficit is approaching £40 billion and our external current account deficit this year is likely to be in the order of £40 billion as well? Does he not feel that those imbalances present considerable risks for the future?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for sometimes saying things that his Front-Bench colleagues will not say. He claims that the fiscal deficit is £40 billion and suggests that the economy is running beyond capacity—[HON. MEMBERS: "At capacity."] I am happy to correct myself—it is running at capacity. He must therefore be surprised that inflation is running at 1.2 per cent. Can he explain that?

Mr. Flight: I should have thought that the Chancellor understood that in a global economy, excess demand sucks in more imports rather than creates inflation. That has manifestly happened in the United States, whose deficit is relatively far larger than ours. The whole problem is that excess demand causes a massive external deficit.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is basically claiming that the United States economy has precisely the same problems as the British economy. The Conservatives say that the European economy is doing badly; now the hon. Gentleman is trying to say that the British and American economies are doing badly. The fact is that we have had seven years of sustained growth, seven years of low inflation and seven years of rising employment. To put the former shadow Chief Secretary's mind at rest, let me quote his remark to "The World This Weekend", reported in the Financial Times of 4 February 2003, that "When you get something analogous to what happened in the later 1920s and early 1930s which, alas, is what is happening today, then the economic and political impact is potentially huge."

If that is not the former shadow Chief Secretary giving a hostage to fortune, I do not know what is. When the Conservative party was asked about his remark—the hon. Gentleman was still a Front Bencher when he made it—an official replied,

"Bear in mind his City background. He is a City expert giving his analysis."

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Flight rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall give way to a different former Front Bencher. It is good to give them a chance to speak.

Mr. Bercow: Millions of voters in this country who have not yet decided whether to vote, and if they do, for which party, are tired of the tedium of the most tribal politics. Therefore, let me say straight away that I concede that the Chancellor was right and we were wrong about independence for the Bank of England; that was one of the best decisions that he has made. Does he, in turn, accept the verdict of a countless number of my constituents and that of my right hon. and hon. Friends that one of the worst decisions and most pernicious judgments that he has made was to tax the British pensions industry in such an underhand way, and to preside over a more than halving of the savings ratio? In that respect, a readiness to apologise and a display of just a modicum of humility on his part would be greatly appreciated.

Mr. Brown: I do not know that the hon. Gentleman is the best person to lecture us about humility—

Mr. Bercow: I am on a learning curve.

Mr. Brown: Perhaps the curve will take him over the threshold. The savings ratio is 6.2 per cent. now; it fell to 4.5 per cent. in the late 1980s under a Conservative Government. The savings ratio is only 2 per cent. in the United States of America. The hon. Gentleman should check all his facts carefully before he intervenes, but as he has so few opportunities to speak for the Conservative party these days, I shall give way to him again.

Mr. Bercow: I thank the Chancellor for giving way with his characteristic grace and generosity. Would he care to tell the House what the savings ratio was on 30 April 1997?

Mr. Brown: The savings ratio reflects the cycle; it reflects the point at which the economic cycle is. If the United States' savings ratio is 2 per cent. and ours is 6 per cent., what conclusions does the hon. Gentleman draw? [HON. MEMBERS: "Give us the figure."] The figure now is 6.2 per cent. and rising, and it fell to 4.5 per cent. under a Conservative Government. I am sure that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) does not want me to repeat to the House what he said about the international development budget just before he resigned from the Conservative Front-Bench team. The Conservatives never want to talk about international development, but let me remind the House that he said that a cut in the overseas development budget was completely unacceptable. I suspect that that is one of the reasons why he is now on the Back Benches. Perhaps the shadow Chancellor should think again about the international development budget.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend recall, as I do, that in the heat of battle during the 2001 election campaign, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) was shut away in mysterious circumstances after he revealed rather too much about Conservative plans to cut expenditure? Will he share with the House how those plans have developed, and what he thinks the implications of the immediate £20 billion cut would be?

Mr. Brown: I was going to discuss fiscal policy. As set out in the spending review, total managed expenditure is to rise from £486 billion this year to £576 billion in 2007–08. In each year we will be able to invest more than in the last, and meet all our fiscal disciplines. We shall continue to meet those commitments, and all emergencies, while meeting our fiscal rules.

I wish to express the gratitude of the whole House to the armed forces for their work, especially in the most recent period. The budget for the Ministry of Defence and for our armed forces, on whom the defence of our country depends, is to rise from £29.7 billion to £33.4 billion by 2007–08. I confirm that we have provided £4.4 billion to meet the extra costs of military conflicts in Afghanistan and Iraq and of meeting international obligations. I am setting aside in the special reserve a further £520 million for this year, raising the overall provision to almost £5 billion. At the same time we shall be vigilant, not only about what we do to help our armed forces, but about security at home.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Brown: Not at the moment.

Turning to the international development budget, during our G8 presidency the needs of Africa, development and delivering the Doha development round will be our focus. In the documents of the pre-Budget report issued tomorrow, the Secretary of State for International Development and I will set out our proposals for ensuring through our proposed new international finance facility that Africa and poor countries have the resources they need to fund education, health and anti-poverty programmes, and that the millennium development goals are met. We shall set out proposals for 100 per cent. multilateral debt relief from international institutions, which could complete the process of debt relief for the 37 poorest countries and could be extended to other poor countries as well. In next year's G8 discussions, we shall ask all countries to support our proposed international finance facility. So far 40 countries have done so, and this week Italy announced its support.

Funds for health are a priority of the new international finance facility to promote treatments and cures for HIV-AIDS, and it is appropriate that this is world AIDS day. To promote treatments, we have allocated in the spending review, in each of the next three years, £450 million, £500 million and £550 million.

[Mr. Brown]

That is over the three years of the spending period. We will allocate £1.5 billion to tackle this scourge. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and I are today issuing new proposals on the basis of research showing that for every year we bring forward the discovery of an AIDS vaccine, we save 2 million lives that would otherwise be lost. We commit the British Government to push forward the decisions that have been made before to establish a new global AIDS vaccine enterprise and infrastructure for co-ordinating internationally an exchange of research into AIDS.

As with our offer for malaria vaccines last week, we will also be willing to join other countries to explore how to increase investment in AIDS research and how to develop a jointly agreed advance purchase scheme to make new HIV vaccines accessible to Africa and meet our millennium development targets on health. I hope that I can have all-party support in the House for these proposals that we will put to the G8.

Mr. Letwin: As the Chancellor knows, the international finance facility has cross-party support.

To return to the point that the right hon. Gentleman was making about Ministry of Defence budgets, and as he was using this opportunity to convey some information to the House, may I ask him for clarification? When he said, if I caught him correctly, that £520 million would be set aside, did he mean that that would be done from the contingency reserve, or was that to be added to total managed expenditure?

Mr. Brown: This is in the reserve. It is the special reserve that we have set up for the Ministry of Defence to deal with the issues of Iraq. I hope that the Conservative party and other parties in the House will welcome that.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend made an appeal for cross-party support on aspects of international development. Does he agree that the standing of the House and of politicians would be greater if all parties endorsed his objective in reaching a target of 0.7 per cent. of GDP, which is universally supported?

Mr. Brown: My right hon. Friend has taken a huge interest in these matters over time. I am grateful to the shadow Chancellor for his support for the international finance facility. I am grateful particularly to Lord Griffiths, on the part of the Conservative party, who has been pushing forward the proposal internationally and working closely with us. I hope that over time all political parties in the House will come to accept that to meet the 0.7 per cent. target, with a timetable for doing so, is the best way forward. In my view, it is certainly the best way forward for Britain as we try to persuade the rest of the world, including all countries of the G7, to support further development aid.

We hope that during the course of next year, in the year when we are the president of the G8, we will make substantial progress on debt relief, on more funds for health, for the global health fund in particular, and on the IMF. I should add that we hope that by the end of next year we shall have the conclusion of the Doha trade development round—a round specifically in the interests of the poorest countries of the world.

Mr. Blunt: Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Brown: No. I want to move forward now. I want to take up the question that was posed by the shadow Chancellor about the fiscal policies of all parties.

The Liberal party has been making commitment after commitment on spending over the past few months. I believe that I have a duty to remind the Liberal shadow Chancellor, notwithstanding the fact that hardly any of his colleagues are in the Chamber, of the promise that he made on 4 March. He said:

"Our broad vision of public finances is that the overall proportion of national income the Government spends is currently roughly right—and we would not intend to change it significantly in the medium term"— that is, 41 per cent. of GDP at the time that the hon. Gentleman made that proposal. Presumably he would be cutting public expenditure this year.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): The Chancellor has been reminding the Conservatives of the distinction between a year and a cycle. That is a distinction that we understand.

Mr. Brown: If the hon. Gentleman wants public spending at 41 per cent. of GDP, or wants to give the impression that this is a decision that he is making over the cycle, perhaps he should have said that. That is not what he said and it is not what the leader of the Liberal party said on the same day, which was about the need to "broadly stabilise the ratio between public spending and the size of the economy."

Dr. Cable: Broadly.

Mr. Brown: Oh, just a few billion here and there. The usual Liberal policy.

We are owed some precision from the Liberal party on these matters in this debate. If it is going into the election giving the impression that 41 per cent. is the correct figure, it will have to be honest with the electorate that it would be cutting public spending. At the same time, I look at all the proposals that have been put forward by the Liberal party—abolishing tuition fees, introducing maintenance grants, introducing free long-term care, introducing 10,000 more police officers, cutting council tax bills, extending off-peak travel—

Dr. Cable: Hear, hear.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is saying "Hear, hear".

The list adds up to more than £10 billion. That is money that the hon. Gentleman cannot afford if he would freeze public expenditure. The money that we had last year has risen. As everybody knows, it has been rising this year and it will rise next year and the year after. Only last week, in the Queen's Speech debate, the Liberal environment spokesman, the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), said that he wanted more funding, and he regretted the fact that the Government had not provided it. He said that the Liberals would allocate Government money for endangered species—yet another example of Liberal party expenditure. That is like the Liberal shadow Chancellor.

Dr. Cable: Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Brown: I am happy to do so if the hon. Gentleman can clarify the matter. If he is setting public expenditure at 41 per cent. and at the same time he wishes to spend at least £10 billion more, what is the message going out to Liberal candidates? They cannot go round the country saying that they support more spending when they are outside Westminster, when the hon. Gentleman's rule is that spending would have to be cut. This is not a question of Liberal party policy nationally being that there should be more spending, it is a question of cutting the share of public spending in the national income. I hope that I can give the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to clarify that.

Dr. Cable: I am delighted to have the opportunity to do so. The Chancellor is absolutely right that we have a set of spending commitments that amount in total to about £10 billion a year. Half that would be generated by the higher rate of tax. As someone who has argued in favour of social justice over the years, surely the right hon. Gentleman would be in favour of that. That is 50 per cent. tax on earnings over £100,000. The other £5 billion a year comes from cutting other elements of public spending, which undoubtedly include some of the things that the right hon. Gentleman believes in passionately, like the Department of Trade and Industry and the baby bond scheme. However, we would cut them to finance priority spending.

Mr. Brown: That is extremely illuminating. The hon. Gentleman will cut public expenditure by £5 billion. I think that he owes the House and the country an explanation of where these cuts will be made. He is also saying that he will increase public expenditure by £5 billion through a tax change. Yet at the same time he says that the share of public spending in national income will fall. I suggest to the House that his figures do not add up in any way. He is claiming that he will spend less, while in every part of the country the Liberals are committing their party to spend more.

Then we come to the issue of Gershon. To endorse the principles of the Gershon review, the hon. Gentleman said in his alternative budget that the Liberals

"would bank the long-term savings made as a reduction of the deficit."

There is £20 billion also. He would use the Gershon savings to cut the deficit. We have already written in these savings in our public spending figures. The hon. Gentleman is promising the country another £20 billion of cuts that he cannot deliver. It is about time Liberal Members went back to their constituencies and thought again.

I now come to the Conservative party's plans for public expenditure.

Mr. Letwin: Will the Chancellor give way?

Mr. Brown: I will give way when the shadow Chancellor has a chance to confirm what I am about to say.

The right hon. Gentleman said one Sunday that, over a six-year period, he would provide the ability for us to spend about £35 billion less per year

"in the six years that Gordon Brown's spending plans provide for."

These are the figures. There are cuts of £6 billion in the first year, £14 billion in the second year, £19 billion in the third year, £24 billion in the fourth year, £29 billion in the fifth year and £35 billion in the sixth year. On top of that, the right hon. Gentleman must find additional money. He has allowed his shadow Cabinet colleagues to get out of control. He has allowed them to promise spending commitments all over the place that he has no way of funding.

Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that he has to find money to fund 40,000 extra police officers? He would have to find money to fund 20,000 extra prison places. He wants to link the basic state pension to earnings. He would have to afford that over a period. There would be a tenfold increase in drugs rehabilitation places. Only this week there was a new £200 million spending commitment on schools. There is also a national parenting scheme, 20,000 extra special constables, a 15,000 increase in social housing, 10,000 student bursaries, offshore processing and detention centres. I could go through the whole list of spending commitments.

When Lady Thatcher was Leader of the Conservative party in the 1970s and was facing the 1979 election, her policy was not to make any spending commitments. However, the shadow Chancellor is not only promising to cut public spending with a headline figure of £35 billion but has to find another £15 billion to pay for the spending commitments that he has allowed his shadow Cabinet colleagues to make. There is a gap between the Conservative party's spending commitments and the real world, and it must find £50 billion of cuts, which cannot be achieved by savings on paper clips in the civil and public services.

The right hon. Gentleman tells us that those cuts can be achieved by efficiency savings throughout the civil service, but that £50 billion is not the only sum that he has to find—he must also account for the £20 billion of Gershon savings. If a Conservative Administration were in power tomorrow, they would be looking for a total of £70 billion of efficiency savings. That is the state of play for the Conservative party. I am happy, if he wishes, to allow him to correct the figure of £50 billion of efficiency savings plus the Gershon savings that would have to be accounted for if he were in government tomorrow.

Mr. Letwin: I thank the Chancellor for allowing me to intervene at last.

I shall not respond to any of that garbage, as I would be surprised if the Chancellor could really delude himself that any rational being would listen to such stuff. I shall do something else, and defend the Liberal Democrats. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] If Government Members will contain themselves, the Liberal Democrats are my principal opponents in my constituency, and I do not believe that British politics benefits from the kind of rubbish of which the Chancellor was accusing them. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) is a perfectly rational individual and made a perfectly rational proposition with which, however, I disagree. It is rational to disagree that we should have public spending broadly at its present level across the cycle. The Chancellor knows perfectly well that the Noddy arithmetic that he was using for the Liberal Democrat proposals is no better than the Noddy arithmetic that he was using for our proposals, and it is no way to conduct British politics.

Mr. Brown: If the shadow Chancellor had said that my figures were wrong and could prove that they were, I might have had some respect for what he has just said. However, he said on "Breakfast with Frost" on Sunday that he would find £35 billion of savings. Does he deny that? Of course, he does not. [Interruption.] He says that it is beneath contempt to point out exactly what he said on "Breakfast with Frost" on Sunday. However, he said that he wanted £35 billion of savings. He must also find another £15 billion, because other Conservative Front Benchers have made commitments worth £15 billion. If he is going to find that sum, as he keeps telling us on the radio and elsewhere, through efficiency savings, he must deal with a point made by Sir Peter Gershon, who said:

"It is important that the drive for efficiency should not put at risk the delivery of public services, and a target in excess of 2.5 per cent. is likely to present such a risk."

Let me tell the House what savings of £50 billion would mean. If the right hon. Gentleman froze civil service recruitment, as he plans to do, he would gain £250 million a year. In other words, he would get 0.5 per cent. of the savings that he claims that he needs. If he halved the civil service by sacking half its members tomorrow and getting rid of prison officers, probation officers, security officers, customs officers and people guarding our ports and coastguards, he would save less than £6 billion of the £50 billion that he needs to save. If he sacked every civil servant in the land—dismissed the whole domestic civil service—he would get only about £10 billion or £12 billion, so he would still be £38 billion short of the target that he is trying to reach.

The fact of the mater is that the shadow Chancellor is going round every television and radio studio saying that he will make £35 billion of cuts and that there are £15 billion of commitments by his shadow Cabinet colleagues. He says that he will find that sum without affecting the quality of services such as health and education by cutting bureaucracy and waste. However, if he sacked every civil servant in the country, including prison officers and probation officers, he would only find £10 billion of the £50 billion, which exposes the hollowness of the Conservative campaign.

Why does the right hon. Gentleman not tell the country the truth, and admit that he wants to cut services, not just bureaucracy? Why is he not honest and say that he has always believed in cutting the national health service, charging and privatisation? Why does he not say that privatisation, rather than the development of public services, is the goal of Conservative shadow Ministers? Why does he not tell the truth and say that he has always wanted to cut public expenditure to 35 per cent. of national income, which he said consistently until he became shadow Chancellor? Why does he not admit that that is the view of the Leader of the Opposition, who has also committed himself to massive cuts? Why do they not admit that what they really want to do is cut the number of teachers, nurses, doctors, home helps and carers? The issues that we should consider in our debate on the Queen's Speech are, first, stability under Labour against a party that cannot even be honest about its monetary policy, and, secondly, investment under the Labour Government against massive cuts under the Conservatives. I believe that, when we come to the general election, the country will deliver its verdict by supporting us.

1.35 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): We support the practical measures on the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise in the Queen's Speech. I am glad that the Government have noted the concerns that I have long expressed about consumer debt, which is to be dealt with in limited but useful legislation that we will support. I also support the sensible suggestion of the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) about introducing legislation on the independence of the statistical service. A key theme over the next few days will be the integrity of Government figures, so such legislation would be a useful building block.

It was clear from his speech that the Chancellor has not listened to the advice from the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and our man in Brussels to stop boasting about the Government's economic record. However, I am rather on the side of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because the Government have very little to boast about, and almost all that there is of positive note is on the economic side, so his points about economic stability were fair, as I have always acknowledged.

As for basic economic growth over the past seven years, the British economy has averaged about 2.8 per cent. a year, a little above the average for the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. Some European countries such as Sweden and Spain are doing better, as is the United States, but we have a perfectly commendable growth rate which—there is no point denying the underlying facts—is the product of a combination of fortunate external circumstances and a favourable international economic environment. The Chancellor has also enjoyed a helpful inheritance, including liberalised labour and financial markets, which have contributed to low inflation. Another helpful factor is sensible economic management—notably monetary policy, the independence of which, we all now accept, was a good move.

The Chancellor began by focusing on fiscal policy, and I am happy to respond to the challenge that he threw down. He obviously finds it psychologically difficult to adjust to an environment in which the Liberal Democrats are more disciplined about public spending than he is, but we shall continue to argue the case for making tough choices in public spending. The Chancellor asked me to account for our spending proposals, but it would be useful if he could elaborate on the progress of the Gershon savings exercise. How will he report on that progress? It has never been clear how we would know whether the Gershon savings had been realised and there are some opaque memorandums flying around Whitehall on implementing the recommendations. Will the Chancellor therefore undertake to set out concretely how much money is being saved under the Gershon programme year by year? What progress, for example, is he making in reducing the number of procurement agencies? We need to evaluate those concrete steps to be sure that the Government are serious about making savings. Whatever their motivation, we need a proper monitoring mechanism.

On fiscal policy, the Chancellor will have to acknowledge over the next few days that there is a growing consensus that he has a problem in meeting his fiscal objectives. It is not a political point. The International Monetary Fund, the OECD, the Institute for Fiscal Studies and the National Institute of Economic and Social Research are not politically driven bodies, but they are all arguing that he faces that problem. It may not be a big problem quantitatively—£7 billion, £8 billion or £10 billion is a very large sum to most individuals, but in terms of the economy it is not a very large sum. That is the standard consensus projection of the extent to which the Chancellor will be adrift in respect of his fiscal policy objectives.

My concern is not the sum of money. Economically, it is not large and could easily be absorbed in the Government's overall borrowing requirements, since the debt position is comfortable. The issue is credibility—fundamental economic credibility. If the Government set tests, they should be able to meet them. The Government clearly understood from the outset that economic credibility was important. Indeed, this year the Nobel prize went to a couple of economists who spoke about the importance of economic credibility. Credibility was what lay behind the decision to establish the Monetary Policy Committee, and it has enhanced the credibility of interest rate setting enormously.

There is a problem, however, with the way the Government have approached fiscal policy. They set fiscal rules, which are broadly sensible, and more or less followed them, but there is a question about who decides whether those fiscal rules have been met. Will that be determined independently or by the Government? The golden rule is a highly technical area. Even for anoraks, it is a recondite subject. There are a couple of specific issues. First, who evaluates the assumptions that the Government make in their forward projections? At present, the Government invite the National Audit Office, on a restricted basis, to examine those assumptions and pass judgment on them. That is sensible, but the NAO does not have unrestricted access to evaluate the Government's assumptions, and it should.

The second aspect that is defective is who decides what the golden rule is and whether it has been met. That is a technical point but it is extremely important. Who decides when the cycle started and when it ends? That is a difficult question. In my private sector days, I was once set the problem by my company. If the company had known the answer, it would have saved a lot of money in investing in refineries and chemical plants.

Somebody must answer the question, and it should not be the Chancellor, but a genuinely independent body. That is why we argue that the National Audit Office should have an enhanced role—economically and technically, it has competent staff—to evaluate the full range of fiscal policy and give an independent judgment on which the Government can then base a credible fiscal policy. There is no party political advantage in arguing for such a structure. It would be in the Government's interest to have a fully credible fiscal policy, which they do not have at present.

Angela Eagle: As a former member of the Public Accounts Committee, I know that the NAO has to borrow civil servants to do its calculations. It would probably have to borrow civil servants from the Treasury to fulfil the role that the hon. Gentleman is setting out for it. Is he saying that there are civil servants in the Treasury who have been falsifying the figures, or that the credibility problem, as he calls it, is that people do not believe the figures because they come from the Treasury? What difference would it make to transfer people who currently do that work in the Treasury to do it at the NAO?

Dr. Cable: Nobody is suggesting that anybody is falsifying figures, but if the hon. Lady sat on the Public Accounts Committee, surely she understands the difference between a Government Department and a body that is directly accountable to Parliament. That is the fundamental distinction that gives the NAO credibility.

Mr. Letwin: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about this, as about the statistics. In a few weeks, we shall publish proposals and, I am glad to say, we shall probably have cross-party agreement. If we could just get the third party, Labour, to agree, we could have a credible system of fiscal discipline for the foreseeable future.

Dr. Cable: That was a helpful intervention and I shall bank it for future reference.

On the wider question of economic policy, we have discussed the rate of economic growth, which is respectable. It would help, though, if instead of looking back, we looked forward. Any honest assessment of the future must be based on the fact that the Government will face economic challenges that will make economic management much more difficult. Some of them are external and the Government have little control over them. It is still possible that we could be hit by a major oil shock. The Saudi Oil Minister was in London yesterday arguing that something of the order of $15 a barrel is still being paid, on account of the political risk arising from the war and enhanced terrorism risk in the middle east. The oil price could get a good deal worse, but it is not a factor that the Government can control.

A second challenge that is looming is the problem presented by the collapsing dollar. I could make the point that sterling is now higher than at any time since the days of black Monday, but it is not a domestic issue. It relates to the United States. The American currency is collapsing, at least in part because of fiscal irresponsibility caused by a tax-cutting agenda on which, I fear, we differ substantially from the Conservatives. It has had disastrous consequences in the US and it will have a major impact on this country.

We also have a home-grown problem, which is the problem associated with personal debt, and the linked problem of boom and bust in the housing market. Some revealing figures on personal debt were produced in the past couple of days. People who retire are facing mortgage repayments into retirement—40 per cent. of all mortgage holders face repayments into their retirement, which is twice the level 10 years ago. People are literally paying till they drop because of their mortgage liabilities.

On the position in the housing market, I have no views—it is not sensible for politicians to have a view on whether it is good for house prices to rise or fall. What is serious is that we have a boom-and-bust environment. Within the past few weeks, we have seen growing evidence of a very substantial collapse in lending and in equity withdrawal, which almost certainly, according to analysis by the Bank of England, will have major economic consequences. I do not raise the matter simply as a problem. It would be helpful if the Government thought through some of the steps that they could take to alleviate the problem. I shall make a few suggestions.

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): The Bank of England gave evidence to the Treasury Committee yesterday and did not concur in any way with the predictions that the hon. Gentleman is making. It gave no indication that it believed that boom and bust was about to occur.

Dr. Cable: The Bank of England quarterly bulletin is full of articles describing the difficulties in detail. Why has the Bank of England taken on the job of setting interest rates in relation to the housing market? As the Governor has made abundantly clear, he is alarmed at the possibilities that will arise. There are certain things that the Government could sensibly do to alleviate the problem.

The first is to ensure that we have a price index that reflects the housing market. At present we do not. I understand that the Treasury is working with EUROSTAT to establish a new index that will fully incorporate the price of housing. It would be helpful if the Government would say whether they intend to adopt it and when. That would enable the Bank of England to take house prices much more explicitly and clearly into account.

Another problem relates to credit insurance. One way of stopping hundreds of thousands of people facing the disasters that people experienced in the early 1990s would be to ensure that their mortgage payments and credit payments were insured. If the Chancellor had studied the problem and thought about it, he would know that the mortgage insurance market in this country is unsatisfactory. It is expensive and defective. I hope that he can take some initiative to ensure that the competition authorities look at it.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central) (Lab/Co-op): Can the hon. Gentleman explain how his party's policies on removing the UK's only property tax and increasing the tax rate on those who are generally paying for houses would help to bring about a more sensible housing market?

Dr. Cable: Analysis shows that it would make little difference. We would do that to introduce a much fairer tax system in which local taxation is related to people's ability to pay. One-off effects may occur as a result of removing a property tax, but in the long run it should make no difference to the problem that I am describing.

Long-term growth and the factors that drive it is the third issue that I want to raise. I sympathise with the views expressed by the Conservative spokesman about the Government's remarkable optimism that their intervention in promoting innovation and growth will produce consequences. One of the reasons I am sceptical about pouring large amounts of money into the Department of Trade and Industry, which does some useful things, is my extreme scepticism about the extent to which that can drive economic growth.

Scientific research is clearly a Government responsibility: the market will never do it, but it is clearly a public good. That is why I am in favour of, among other things, bee research, which the Chancellor and the Prime Minister found so surprising and amusing. Research is clearly desirable and the Government should fund it. It is, however, another thing to argue that private companies, many of which would invest anyway, should be subsidised to do so, when they can raise money in venture capital markets and from charitable bodies such as the Wellcome Trust. The market enables growing companies to function without large-scale funding from the DTI, and I am sceptical about the role that the Government are playing in driving economic growth.

The other area of scepticism relates to the complexity of Government regulation. The Chancellor has a view, with which I happen to disagree, that somehow or other the Government can fundamentally change how business behaves and operates. The classic example of that is the belief that the Government have invested in research and development tax credits. R and D tax credits are a superficially attractive idea—"R and D is a good thing. Let's give them a big tax credit to support it."

All the research done in the past two years shows that R and D tax credits have made no difference to the level of research and development, because most private companies were doing it anyway and the policy has a large associated dead-weight cost. I am not suggesting that we should simply stop that tax credit, but we must evaluate its consequences. The belief that tweaking the tax system and adding great complexity somehow or other changes business behaviour and increases investment, innovation and growth is fundamentally flawed.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he would keep the tax credit, despite the fact that he thinks that it does not work, or is he saying that he would get rid of it? Will he get on to other Liberal Democrat tax and spending plans, because some hon. Members are interested in hearing them?

Dr. Cable: As I have said, any sensible Government of any party would evaluate the effects of policy before rushing in to change them. The research and development tax credit is a good example—we need to be guided by experience. If it works, we would judge it more sympathetically.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is making a good point about the dangers of tinkering and meddling with the tax system, which the Chancellor is guilty of. Will he take one step further? Does he agree that tinkering and meddling not only fails to achieve end results, but distorts business behaviour, often in an unproductive way?

Dr. Cable: Yes. The hon. Gentleman is right. This morning, the Financial Times published a letter supplied by the Treasury, which makes the opposite point from the one that it was intended to make. It was published to highlight the horrors of tax avoidance and the iniquity of tax avoidance lawyers and states:

"As the government regularly changes the rules of the tax game, you need to be very vigilant. You have to check continuously to see you're still getting the best from your company".

That underlines the point that, if tax policy constantly changes, business behaviour is affected in order simply to skim the tax system.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has sought to disparage the R and D tax credit and has assumed that companies that receive it would have invested anyway and remained in Britain. However, the market in a number of areas is international, both for business and for tax and rewards. A number of companies have invested considerable sums in Canada, where Liberal Governments have provided the kind of R and D tax assistance that the hon. Gentleman disparages in the United Kingdom.

Dr. Cable: I was not disparaging the R and D tax credit; I am sceptical and await the evidence, which so far suggests that the share of R and D in GDP has been completely and totally unaffected by that generous tax credit. However, we shall wait to see the outcome.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): The Treasury Committee took evidence from AstraZeneca, Rolls-Royce and Microsoft, the representatives of which said that the R and D tax credit is one of the best initiatives.

Dr. Cable: If I were representing a company in front of the Treasury Committee, that is exactly what I would say. Why look a gift horse in the mouth? We have made the point that a good deal more clarity is needed about the benefits that derive from complex tax breaks, as opposed to a much simpler policy of moderate rates of business taxation.

My final point is rather different and relates to an issue, inequality, on which I probably share much more common ground with the Chancellor than do the Conservatives. One thing that has emerged from the statistics, which are somewhat unsatisfactory, is that, despite the Chancellor's undoubted commitment to that issue, income and wealth inequality in the UK are not very different—in some respects, they are even worse—than they were in the days of Mrs. Thatcher. There are several reasons why, some of which involve the workings of global markets, and some of which involve the workings of the tax system.

If we have a tax system in which the top 20 per cent. pay a lower percentage of their income than the bottom 20 per cent. of the population, it is clearly not working to alleviate the problems of inequality. A few months ago, a Labour Back Bencher tried to defend the highly regressive system of council tax. One of our criticisms of the possibly well-intentioned measures that the Chancellor has introduced on tax credits is that tax credits perversely aggravate the problem.

Ms Keeble: If the hon. Gentleman is in favour of increasing equality, why does his party oppose the new deal for lone parents, the pension credit and the child trust fund, which are three of the measures that do the most to help women and provide them with equality in modern Britain?

Dr. Cable: We have suggested that a better way in which to deal with the position of older pensioners would be to give them a decent, basic old age pension rather than a pension credit. One of the reasons for that, which we have debated extensively, is the fact that large numbers of pensioners do not claim pension credit. More seriously, those pensioners who claim face a very high marginal rate of tax—40 per cent. of them pay more than half their marginal income in tax as a result of benefit withdrawal. The system is so pernicious because it is a massive disincentive to save. It does not solve the problem of inequality.

In conclusion, the Chancellor has let it be known in the press over the past few days that he wants to present himself, his Government and his Budget with a flavour of Britishness. Economic policy will gain a patriotic element, which I appreciate because we all like to feel that we are patriotic rather than nationalistic. Under this Government, however, we have finished up with American levels of inequality, French levels of centralisation and, if the Home Secretary has his way, we will get Chinese levels of civil liberties.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Before I call the next speaker, I remind the House that Mr. Speaker has placed a 15-minute limit on all speeches by Back Benchers and that it applies from now on.

1.58 pm

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate the shadow Chancellor below the Gangway, the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), on a thoughtful speech. However, his political education would prosper if he read the minutes of the Treasury Committee on both the DTI—the regional development agencies say that it would be a disaster for them if it were taken away—and the R and D tax credit, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) said, is essential to attract large multinational companies in an international competitive environment.

This debate is an important opportunity to assess the state of the economy and the public finances, which the Treasury Committee will do over the next few weeks when the Chancellor gives his pre-Budget report and appears before the Committee.

The Committee is interested in two areas: first, the state of the economy and the prospects for growth; and, secondly, the state of the public finances. As we mentioned in our report last year on the autumn PBR, the IMF has stated that the UK's economic performance is enviable, but there are fresh challenges in relation to growth. As we know, the Monetary Policy Committee has raised interest rates on a number of occasions to the record rate of 4.75 per cent. Some would say that the housing market has gone off the boil, which would have implications for the economy. The risks to the UK economy are largely international, with oil prices at $50 a barrel or so, the implications of the USA's current account deficit for the global economy and the sluggish growth in European countries.

One of the issues that the Treasury Committee will consider with the Chancellor is how to improve productivity. That has been a centrepiece of the Treasury's aspirations, and it is a challenge to all European economies. When the Chancellor comes before us on 24 February to discuss regional productivity, we will refer to developing countries, the rate of progress of China and India, and how we rise to the challenge of ensuring that regional inequalities in this country are lessened.

Anne Picking (East Lothian) (Lab): On developing countries and how we try to marry up social justice and economic stability, is my right hon. Friend aware of the early-day motion in aid of Band Aid 20, in which we support the Band Aid single? The Chancellor has allowed the VAT on that single to be donated to the charity. Woolworths is donating all its proceeds from the single to the charity, and Asda phoned me this afternoon to say that it will do likewise.

Mr. McFall: I signed that EDM, and that is very welcome news. I have an Asda store in my local community, so first thing on Saturday morning I will be in there buying a Band Aid single. I congratulate Woolworths and Asda and ask other retailers to follow their example.

There are several sobering statistics for us as regards developing countries. Within 20 years, half the world's manufacturing exports could come from those countries. Already, China is exporting more than France, Italy and the United Kingdom. Indeed, Asia is exporting as much as the European area. We can learn a lot from what is happening in those countries in terms of the need for us to develop our skills in the knowledge economy. We pride ourselves on the information technology graduates who come out of our universities, but India and China are producing 125,000 computer science graduates compared with 5,000 in the UK. The question for us is how to embrace that change and get involved in it.

Currently, only 1 per cent. of UK exports go to India and China; we need to increase that proportion. In January, the Government are promoting the year of science in China—Lord Sainsbury is going out there—and in December there is a UK financial dialogue taking place with China. I welcome those steps. However, we need progressive policies on science and skills. As a chemistry graduate, I am very sad that Essex university is closing its chemistry department—[HON. MEMBERS: "Exeter."] I meant Exeter university. At a time when the number of science, technology and engineering university applications is falling, we need to do more to encourage those subjects.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman share our worry that unincorporated firms are specifically excluded from R and D support? That restraint is a particular concern for unincorporated enterprises that operate in universities. Has his Committee considered that, and if so what were its conclusions?

Mr. McFall: We took evidence from several vice-principals for a regional productivity report, and they made that point. We will examine that with the Chancellor when he comes before us, as it is a live issue.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this morning the Select Committee on Science and Technology took evidence from the Minister for Science and Innovation, Lord Sainsbury, and was told of a letter sent from the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, with whom they are trying to work? It is a serious matter that chemistry departments are being closed, not only in Exeter but across the country. The Government cannot have it both ways, because that is against the interests not only of academic research but of the long-term sustainability of British industry and competitiveness.

Mr. McFall: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. That is an important issue for the Chancellor, and we need a whole-Government response to it. The number of applicants is going down, and we have to tackle that if we want to challenge India and China and to work alongside them.

I want to say a few words about Europe. A couple of weeks ago, I attended the EU's budget committee for member states. Several issues arose, including that of the European budget itself. I asked what the EU's policy priorities were for 2005, making the point that good budgetary practice calls for reprioritisation when new needs arise and wondering whether certain of our activities should be reduced to make way for new ones. I did not receive very satisfactory responses. We know that the EU auditors have not signed off the books, so it is very important for the UK Government to look at the EU budget to ensure that it is spent wisely on the right things.

The EU needs to take action externally in two areas. First, despite the possibility of an accord in the Northern Ireland peace process very soon, it is still important that we contribute to the Peace 2 programme for peace and reconciliation in Northern Ireland. That requires €60 million, but the EU appears not to be providing that finance in its main budget. I ask Ministers to press the EU on that.

Secondly, whatever position we may take on Iraq, we must ensure that the finances are there to ensure, ultimately, a peaceful settlement. At the moment, the EU does not agree to the use of the flexibility instrument, which would allow €200 million of spending in Iraq. It is insisting that €190 million of required resources will have to be met through the use of the flexibility instrument. A lot of pressure needs to be put on the EU on that point, and I ask Ministers to take it up.

Several Members mentioned savings. The official Opposition, in particular, referred pejoratively to means-testing. Means-testing takes place daily through the Inland Revenue, which taxes every one of us according to our income. The question is whether pensioners are in need of extra money. The figures for Scotland show that 327,000 individuals—or 270,000 households—are in receipt of pension credit. The poorest third of Scottish pensioners are on average almost £1,900 a year better off. That is a good deal for our communities and for our local pensioners. I commend the Government for that initiative.

Mr. Bercow: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McFall: I believe that this will be taken off the time that I have, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I give way.

Mr. Bercow: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his characteristic generosity. In the light of his comments about means-tested benefits, and in view of his consistent and stoical support for his right hon. Friend the Chancellor, would he care to explain why the Chancellor told the Labour party conference that it was a key aspiration of his to bring about the day when the means test for our elderly people was abolished?

Mr. McFall: I think there is a case for that, but given our inheritance in 1997—there were too many poor pensioners—the short and medium-term objective is to ensure that they have a decent level of income. Once they have that, we can move on to consider how we provide in the longer term. I am glad that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman on that point.

There are 3.17 million people in Great Britain who receive pension credit. That is a great testimony to the Government and their initiative since 1997. I also note that the Government will spend an extra £10 billion on pensioners in 2004–05; £7 billion more than an earnings link would have provided. Some parties offer an earnings link for four, eight or six years, certainly not for eternity. The Government are right about the issue.

Adair Turner and his colleagues on the Pensions Commission have been examining whether it is worth saving for pensions. They found that the pension credit, through the savings credit, rewards pensioners aged 65 and over who have made modest provision throughout their lives. It is worth £14.70 a week to individuals and £19.20 to couples. That is a welcome development. Are there pensioners who may lose out? Yes. Is it worth while saving in today's environment? That is manifestly the case. The Turner commission and others made that point.

Withdrawal rates were mentioned earlier. Before 1997, pensioners faced a withdrawal rate of 100 per cent., with savings being matched to benefits, pound by pound. The new savings credit rewards people for saving and that is a progressive policy.

Three issues dominate the subject of financial services, to which the Treasury Committee has given a great deal of consideration in the past. First, a healthy financial services industry is crucial to the country. It is a £2 trillion industry, a major employer, a major provider of capital to United Kingdom companies and a major repository of savings for nearly every family in the country. Policy makers cannot allow the industry to fade away as several great United Kingdom industries faded away in the past.

Secondly, rightly or wrongly, there is a loss of trust in the industry, and customers have departed. Ron Sandler said in his testimony to the Treasury Committee that local supermarkets are now trusted more than major insurance institutions. We need to correct that.

Thirdly, major parts of the financial services industry have abandoned everyday, average Britain. In many ways, it is a middle-class pastime. We have not reached those people on lower incomes and poorer people to get them to save. The industry must take that on board. The other side of the industry—the credit card providers—is inundating us with promotions for cards, but that does not apply to the asset gatherers. They have complex products and expensive distribution channels. That needs to change.

I have held discussions with the industry in the past few weeks. Along with the industry, consumers, the Association of British Insurers, the Investment Managers Association and others, we hope to establish a forum for the industry and consumers to come together to examine issues that affect financial services and consider the future so that we can rebuild a healthy industry. That is one of the reasons why I welcome the consumer credit Bill. The Treasury Committee has been banging on about it for many months.

The need to tackle unfair credit agreements, for more regulation, to excise the crooks from the market, for a fairer regime for business and, overall, as the shadow Chancellor said, for a clearer and transparent market, is important. We need to implement the Bill before May 2005. That is an arbitrary date but it is important that the measure is implemented before then. I do not want us to resile from that commitment. I therefore ask Treasury Ministers and others to respond to that specific point.

I agree 100 per cent. with the Chancellor about better public services. However, my right hon. Friend knows that civil servants, especially lower paid civil servants, are concerned about the number of redundancies that have been announced. The Chancellor appeared before the Treasury Committee in July and I note that the Public and Commercial Services Union welcomed his statement in July. However, it makes the point that there should be an agreement between the Government, the unions and other civil service organisations about the steps that Departments should take to avoid compulsory redundancies. Time should be allowed for civil service-wide machinery to be put in place. It is incumbent on the Government to do that, given that most of the individuals who could be made redundant are the lower paid.

The policies that were announced in the Queen's Speech and today's debate ensure that we will rise to the long-term challenges that face the country. How do we implement the Lisbon agenda? How do we make Europe a more competitive environment? How do we continue to ensure UK economic growth and more employment in our communities? How do we ensure safer communities for our constituents and their families? If we can achieve those aims, we will have a better Britain and a more contented country. I wish the Government well in that but warn them that the Treasury Committee will examine the detail of the pre-Budget report to ensure that the Chancellor and his colleagues live up to their promises.

2.15 pm

Mr. Howard Flight (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): Tomorrow, one way or the other, I believe that we shall hear the Chancellor's last pre-Budget statement. Today, we have heard the Chancellor being, a little unwisely, as complacent and boastful as ever. If he, like me, had got on his bike in the past few weeks and visited the financial community, on which so much of our earnings for our imports depend, he would have found it increasingly concerned about the deterioration in our public finances.

If I may put it simply, our economy is close to full capacity. The norms of Government borrowing are: borrow when an economy is well below capacity to keep it afloat, but that it is sensible when an economy is at full capacity to be in balance or even in surplus. However, our borrowings this year approach £40 billion. We have an external current account deficit that is likely to be around £40 billion. That is not a balanced, well positioned economy. It is irrelevant whether the Chancellor fudges the figures to fulfil the golden rule because the position is the wrong way round. The golden rule makes sense over a cycle if one borrows when there is slack in the economy and moves into surplus when it is at full capacity. Doing it the other way round leaves matters positioned wrongly for the future.

Estimates of the black hole that would have to be filled by additional taxation if the Government were re-elected vary between £11 billion and £20 billion. The latest City estimates have continued to increase. Again, on the golden rule and the true underlying position, it is disappointing that the Chancellor had to resort to cooking the depreciation figures to squeeze another few billion pounds in his favour. As we all know, instead of treating the cumulative deficit on a numbers basis—adding the pluses and minuses—the Chancellor resorted to a bogus method of average in relation to gross national product, giving a figure that is not the actual monetary cumulative deficit over the cycle.

My right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) went through the wider issues that make it clear that the economy is no longer as well placed as it has been. We have dropped from fourth to eleventh in the world's competitiveness league. We have underperformed when compared with the other English-speaking economies, especially Ireland. Our productivity growth is a third down on what it was under the Conservative Government and below the EU average, when the Chancellor is perhaps among the most critical of EU economic performance.

The savings ratio is down not only because of the cycle; it has been down by a third on average in the past six or seven years. That presents considerable problems for pension accumulation and investment.

We still have a stock market, although the Government have done their best to wreck it. They appear to believe that long-term investment can be financed by cashing bonds. A sad disappointment may be encountered. This country's stock market has underperformed by 35 per cent. when compared with the United States and France. It has even underperformed by 10 per cent. when compared with Germany. I do not claim that the stock market constitutes a full measure of the position of an economy but it is ignored at peril. There are serious imbalances in the economy.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): Have the hon. Gentleman's City friends ventured an opinion on how the shadow Chancellor's figures stack up? He proposes tax cuts on top of spending cuts.

Mr. Flight: I am pleased to tell the hon. Gentleman that they understand perfectly well what we are saying and that they are surprised that neither the Chancellor nor Labour Members seem to understand. I shall summarise it very simply; perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be able to understand. We have set out our spending strategy, which, instead of the Government spending 42 per cent. of gross domestic product, will result in us getting the figure down to 40 per cent. over the period to 2008. The amounts have been set out bit by bit.

I and various colleagues set up the taxpayer value review in which 60 people under David James have considered each area of Government. It is not quite complete, but there will be savings significantly in excess of the Gershon savings. Now, let us take those two together. We have made it clear that in some areas additional spending will be needed—for example, in defence, and for our policies of choice in health and education—but the resulting overall position will clearly permit some scope to reduce taxation by a significant amount over the next period of government.

Mr. O'Neill: I appreciate that the James study has not been completed, but there must obviously be some overlap between Gershon and James. Can the hon. Gentleman give us any indication of its extent, because surely any additional money over and above James is all the Conservatives would have to offer as a tax cut?

Mr. Flight: Again, I am grateful for the intervention. First, there is the question of how much of both is cash for real and how much accounting entries. The hon. Gentleman will no doubt be aware that roughly half of Gershon is accounting entries, not for real. If he reads our announcements, he will see that we have got up to a figure of, if I recollect correctly, approximately £24 billion and covered about 70 per cent. of the territory. He can make his own estimates as to where we will get to in the fullness of time.

The second task is to consider how much of our work is cashable and how much is not. The answer is that the proportion that is truly cashable is substantially higher than Gershon. The James review has covered all the territories that Gershon has covered. There are a lot of territories that Gershon has not covered; I cannot understand why the Chancellor did not give the review a full brief to consider all areas. On the figures that are available to date and in respect of what I have just said, I trust the Chancellor understands that, in cashable terms, quite a significant margin will come through in excess of Gershon.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): As the hon. Gentleman is referring to the James report, can he confirm that its proposals are official Conservative party policy?

Mr. Flight: I thank the hon. Gentleman, but I think that is rather a strange question. The Conservative party has made it quite clear that the David James team is an independent body that is considering the whole public sector and will report back to the Conservative party, which will make its policies very clear when our election manifesto is set out. That is perfectly clear and straightforward.

The reality is that the Chancellor has presided over a rising tide of personal debt, but he has kept the figures looking good and created hundreds of thousands of public sector jobs, although only 100,000 of the total of 600,000 mean, as he has just said, more people in the front line—more doctors, more nurses and so forth.

What lies behind what has happened is the tale of the two Chancellors; I am sure Labour Members have read it. William Keegan wrote a superb book entitled "The Prudence of Mr. Gordon Brown", which I was asked to review earlier this year. Indeed, he set it out very clearly that the Chancellor, in his first three years in office, was deliberately prudent to seek to win the longer-term confidence of middle England and the financial community. Then, he embarked on a massive public spending splurge from 2000 onwards.

It is worth focusing on the macro figures and on the Office for National Statistics figures in relation to that public sector spending. By the end of this tax year, spending and taxation in cash terms will be up by about 60 per cent. Where has all that spending gone? Every citizen knows that they do not see improved delivery of anything like 60 per cent.—[Interruption.] If Labour Members would care to pause for thought, they would realise that the ONS figures show that approximately 80 per cent. of all that spending has been consumed by public sector inflation as the ONS defines it.

What is public sector inflation? It is a mixture of several things. It is basically higher pay for those working in the public sector and more people—another 600,000. When I was a student economist, I asked my teacher why people earned less in the public sector than in the private. He said that they had greater security of employment and better pensions. That seemed a fair balance to me, but the ONS now shows that, level by level, pay in the public sector is 20 per cent. higher than it is in the private sector. Indeed, many of my friends who work in the health service have made the point to me that the money is not getting through for additional facilities, but has come through in significant pay increases.

Again, we should consider the macro data. In 1997, public sector inflation was 1.6 per cent. It is now running at 10 per cent. We should consider the productivity data. The Government try to hide the figures, but productivity in the public sector has declined by 10 per cent. This is the overall story of failure to reform the public sector, failure to deliver, excessive regulation, excessive bureaucracy and more and more costs between money at the centre and getting it down to the delivery units.

As William Keegan's book points out, this was the Chancellor's great fear: that people would say, "You've spent all the money, but the delivery is not there. You've wasted it." So, the Chancellor set up his target regime. Alas, that was based on an entirely out of date concept that had not worked in the private sector in the 1970s and 1980s—management by objectives, setting targets from on high and dictating to the people working, rather than bringing them in and getting suggestions from the coal face on how to do things better.

We have heard little or nothing of the targets regime because, in the main, it has been a failure. Targets have not been met, they have distorted priorities, and they have greatly upset and demotivated people working in the public sector.

Last summer, I think, the European Central Bank commissioned a group to consider public sector spending in this country compared with that in other countries. It found that, compared with Japan and the United States of America, our public spending was enormously wasteful, citing a figure of 20 per cent. inefficiency. We were only slightly better than France and Germany.

Now, the ECB is hardly an organ of the Conservative party, but that is the magnitude of the inefficiency of our public sector. Indeed, that is why the Chancellor was eventually obliged to set up his own Gershon review, after we had started work on our review. I have already said quite a bit about that work in answering various questions, but I repeat the point that if the Chancellor wishes to understand what we are saying, rather than ranting a lot of, candidly, gibberish, he should consider what has been announced area by area in the David James review and what the shadow Chancellor said last spring about the spending plans. He will find that the figures add up perfectly logically.

Ms Keeble: I should have asked the hon. Gentleman this question earlier when he was talking about the James review. Which specific areas should the Chancellor have considered for spending cuts that were excluded from the Gershon review but included in the James review?

Mr. Flight: There are a large number of areas. As the hon. Lady will be aware, broadly, the approach of Gershon has been to say, "Here are areas where money can be saved, such as better procurement and pooling back offices and various other things. Now, civil servants, try to find 2.5 per cent. savings." I was contacted by a friend who has been seconded to the Home Office who said that people there said, "We have not even got proper financial accounts to know what we are spending and how, and how we can effect the economies." That is a measure of how unsatisfactorily our public sector is run.

Broadly, the James review has considered matters area by area, detail by detail; in only a few areas has Gershon done that. I suggest that the hon. Lady would get an answer to her question if she read the summary reports of the James review and noticed that Gershon has not covered any of that territory.

I want to move on to two other big areas, but the essence of the point—I am concerned about complacency and, candidly, and so is the City—is that everybody knows that this country cannot afford not to reduce tax and regulation. We face the challenge of Asia. Most service businesses can move elsewhere and this country has become considerably less competitive. Capital inflows are trailing off quite worryingly and those who come to Europe increasingly go to central Europe, not this country. Unless we make our economy a good deal more competitive, we will have a less promising future than the Chancellor seems to think he is presiding over.

I want to say a little about pensions. Having talked to members of trade unions, I can see that everyone knows that the one thing that the Chancellor has really messed up has been our pension savings. Earlier in the debate, the Chancellor referred to my comments about the British stock market having halved. He does not seem to understand that as a result, first, of the £5 billion removal of advance corporation tax credit, the stock market fell 20 per cent. further than it needed to have done, because stock markets bottom when dividend yields cross over gilt yields. Logically, had 20 per cent. of dividend yields not been removed, the stock market would have bottomed 25 per cent. higher than it did. The extent of the fall led to forced selling by pension schemes, life companies and individuals, and a fall of 50 per cent. has understandably destroyed investors' confidence. If citizens no longer have confidence in long-term equity saving, it will not be possible for the whole economy to move forward satisfactorily, as that is where the money comes from for real investments.

A stock market fall of that extent, to which I referred at the time, has had a disastrous effect on equity savings, leading to the unwillingness of people to save. So far this year, there have been net withdrawals from individual savings account schemes. What bigger measure can one have of the loss of equity confidence? Again, if people think that pension funds will be able to accumulate enough through investing in bonds and cash, another thought is coming to them. The only way in which a sufficient amount can be accumulated over the long term is through successful equity investment.

My real criticism is not just of the £5 billion per annum that the Chancellor has taken away, but of the knock-on effects, which have been enormously greater. Outstanding final salary schemes still have deficits of around £100 billion. Coincidentally, if a price-earnings multiple is applied to the £5 billion loss of income—a multiple of 20 is a fair average—that is equal to exactly the £100 billion that is missing. More than 10,000 schemes have gone into wind-up, affecting more than 300,000 individuals. As the National Association of Pension Funds has recently warned, three quarters of employers' final salary schemes are facing funding difficulties. As companies must put that money into their pension schemes, that reduces their profits, and as their profits are hit, faith in equity investment in this country is hit.

I say to the Chancellor that the voters of Britain—not just the financial community—understand what has happened and do not like it. They are well aware of the biggest single area in which he has failed seriously.

2.33 pm

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): I was very interested in the speech made by the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and his desire, reflected in the shadow Chancellor's remarks, to secure a more independent base for statistics. I only wish that the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) had provided us with some statistical justification or evidence for the assumptions on which he based so much of his arithmetic. Indeed, if one wanted to examine the reasons for the difficult performances in the pensions industry, one need only look at such a so-called specialist and the way in which he glibly manipulates figures to suit his own purposes, as many of us have thought that many of the people responsible for pension funds elsewhere have done in the past. Certainly, such slick arithmetic does not make any serious contribution to an issue that vexes many people and has perhaps created greater distrust in the City and in financial institutions.

It is for reasons of that nature that we find that the savings ratio is not what we would want it to be—people do not trust financial institutions, because of mis-selling, bad calculation and failure to take account of basic demography. Consequently, while there may be some lack of sympathy for the performance of this Government in relation to pensions, there is no substitution of sympathy with the Conservative party, as evidenced by its woeful showing in the opinion polls.

Mr. Flight: I am well aware of the issue of mistrust in financial institutions. As a bottom line measure, however, does not the hon. Gentleman accept that the fact that ISAs—although largely about individuals buying individual shares and doing their own thing, and not the same as pension saving—have gone negative demonstrates that people have lost confidence in equity investment? That is the most worrying point.

Mr. O'Neill: I am not sure exactly what percentage of ISAs are accounted for by equity investments, in so far as many people take them through building societies and just opt for tax-free interest on a very safe investment. The hon. Gentleman, by his question, has illustrated my point: the evidence that he provides is, to say the least, superficial. We have had a repeated statement from the Chancellor today that the savings ratio has increased by 6.2 per cent. this year. I will not duck the charge that the savings ratio has been disappointing, but it is improving. It may be that people are taking money out of one account and putting it into another, although that is not what I wanted to talk about today.

The Queen's Speech has an interesting symmetry, because the preoccupation in debates earlier in the week was security, but in some respects no kind of security comes home more quickly to people than economic and financial security. If we are to sustain the economic security that many of our people still enjoy, with many people, certainly in my constituency, in employment for the first time in many years and enjoying a degree of security that they have not experienced previously in their working lives, we must recognise that there is a sense in which any financial or economic advantage that the country has will of necessity be short-lived.

We talked earlier about investment in research and development, and there was some disparagement of R and D tax credits. It is not long ago, however, that I and others, including Opposition Members, were coming to exactly the same conclusion—that to encourage companies to invest in research and development, fiscal incentives were necessary. There could still be other kinds of financial incentives to encourage investment beyond R and D.

Let us face it: within British manufacturing, there is still gross under-investment per head. If there is any identifiable factor involved in the poor productivity that besets this country, that is it. In France and Germany, far more money is put behind each individual worker in manufacturing industry in the shape of newer and better kit. I have often argued that the engineering industry could benefit from that to a great extent, and certainly an engineering industry that is currently severely beleaguered because of the sad difficulties affecting part of the car industry, which historically has sourced its equipment from the west midlands and the industrial manufacturing areas of the country.

The critical point is that were we to see further deterioration in the predicament of MG Rover or the plight of Jaguar, or the failure to secure investment in another model at Peugeot in Coventry, the supply chain for the British motor industry as a whole could become endangered. In turn, that would make it less attractive, particularly for Japanese companies when making decisions on their next model.

Sadly, the cycle occurs every 18 months to two years. A supply chain is weakened and, having become less successful, is less attractive to potential investors from abroad in the models that we need to go on producing.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): As we would expect, the hon. Gentleman is presenting a very fair analysis of what is going on in the British industrial and manufacturing economy; but is he not opening up a dangerous line of argument? Is he not inviting us to give in to the idea that companies will invest in this country only if we bribe them with taxpayers' money? Surely we want them to invest in this country because it is the right place to be.

Mr. O'Neill: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, but it is not the point that I am trying to make. I am saying that the engineering supply chain for the motor car industry is currently fragile. We do not want to see a continuing deterioration in what might be regarded as the two UK bankers. Companies such as Jaguar are prestigious, and companies such as MG Rover still account for a large volume of orders, although perhaps not for a large volume of output, but many traditional manufacturing supply chain companies operating in this part of the world and the economy are fragile at present, and if they fell by the wayside Japanese companies would find inward investment less attractive.

Those companies do not necessarily need bribes any more, because we have a good labour force, good industrial relations and high productivity levels. We are confident that there will be demand for our product in the UK. However, they tend to operate on a "just in time" production basis. They need essential spare parts—widgets and so forth—to be close at hand: they need them yesterday, virtually. That becomes rather difficult if the supply chain extends to Budapest or Bratislava.

Mr. John Taylor (Solihull) (Con): Or China.

Mr. O'Neill: Perhaps China eventually. Anyway, I was making that point, not a point about assistance.

Nevertheless, assistance is important. Regional selective assistance is possible under European Union arrangements, although it is on a smaller scale than it was at one time. I understand that the Liberal Democrats in Cornwall and elsewhere in the west country believe that they can go to Europe and get more money because the budget in the area is being cut: that was suggested in a document from the west country that I saw yesterday. There is no magic wand, however, and RSA is nothing like the crutch that it once was.

Mr. Taylor: The hon. Gentleman has visited most of the motor industry so far in his excellent speech, including Peugeot, Jaguar and Longbridge, which makes very difficult reading in the business pages nowadays. However, he has not mentioned another important west midlands motor manufacturer—Land Rover, in my constituency, which is critical to the many surrounding industries that supply it. Will he comment on Land Rover? I shall be content if he merely wishes it well.

Mr. O'Neill: I think that the Ford PAG group, of which Jaguar, Land Rover and Volvo are all part, is vital to the high-quality end of British car manufacturing. We all want those companies to succeed, and I think we are confident that they can. The difficulty, especially in Jaguar's case, is short-term, and we hope that it can be solved. Sometimes when we start discussing the prospects of companies here, we draw attention to them in ways that may not be intended.

Let me take up a point that was made earlier. The Government should realise that if we are to have a research and development-led industry and promote the transfer of technology from the university laboratory to the workshop and larger areas of production, we must be sensitive to the plight of the unincorporated bodies that universities have created. That is an example of the law of unintended consequences, and I shall be very disappointed if the Chancellor does not find a way of dealing with it constructively and sympathetically. It may not be appropriate for him to refer to it tomorrow, but he could do so in his Budget speech, and it could be addressed in the Finance Bill. It should be recognised that it is through investment in science in the United Kingdom that we shall secure continuing development of science-based industry.

We keep talking about India and China in debates of this kind, but they are not necessarily the same. India has been able to invest in its fantastic output of graduates and in the Bangalore information technology areas, to provide world leadership, and to make a far more significant economic contribution than is represented by a couple of hundred thousand jobs in call centres. Apart from outsourcing and those call centre jobs, there are 200 million people in India who would be classified as middle-class. They are potential consumers of many of our goods and services—financial services, Burberry raincoats and scarves, Johnny Walker Black Label and all the luxury products that so many of our businesses should be getting out there and selling.

Many of our ambassadors should recognise that they are there not just to outsource but to outsell those in other parts of the world. Conservatism, with a small "c", and protectionism feature in the thinking of too many of our people.

[Mr. O'Neill]

China is a slightly different matter. It is self-evident that Taiwan, the offshore part of China, has turned its back on the type of manufacturing for which it was famed in the 1950s, 60s, 70s and 80s. It is now the largest single inward investor in mainland China. Its kit is being produced in China and is returning to Taipei and the surrounding area, where only the widgets are added. China may be a workshop, but in Beijing and Shanghai it can be seen that there is a demand for consumer goods. It may not extend much beyond those cities at present, but it will do so at a great rate; and if we are not there selling those goods, you can bet your bottom dollar that the Italians, the Germans and others will be. We must organise a much more concerted push to sell our luxury products.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): And our Jaguar cars.

Mr. O'Neill: Yes, those as well. One of the frustrating aspects of visiting China is that if you are going to get knocked over, it is a pound to a penny that you will be knocked over by a Volkswagen. Volkswagen has cornered the market there to a fantastic extent.

We must take advantage of this opportunity. Our country has many of the most attractive features for inward investment. We have a stable labour market, flexibility and high productivity among those employed by inward investors. The Government's economic legacy has enabled us to build on many of those attractions, but if we are to secure the future of the economic success that we have achieved we cannot just depend on the ability of Britain, as currently constituted, to attract investment from within and create the research and development that we need. We must have inward investment as well: there must be a balance.

Those who seek to make economies by doing away with this or that Department should bear it in mind that the civil service and public bodies will be required for many of the functions to which I have referred. Some Liberal Democrats may well want to get rid of the Department of Trade and Industry; but do they want to get rid of the offshore supplies office in Aberdeen, which serves the North sea industry? Do they want to get rid of the expertise of the Department responsible for energy? If they do, there might well be serious consequences—[Interruption.] Oh, they want to get rid of everything but that.

As a Scotsman interested in energy matters, I should point out that such issues are easy game. Across the country as a whole, every one of the bleeding-heart Liberal Democrats who wants to appear liberal would indulge in special pleading for the little niche that is for ever theirs. They may say, "But you couldn't do away with that," but which bits could we do away with? Which bits do they not like too much? Which bits are concentrated only in Tory or Labour seats, or in Victoria street? [Interruption.] They do not like it when the cheap shots are aimed back at them. The truth is that many of us believe that if we are to reform the machinery of government, it is industries such as the hospitality industry that should be reformed. It should be dealt with by a department of enterprise and industry, rather than by the Department that looks after museums and castles.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Perhaps it is appropriate that I should be called after that little diatribe. I should tell the hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) that we Liberal Democrats certainly do not regard energy as a niche market. We have consistently argued—the point is made in our published policy papers—that energy should be dealt with by a department of energy, environment and transport. If we are to meet our Kyoto objectives, it is logical that all the factors that cause emissions be dealt with together, rather than being split among several Departments. I hope that that illustrates that the essence of what we are trying to do is to simplify government, reduce the number of Departments and operate more efficiently.

We believe that it is inefficient for the Government, through the Department of Trade and Industry, to engage with industry by trying to second-guess the market and use taxpayers' money to induce businesses to take decisions that they would take anyway—in which case, the money has been wasted—or to take short-term decisions in order to qualify for tax incentives that do not stick in the long term. There is plenty of evidence to show that in many cases companies are happy to take the money, but that they take a different decision when the money runs out. We are talking about substantial sums, and we have set out the figures in our existing policy documents. We will publish in more detail the logical consistency of our proposals.

I am very happy to debate this issue with the hon. Member for Ochil, and let us be clear: there can be an honest difference of opinion about the proper role of Government in business and industry. In our view, that role is to make life simpler and less regulated, to simplify the tax system and to enable businesses to get on with the job that they do best: running themselves, rather than having to engage too much with civil servants, and having bureaucracies tell them how to run their affairs.

I want to address one or two issues that are of concern to my constituents, as well as other aspects of economic policy. As a Scottish Member of this Parliament, I hope that in the coming years we will develop greater co-operation between Scottish MPs and the Scottish Parliament. Like every Member of this House, I am very worried about the GP out-of-hours service. This issue is relevant to today's debate because it shows there is a crossover in respect of what this Parliament does and what the devolved Parliaments do. Health is a devolved matter, but of course the reality is that the change in the out-of-hours contract was determined by negotiation across the UK. The fact that GPs no longer wish to work such hours might be a reasonable proposition, but it causes difficulties across the piece. UK Ministers need to work with the devolved Assemblies to ensure that we train enough doctors and consultants to cover the service and fill the gaps. I hope that we can do so in future.

I am also concerned about transport. Two of the transport Bills proposed in the Queen's Speech have implications for my constituents, and we need to know the reality of the situation. Are we getting a significant devolution of strategic decision making to Scotland, or does such legislation constitute an abdication of responsibility for those living north of the border? That issue needs to be clarified.

My constituents were incensed when the Strategic Rail Authority said that it would no longer support the upgrading of the service between Aberdeen and Inverness because of the unexpectedly high and over-budget cost of upgrading the west coast main line. That service runs from London to Glasgow—in other words, it terminates 140 miles from Aberdeen. Although it may be of some benefit to my constituents, most of the traffic between Aberdeen and London is on the east coast main line. It is therefore frustrating to be told that the upgrading of a line that does not directly serve my constituents is being used to justify the cancelling of promised investment.

If the devolution of funding to the Scottish Parliament enables the reinstating of such investment, that would be welcome. If, on the other hand, it means that the UK Government are simply abdicating their responsibility for strategic decisions on rail matters affecting my constituents, that is another matter altogether. I was not encouraged on hearing the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), say that for franchising purposes the east coast main line runs from London to Aberdeen but that for investment purposes it runs from London to Edinburgh. That makes it clear that there is no commitment to strategic investment in that line, even though it is the main line between Edinburgh and Aberdeen.

It takes nearly as long to get from Aberdeen to Edinburgh as it does to get from Edinburgh to London, despite the fact that the distance involved is little more than 100 miles. If there is to be a strategic decision, it should ensure that remoter parts of the country have access to fast transport, especially given the argument that too many people are flying internally in the UK when they could be taking the train. I would like to agree, but I can assure hon. Members that, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine (Sir Robert Smith) will confirm, it would be impossible for me to carry out my duties as a constituency Member and to serve in this House if I relied on the rail service. I have no option but to fly, which is regrettable, given the need to address such issues and their long-term environmental consequences.

I have a constituency interest in energy, an issue to which the hon. Member for Ochil referred, but in this debate I want to link together national and constituency concerns. In some respects, the recent increase in gas and electricity prices is entirely understandable, but in others it cannot be easily explained, and it does not seem to demonstrate the efficient functioning of the market. Those of us who monitor the industry know that many long-term gas contracts have come to an end, at a time when oil prices have been rising sharply. That has become an excuse and created a market gap, which has led to an increase in gas prices, but that does not explain why UK producers are exporting gas to the continent, where prices are lower, rather than supplying the domestic market, where prices are higher—unless there is another, perhaps ulterior motive relating to the long-term control of market supply.

I have pointed out that we Liberal Democrats are concerned about the fact that this country's emissions are increasing, despite our obligations and commitments under Kyoto. I do not regard rising energy prices as inherently bad, given that such increases probably encourage the more efficient and environmentally sound use of energy. We nevertheless have to accept that if they jeopardise businesses and increase fuel poverty before the mechanisms to deal with such poverty have come into play, genuine concerns will be expressed in all constituencies, including mine.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): The Government will soon take over the presidency of the EU. Is it not also an important time for them to work out how to force the rest of Europe to recognise that the liberalisation of the energy and gas markets must be carried out across the whole of Europe? It is important to realise the distorting effects caused by the liberalisation of our market and its being attached to a market that is still under the firm control of the big suppliers.

Malcolm Bruce: The Conservatives may not like the implications, but the reality is that a Europewide energy market, if it is open and transparent, would be to our benefit. Our concern is that liberalisation is not proceeding fast enough.

I have written to the new Energy Commissioner, asking him to look further into that, as well as to the Secretary of State. I have been criticised by some people who claim that what I am saying implies a dislike of markets. I favour markets and market solutions, but there is something not quite right about this market at the moment. It has been a matter of concern to me that gas prices should automatically be determined by oil prices rather than by the actual costs of production and the fact that the market is not always the same.

I spoke a week or so ago at the annual conference of the Combined Heat and Power Association, which may not be at the top of people's agenda as the best place to speak. I have to say that I have not seen a more depressed looking audience for quite some time—and that was before I spoke. The serious point is that several billion pounds of significant investment, which could create many thousands of jobs—I already know of more than one Conservative early-day motion on the subject—are currently frozen. Those funds could genuinely help us to improve industrial investment, employment and our commitment to reducing emissions.

In the past few weeks, I have had interesting meetings with a significant number of businesses in my constituency, and many specifically welcomed the consequences of EU enlargement, not least in giving them access to good-quality, hard-working labour, which has helped them meet the significant shortages that they were experiencing until recently. One enterprise in the tourism sector had employed a substantial number of Slovakian young women in an enterprising leisure facility. Those girls had come here for two fundamental reasons: to learn English, which they view as an international language that will improve their skills; and to gain more productive and better paid work experience than they could gain in Slovakia. It is important to understand that that is of real benefit.

Prior to enlargement, this business found it extremely difficult to get exactly the sort of labour that it required and is now delighted with the quality of staff that it has been able to recruit.

I fear that debates on immigration are sometimes conducted in the House in a way that fails to emphasise the significant benefits that can accrue. It may be of interest to the House to know that the city of Aberdeen has specifically said that it believes that its economic future depends on recruiting a substantial number of the work force from the new accession countries. It has taken a positive step to promote the virtues of living and working in Aberdeen to those people. It will help the economy to be dynamic rather than run the risk of having to export jobs to where the people are. We often lose sight of that fact, which is a consequence of not being able to recruit labour here in the UK. I have heard that general complaint from many businesses in my constituency.

I mention in passing that, as a member of the plenary assembly of the Council of Europe, the UK delegation will debate in January next year the issue of trafficking from the borders of the EU, and the Balkans in particular. I believe that trafficking is too kind a word. We are talking about slavery, and people being sold, often by their families, into slavery. The exploitation of these people is vicious, and some of our more draconian immigration laws make it harder for them to break out of it. We must make it clear to people that if they have been brought here by force, they can appeal. The fear is that if they make themselves known to the authorities, they will be immediately deported without help or subsistence, so we must show that we have some sort of compassionate rescue mission to deliver people back safely to their families under terms and conditions that will prevent them from being exploited in that way again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) made a passing reference to the British trade position, the exchange rate and the consequences of American policies. One general problem with US domestic policies is that they seem to constitute the worst excesses of left and right-wing ideologies brought together in one regime.

Rob Marris: That sounds like your party.

Malcolm Bruce: I would argue, in defence of my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham and my own record when I was in the same post, that it is precisely not like our party, because we cost our proposals and try to demonstrate, even though it opens us up to pretty strenuous debate, how we would pay for our policies. We say what taxes we would or would not alter. What has happened in the US is that the public deficit has gone through the roof and tax cuts have been implemented that are clearly not sustainable. Yet as long as the rest of the world is prepared to support that by accepting devalued dollars, we cannot really blame the American Administration for taking advantage of it.

I would say to the Chancellor that one of the disadvantages stemming from having our own currency is the fact that it is not a very important currency. It certainly does not play influentially in the markets in the way that the euro currently does. There may well be an argument, as Mr. Anatole Kaletsky suggested, for the eurozone to cut interest rates in order to put inverse pressure on the dollar and perhaps also help stimulate the European economies to perform rather better.

Having attended the breakfast that the Chancellor provided for board members of Britain in Europe a couple of weeks ago, I know that he stressed the importance of the transatlantic relationship. Although I have been critical of the Bush Administration, I also support the transatlantic alliance as part of the UK's position in the world. If we have a special relationship with the US, however, it is important for the Americans to know that we also have a dimension of European co-operation and solidarity that is important to us. We should also expect Americans to take some responsibility for conducting themselves in a reasonable fashion in the world or to expect the consequences if they fail to do so.

I make no apology for mixing in some important constituency issues put to me in recent months. Indeed, debates on the Queen's Speech provide an excellent opportunity to do so. I have considerable scepticism about a Government who announce 32 Bills or draft Bills in any Queen's Speech, especially in a programme that everyone expects to be interrupted before half the Session is completed. We should acknowledge that much of the Queen's Speech is not a serious programme of legislation but a shopping list for a general election. It is frustrating to find, in seeking clarification from Departments as to which Bills will be introduced and when, that the answers become heavily caged according to political expediency.

In the few seconds left to me, I want to say that the one Bill that I am assured is likely to be introduced before Christmas is the consumer credit Bill. If that is the case, I welcome it, but I hope that the Government realise that we are talking not just about loan sharks but about shameful practices being pursued by high street banks—the biggest banks in the country—to push people into using credit and to sell them products that are much more expensive than they need be. Those banks are happy to take the excess profits that result. The legislation must deal with that problem. We should also recognise that door-to-door cash collection is not always against the interests of people on low incomes. It sometimes helps them to manage their credit, so we should not legislate that out of existence and open the way for the criminals who would inevitably step in.

This is a rag-bag of a Queen's Speech. It is really an election propaganda message, so I hope that hon. Members will support our amendment.

3.9 pm

Denzil Davies (Llanelli) (Lab): It is only right and proper for the Chancellor to remind the House of his and the Government's fine record of economic stewardship over the past seven years. It compares more than favourably with most, if not all, western European countries and the Government deserve credit for it. We do not always acknowledge the external pressures of globalisation on western economies. I do not believe that our Government, western Governments or even fashionable opinion have begun to engage with the consequences—social, foreign policy and economic consequences—of globalisation, despite the fact that countries such as China now dominate large sections of world trade.

Many hon. Members have always been concerned, rightly, about the effect of globalisation and the dominant influence of multinational companies on the poorest developing countries. On the other side of the argument are those who worship at the shrine of the free market and free trade, who see no adverse consequences to globalisation and brook no criticism of it. Indeed, the Director-General of the CBI appears to have been one of that cult's high priests in recent years. I read in the newspapers some extraordinary comments from him—perhaps he was not correctly reported—about the outsourcing of employment from Britain to places such as Bangladesh and India. He seemed to favour that and to want to see more of it. I do not think that he fully realises the consequences, but I await with interest an announcement in the near future that the bureaucracy of the CBI will be transferred to Bangladesh or Bangalore.

The anti-globalisation protestors and the pro-globalisation zealots display a lack of awareness that the pressure of globalisation is felt most by western countries. Western capitalism cannot cope with global capitalism. Countries such as China appear to be able to do capitalism with greater energy and ability than countries of the west, particularly the United States of America. We have heard about the balance of payments deficits in the US, but it arises in the main from trade with China, perhaps because of the traditional links that have always existed between the two countries. The devaluation of the dollar against the euro, which is no doubt happening as we speak, will not help the US very much with the massive balance of payments deficit it has with Asian countries, especially China. As we all know, the Chinese currency, the renminbi, is linked to the dollar, so as the dollar goes down, so does the renminbi. That is what is happening at the moment.

There is pressure on the Chinese to revalue their currency. They might or might not do so, but they will do so only if they believe that it is in their long-term trading interests.

Angela Eagle: Does my right hon. Friend have a view on the unprecedented situation in respect of global monetary structures? The Asian currencies are pegged to the dollar and other western currencies are floating—a hybrid system unlike any that we have experienced before. The globally dominant currency, the dollar, is experiencing pressure. Does he have any views on what might happen?

Denzil Davies: I do not know how it will unwind. There have been calls for China to be brought increasingly among the main economic nations, but the Chinese will probably go their own way and make their own decisions in their long-term trading and security interests.

The pressures on the US are considerable. An American think-tank recently looked at the prices of products in the US and in China. Prices in China were 30 to 50 per cent. below the cost of production of similar or identical products in the US. Such pressure cannot continue without destroying a country's industrial and economic base. It will mean a massive transfer of wealth from the US, which is already happening, and ultimately from the countries of western Europe to China and other Asian countries.

The European Union used to believe that it was immune from such pressures. Those of us who have sat through many debates on the EU remember that it was said that one of the reasons for its formation was that it could be ring-fenced. The common agricultural policy was a manifestation of that thinking. The countries of the EU, it was believed, could trade with each other and would not need to trade with anyone else. However, that world is going or has gone. Apparently, 10 years ago the EU had a surplus on its trading account with the countries of Asia and China. It now has a deficit of $10 billion, and that is with a low rate of European growth. The EU is not capable of withstanding the pressures that we will see from China and other Asian countries.

The problem is not only the balance of payments, but costs, wages and profits. The pressure on wages is now considerable. Last month, the average yearly increase in wages was 3.7 per cent., which is well below the Bank of England's 4.5 per cent. figure used in analysis of inflation and other factors. The minimum wage of £4.85 is fine, but my impression is that wages, certainly in the manufacturing sector, are gradually being driven down towards £4.85. That figure is seen as a respectable amount, so the pressure driving wages down is considerable. Of course, that has implications for the Chancellor. He subsidises wages through the working tax credit, and the cost of that subsidy will probably increase.

If costs cannot be reduced and prices cannot be increased, companies' profits will be affected. If profits do not go up, investment cannot be made. What about the effect on tax yields? No one has studied the effect of globalisation on tax yields, but if wages are driven down, yields from income tax will fall, unless more people can find work. Indeed, the Chancellor's estimate of revenue from income tax fell short. VAT is a tax on prices. If the price of imported goods falls, and the price of domestically created goods falls in competition, the VAT yield will be reduced. Perhaps that can be made up by VAT on services or in other ways, but the fact remains that globalisation pushes down wages, costs and prices. If it pushes down profits, the yield from corporation tax will also fall. Governments may have to look at ways of raising money from taxation other than the main taxes of income tax, VAT and corporation tax, because of the effect of globalisation.

In many ways, globalisation has had a benign effect on inflation. Prices have been driven down. The high inflation of the 1980s has gone, mainly because of competitive global pressures. Japan still has zero interest rates, because some people are now more worried about deflation than inflation. Alan Greenspan in the US was so worried about deflation that he reduced American interest rates to almost 1 per cent., although they have now gone up by a few quarters of a percentage point.

Our central bankers still try to claim the credit for reducing inflation. We have heard again today how wonderful the Bank of England is, and I bow at the shrine, albeit a little reluctantly. We have heard how wonderful it has been in keeping down inflation, but that is putting the cart before the horse. It is international competition that has pushed down prices. The governors of central banks, who are usually behind the curve, follow that by reducing interest rates. I accept that that is not a fashionable view, but I believe it is a better explanation.

The trouble is that those central bankers keep looking for inflation everywhere; they are a bit like generals who cannot find an enemy. For central bankers, the reds are still under the bed, and they are inflation. The Bank of England looks for inflation all over the place. I do not know how an interest rate of 4.7 per cent. can be justified when the consumer price index, flawed as it may be, is only, as the Chancellor told us, 1.2 per cent. It was a mistake for the Bank to raise interest rates on the last few occasions so that the rate is now 4.7 per cent. The signals coming from the Bank are extremely confusing, almost as confused as the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development report about which I read in the newspaper today.

We cannot wish away globalisation. Some of the effects have been benign and beneficial, as I have tried to point out, but there is a danger when a huge country such as China begins to dominate world trade in goods and can make such inroads into the productive capacity of western countries. We have to consider whether we can bear the substantial transfer of wealth from western countries to such countries, as the effects on standards of living, taxation yields and public expenditure will be considerable. The time is past when globalisation can be viewed merely as a consequence of free trade and countries such as China can be described as trading partners rather than as competitors. That type of imbalance makes a mockery of Ricardo's economic tenet that trade is good for all, because each country can export the products that it is good at making. That is no longer the case when a country such as China could completely dominate world trade.

It will not be easy to try to alleviate the consequences of globalisation and to stem the seepage of wealth from western economies, but we should at least recognise that there is a problem and that it cannot simply be left to the free market. Governments, whether of the left or the right, will have to interfere again to protect their economies, industries and societies from the pressure from free trade and globalisation. Once we acknowledge that there is a problem, perhaps we can find ways of countering it.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I am delighted to have this opportunity to contribute to an important part of the Queen's Speech: the economic affairs that underscore the country's wealth and prosperity.

I want to turn from the broad landscape of the global picture of economic affairs to something more local but just as important—the concerns of small businesses and the self-employed. I do so both as someone who was self-employed for more than 10 years before I became a Member and as honorary treasurer of the all-party small business group. I am especially pleased that it is the largest all-party group and I hope that that reflects the genuine interest and concern of all Members in the importance of small enterprises.

There are 3.8 million small businesses in the UK and 3.6 million people are self-employed. Those distinct but overlapping groups represent the backbone of our economy. After all, they employ more than half the private sector work force and they generate much of the wealth that enables us to afford the public services that we debate in this place. They are also often the most entrepreneurial and innovative enterprises in our economy.

There is an additional reason why I believe that small enterprises matter; indeed, it is one of the reasons that I joined the Conservative party. Family businesses—the self-employed and small enterprises—send out a clear message that no matter what someone's background is, whatever the colour of their skin, whatever their race or creed, if they have the ambition, the ability and the will to work they can be their own boss and make their own way in the world. That is a very powerful reason for us to consider the role of small businesses—not only in the context of the economic debate that we are holding today, but because those businesses reach beyond mere economics.

As a former freelancer, and having met many of the small business organisations in my constituency, it is clear to me that entrepreneurs are struggling. They tell me that they are struggling for two main reasons: the burden of regulation and the burden of the tax system. It is evident that both the volume and scope of regulation has worsened over the past seven years. We know that there are 15 new regulations every working day—a 53 per cent. increase since 1997. In absolute terms, the number is between 3,500 and 4,000 in any one year.

I am well aware that many of the regulations come from Brussels, but the majority still come from Whitehall. It is fair to say that Whitehall manages—extraordinarily—to make EU regulations even worse than they might otherwise be, but nevertheless regulations, and their burden, matter. They matter not simply as a debating point—in the jousting between the Opposition and the Government in this place—but because, no matter what their worthy aims may be, the costs of complying with regulations and of administering them actually count for businesses. Let me give a short example: the working families tax credit—apparently worthy in its aim, whatever one may think of its merits as a system—costs business £105 million every year to administer. That is a significant amount for business to take on, and it is but one measure. I know that it is a favourite of the Chancellor's, and given that tomorrow's will, I hope, be his last pre-Budget report, I hope that this measure will go with him. When the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions replies to the debate perhaps he will enlighten us on what I am sure the Government will wish to claim is their radical—nay, modernising—agenda to seek to reduce this burden. I look forward to his eloquence on that point.

Rob Marris rose—

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Prisk: I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow).

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way because he is truly rivalling Cicero and Demosthenes in terms of the eloquence with which he is addressing the House. In the light of his philosophical points, may I put it to my hon. Friend that he should endorse the words of the late and great Winston Churchill, who famously said:

"The . . . vice of capitalism is the uneven division of blessings, while the . . . virtue of socialism is the equal division of misery"?

Mr. Prisk: Far be it from me to seek to compete with Cicero, but my hon. Friend has made his point well and I have no doubt that when it comes to awards, the one for the most sincere impression of Cicero will go to him, not to me.

Brian Cotter (Weston-super-Mare) (LD): What tangible proposals does the hon. Gentleman have to reduce regulations? We all agree that this is a very big problem; will he give us a flavour of what he feels we should do about it?

Mr. Prisk: It is always dangerous to try to answer such interventions in full, but I try to do so. In this case, let me simply say that I shall be touching on one measure in a moment, but first let me give another example of regulation—the ridiculous six-step, three-formula rule on abnormal rents, which Labour Members pushed through and which will have a punitive effect on business leases. I shall enlighten the House on other measures later.

I have talked about the costs of complying both in time and money, but another problem with regulation is that it restrains enterprises; it restricts their ability to compete in the international world. I am not afraid of the international world, and neither, I am sure, is the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies), but as the burden of regulation has increased this nation's ability to compete has declined. We have moved from the fourth most competitive nation in the world to the eleventh in just seven years, and that is a very disappointing trend.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the working families tax credit and its £105 million cost per year, which he saw as a burden on business. Is he aware that research from the Department for Work and Pensions shows that almost 90 per cent. of employers have no problem whatever with administering that tax credit?

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) highlighted the change that will happen, but if the hon. Gentleman were to talk to businesses in Wolverhampton he would find a very different picture from that portrayed in the Government statistics that happily spew out of Whitehall. Indeed, I have found that, for many small entrepreneurs, the problem is one of time. The Federation of Small Businesses found that the average time involved in dealing with the cumulative impact of regulations is now over 28 hours a working month. Many of those present will realise what an impact on family time that clearly has on many small businesses, and it is an unsustainable burden. That is why more and more of what I would describe as the serial entrepreneurs—the people who create and recreate enterprises—the people whom we want to keep, are retiring or selling up. That is a significant drain on the skills and the ambition that this country can ill afford to lose.

Over the past seven years, the tax system, as part of the regulatory burden, has become hideously complex. I am delighted that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has joined us, albeit briefly. He will recall that this year's Finance Bill contained 310 clauses and more than 500 pages of new tax rules and regulations.

Rob Marris: Lovely.

Mr. Prisk: Labour Members might regard that as lovely, but I suspect that their view is not shared by their taxpaying voters. It is a symptom of a Chancellor who, frankly, cannot help meddling, interfering and tinkering. Every year we have a raft of new rates, thresholds and rules. Let me, if I may, offer a classic example that directly affects small businesses.

In 2002, the Chancellor introduced a zero rate of corporation tax on the first £10,000 of profits—apparently a very good idea, although the Government had not looked at it carefully. Of course it created a significant tax advantage for small firms to incorporate. Indeed, as I recall, the Paymaster General told us that this was a gift horse, which small businesses should not look at in the mouth. That was the exact quote; I apologise for the English. However, the result, of which the Government had been warned, was a massive 43 per cent. increase in incorporations in the first 12 months. That was far more than the Government had expected, so suddenly they realised that they were losing more than £1 billion, as I understand it, in tax revenue that they had not accounted for. Suddenly, we were warned by the Paymaster General that this was not a gift horse but a tax avoidance scheme—what a farce! To compound the error, they have proceeded not to reverse the policy and admit their own error but instead to add a further change with a 19 per cent. non-corporate distribution tax rate, to try to recoup the loss. Therefore small businesses have in three years seen four changes on different rates, which directly impact on their profitability. That is a measure of the tinkering and meddling of this Chancellor.

Mr. Plaskitt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prisk: No, I am sorry but I am short of time.

We also had the farce of the IR35 regulations on the self-employed. That is a crude attack on freelancers and the self-employed. The regulations create barriers to work, especially in information technology. Even worse than that, however, despite being warned at the start that they would cost the Government £900 million and that they must act immediately, we discover three years on that, of the 500 cases that the Inland Revenue brought to challenge that apparently pernicious threat, it has won fewer than two—a woeful record. It has created enormous uncertainty for thousands of entrepreneurs and enormous legal bills for taxpayers.

In conclusion, small businesses do not want the Chancellor interfering and meddling. They want smaller government. They are fed up with being unpaid tax collectors and unpaid benefit officers for the benefit of the Government. They want fewer, not better, regulations. Above all, small businesses want to know where they stand.

Mr. Plaskitt: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Prisk: No.

Mr. Bercow: This is the peroration.

Mr. Prisk: It is a long peroration, so hon. Members must be patient.

Small businesses need a tax system that is not more complex, constantly changing and something that they can never trust. They need a tax system that is simpler, fairer and lower. Frankly, this Labour Government have failed to deliver for small businesses. They talk positively about deregulation, yet they pass more regulations. They talk warmly about tax reform, yet what have they done? Each year, they have passed a record-sized Finance Bill, with more rules, regulations and statutory instruments. That is the truth and the evidence of their record.

Despite the talk, the result of all that is that when I talk to small business organisations—I am sure the same thing happens when many of my colleagues speak to them—I discover that they have finally realised that behind the spin and the smokescreen this Government will never deliver for them and that only the Conservative party understands small businesses. Frankly, it is only a Conservative Government who will deliver for them.

3.37 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston) (Lab): Not only am I delighted to contribute to the debate, but I do so with real pride, rather than fear. I am enormously proud of the record for people in my constituency who have told me how much they have benefited from the various measures introduced by the Government, and who are encouraged by the promise that the Queen's Speech holds. They share my pride in having the lowest interest and mortgage rates for nearly 50 years, the lowest inflation for 30 years and the highest employment since the 1970s. The fact is that millions of people, whether they are young or old, or have young families, are benefiting from those hard-won gains, and I notice that the statistics have not been contested.

A record number of people are in work. That has to be a welcome development for hard-working families in constituencies such as mine, where unemployment is down by 37 per cent. and about 1,640 people have got jobs thanks to the new deal. Moreover, the Government are doing more for pensioners than any other Government at any time in our history. In my constituency, the winter fuel allowance alone warmed the homes of 12,286 pensioners in 2004, and Labour is helping all pensioners to enjoy a decent and secure retirement.

Mr. John Taylor: Will the right hon. Gentleman be broad-minded enough to concede that the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered a savage and severe repeated annual blow to occupational pensions of a £5 billion impost, which damaged those pensions and added to the demoralisation of the stock market?

Mr. Clarke: I would do a great disservice to the facts, and not reflect the views of pensioners in my constituency, were I to do as the hon. Gentleman asks. I do not know the figures for his constituency, but I am sure that he is broad-minded enough to acknowledge that the 3,775 pensioner householders in my constituency who now benefit from pension credit, which is worth an average of £41 a week, did not receive that under a Conservative Government. That is a welcome change.

Had I said before 1997 that the Government would be able to manage such a turnaround of fortune for my constituents, and for millions of other people the length and breadth of Britain, my claim would have been greeted with sheer derision by Conservative Members—or at least, by those who attended such a debate; there are few present today. One of the reasons for the deep gloom that I observe among Opposition Members is that the Government's record has wiped the smile off their faces and encouraged a real glow among millions of vulnerable people, including pensioners.

Let me give an example: only last week I received a phone call from a woman who had just collected £400 to help with heating and council tax. She said, "Mr. Clarke, I would like to thank you very much. I am 82 years of age and I have never held that amount of money in my hand in my life." That is little wonder when we consider how few years the Labour Government have been in office compared with the Governments of the past century.

The Queen's Speech is not only about young people and the elderly, important though they are; it is about children, too. The Conservatives left us a shameful legacy in the form of one of the highest rates of child poverty in Europe: one in three children were living in real poverty. Our mission to end child poverty is grounded in our determination to secure social justice. I shall not be satisfied until child poverty is abolished completely, at home and abroad. I heard what the Chancellor had to say today about his policies on international development, but, domestically, child tax credit and working tax credit awards are helping 6,400 hard-working families in my constituency alone. I welcome that.

Having taken the courageous decision to give freedom to the Bank of England, we must not, and will not, repeat the mistakes of the past. We shall never return Britain to the boom and bust of the 1980s and early 1990s, when mortgage rates hit 15 per cent. for a whole year—my constituents will certainly never forget that—the homes of 250,000 families were repossessed, and 1.5 million suffered negative equity. People are proud of their homes; home provides a sense of security and much happiness for many. That is why mortgage rates are of the utmost importance to the electorate. Sustained low rates are saving mortgage payers an average of £2,600 a year—almost £220 a month—compared with life under the Conservatives.

Last week the Leader of the Opposition was campaigning in Cornwall—a county bereft of Tory MPs. The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) took over from the right hon. Member for Chingford and Woodford Green (Mr. Duncan Smith) a year ago, but the polls suggest that he is just as unpopular with the voters. No wonder the mild-mannered, erudite Jeremy Paxman, who covered the visit, headlined the report "Same Old Tories". That reminds me of the past.

"Fifty years ago was the decade in which Prime Minister Harold Macmillan told us we'd never had it so good. Life in the 1950s was considered to be simpler, better and free from the ills of modern society . . . That's the theory. In practice, a survey suggests that life is much better now than it was 50 years ago. In 2004 we are generally more prosperous, do not work as hard and enjoy a far more comfortable lifestyle than in 1954."

I have quoted from last Monday's edition of the Daily Mail, so it is official. As Macmillan said, we have never had it so good. In view of the Chancellor's impressive handling of the economy, unmatched for a very long time, perhaps we should brace ourselves for the Daily Mail's next headline, "Britain under Brown is even better".

Returning to my main theme—jobs in my constituency—I shall set out two excellent examples and refer to two separate issues on which I believe the Government must do more.Within the village of Gartcosh in my constituency there is a large derelict site. Under the previous Government it was a thriving steel strip mill employing 600 workers. Since the closure, which I campaigned against, I have continued my campaign to have the site redeveloped and prepared for meaningful jobs.

I am delighted to say that last month I learned that Scotland is to get a new-style crime-fighting agency, which will gather together several key law enforcement agencies on one site, and it will be based in a purpose-built headquarters at Gartcosh. Discussions about the new centre of excellence are still at an early stage, but significant resources have been made available to enable planning to get under way. A new organisation will tackle the growing and evolving threat from serious and organised crime—something that is addressed in the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Flight: Does the right hon. Gentleman not have any concern that what he has lost was a business that was producing wealth, whereas what he has gained is something in the public sector that will be living on his constituents' taxes?

Mr. Clarke: I had great concern, which I expressed in the House, about what the previous Government did to the steel industry, and what is still being done. If that has led in some way to an increase in crime, I certainly welcome the jobs and the opportunities that will offer themselves.

The Serious Organised Crime Agency for Scotland will house the Scottish Drug Enforcement Agency as well as the forensic science department of Strathclyde police. It is understood that the Scottish arm of the National Criminal Intelligence Service, prosecutors from the Crown Office, Customs and Excise north of the border and immigration service workers could also be relocated to the site. I am pretty sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome all of that in the fight, in which we all join, against crime.

It is anticipated that the development work on the new crime campus could start as early as next year, with completion expected in 2006–07. So the hon. Gentleman has helped me to make the point that under this Government the old Gartcosh steelworks is like a phoenix. It is about to rise from the ashes of 18 years of waste under the Conservative Administration and to go places. I am delighted that my constituency will accommodate this new modern facility.

As I turn to another important issue for my constituency, I welcome the presence of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions in the Chamber. The Government are committed to improving the efficient delivery of public services and bringing government closer to the people, in particular by rationalising back office functions, working across administrative boundaries, improving the interface between the Government and citizens through new technology, and slimming down estates.

However, I must tell my right hon. Friend that in Lanarkshire, the Department for Work and Pensions is planning to deliver operations from 10 sites, with varying levels of service. The Jobcentre Plus facility that serves Coatbridge would become a benefit processing site, which would end the current standard of service delivery to my constituents. Coatbridge is at the centre, or heart, of surrounding communities, and has a population of approximately 50,000. Irrespective of where my constituents live, they visit the local town centre, and can make use of a full range of public services, including health, housing and the Department for Work and Pensions, as well as carrying out their weekly shopping.

Frankly, it is unacceptable that Coatbridge should be treated unfavourably in comparison with other towns in Lanarkshire. DWP officials, and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Work, know my views and my opposition to the current proposals. I remind my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the matter simply will not go away, because it is an injustice for my constituency.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): I was born in Coatbridge, so I know that it is a large community, but does my right hon. Friend accept that in small communities such as Bo'ness in my constituency, the number of footfalls in the town centre is just as vital to the shops as it is in a large town? To remove a service such as a jobcentre contradicts the Government's declared intention of bringing the service closer to the people.

Mr. Clarke: I take my hon. Friend's point, but in view of the time, if he will forgive me I shall turn to another major issue that impacts on my constituency, and which Opposition Members may welcome my raising—road haulage.

Earlier this month I received representations from the Road Haulage Association. Ms Glancey and Mr. Fraser visited my office and put their case with great clarity and firmness. They argued that the UK is the only country in the European Union to charge more tax on diesel than on petrol. Every time the price of diesel increases by 1p a litre it adds an average of £800 to the annual cost of running a heavy goods vehicle. They therefore want the Chancellor to abandon further increases in fuel duty—an increase was postponed from September to November—and introduce a temporary fuel duty de-escalator for diesel. Oil revenue income could be used to reduce the duty and compensate for the rising cost of fuel, the process being triggered when world prices exceed $50 a barrel.

I have already written to the Chancellor about the issue. Tomorrow we will learn in the pre-Budget report what he proposes to do about it and other critical matters. I expect that he will listen extremely carefully to representations, and will have something interesting to say. In that spirit, I congratulate the Government on the Queen's Speech. I welcome their proposals, which reflect reality in my constituency and beyond. They will help to build a progressive consensus, which is welcome in Scotland, throughout Britain and, I am sure, in Europe too.

3.54 pm

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): In addressing the subject of the Queen's Speech and the economy, I shall dwell on a number of topics. In Northern Ireland over recent years it has been argued that if the economy were made more robust and there were significant investment, it would ensure that in areas where paramilitary groups have a vice-like grip on working class communities, their grip would be broken. I do not subscribe to that theory and have consistently warned against it. However, if that grip can be broken—and we hope that it can be—there is no doubt that a vibrant economy based on a peaceful democratic economic regime would assist local communities to build themselves and improve their local infrastructure. The Government should ensure that that can happen.

I shall return to the proposition that has been discussed in recent days with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. There has been much media speculation in Northern Ireland in recent weeks about a regeneration fund. I know that discussions have taken place between the Treasury and the Northern Ireland Office, and my party and others have engaged in discussions in an effort to establish such a fund. It has been termed a peace fund. The term "peace" has been devalued in Northern Ireland down the years, because of overuse and because it has been applied when anything but peace existed, so I prefer to speak of a regeneration fund. Whatever it is called, it is important that the economy in Northern Ireland should receive as much assistance as it can.

The Northern Ireland economy has been suppressed for 35 years, principally because of the ongoing regime of violence and terror, the remnants of which we are still dealing with. Compared with the rest of the United Kingdom, salaries are lower than average, we have higher power and electricity prices, we have much worse deprivation levels and, correspondingly, we have significantly worse health and mortality rates across the population. It is essential that the regeneration fund is targeted at alleviating those problems.

Rob Marris: UK central Government funding per capita is already considerably higher in the Province. In round terms, 40 per cent. of the UK economy is the Government. In Northern Ireland the figure is 60 per cent.—that is, 50 per cent. higher. How much more money does the hon. Gentleman want?

Mr. Campbell: The hon. Gentleman obviously was not listening when I outlined some of the reasons why there is such deprivation in Northern Ireland. If other parts of the United Kingdom had been fighting a terrorist war for 35 years, they might well suffer in similar ways. Through the establishment of a regeneration fund, we are endeavouring to make the Northern Ireland economy less—not more—dependent on the public sector. If we get the type of funding that we are looking for, we can ensure that the private sector becomes much more active in Northern Ireland than it has been heretofore.

For example, tourism is one area in which we can make significant progress in a short time. Other parts of the United Kingdom have greater levels of tourism and experience higher spending per head of population. Again, that is because we are still coming to terms with the aftermath of 35 years of violence, but we hope that violence will come to an end. If we see a definitive end to violence, the tourism sector can take off in a few short years.

We have a magnificent product to sell. I represent one of the most beautiful coastlines in Northern Ireland. The principal resorts of Portrush, Portstewart and Downhill can take advantage of a significant influx of tourists, provided we have not only the product, but the marketing and expertise to drive up the spend and ensure that the number of people purchasing the product increases.

The other issue is the problems that have beset the manufacturing sector, which are not peculiar to Northern Ireland but have afflicted communities across the United Kingdom. The manufacturing sector in Northern Ireland has experienced a particular downturn. I concur with many of the comments made by the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) about small and medium-sized enterprises. If our economy gets a significant boost in the next few years, we can significantly increase the SME sector, which could take off as it has not done in the past.

The Government have funded Invest Northern Ireland, the agency responsible for delivering economic development, to a considerable degree in the two and a half years since its establishment—but many of us are still not impressed by Invest Northern Ireland's results. The economy in Northern Ireland has become more buoyant, as has the economy across the United Kingdom, but I have tabled numerous written questions to try to establish how effective Invest Northern Ireland is at driving potential inward investors beyond the Greater Belfast area. Unfortunately, the answers have been minimal. It appears to many people in Northern Ireland that the body responsible for promoting the economy has a capital city mentality. Invest Northern Ireland does not get out beyond the motorway, and we must try to ensure that it does. It must address that point.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer could address this issue, and I have written to him on several occasions to try to get him to do so. In Northern Ireland, as in many other parts of the UK, the black economy is prevalent. Other hon. Members and I have lobbied for a significant increase in personal allowances. If, for example, personal allowances and the threshold at which individuals begin to pay national insurance were raised to £10,000 per annum, it would no longer be productive for any small employer to pay someone who is in the black economy and consistently draws benefits.

That would apply particularly to part-time employment. The part-time economy in Northern Ireland is buoyant, but if the black economy is prevalent, it is a drain on the social security budget. I hope that the Chancellor will reconsider the issue and raise personal allowances significantly above the rate of inflation. If we had, for example, that £10,000 per annum limit, part-time employees could earn £200 per week and pay no income tax or national insurance, and that would reduce the amount of regulation for small employers with such employees.

Mr. O'Neill: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman with interest, but there is a certain inconsistency in his argument. He suggests radical changes in revenue raising, but equally wants large lumps of public expenditure to be devoted to one of the most disadvantaged parts of Britain. That equation does not work out. We have to increase revenue in order to have the resources to increase expenditure; otherwise we will end up like Bush's America, and that is not what we are after.

Mr. Campbell: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I shall return briefly to the issue that I was attempting to address. We are, I hope, emerging from 35 years of murder and violence, during which our economy has been depressed and resources that should have gone into our infrastructural capacity have been channelled and sidelined into fighting the war on terror. If those resources can be channelled into the infrastructure—tourism and so on—many of us believe that that will of itself help to regenerate the private sector economy and make us less dependent on the resources that we get from the block grant.

I shall conclude by asking the Government to deal with the problem of financial institutions. Last month I tabled an early-day motion on the availability of free cash machines—ATMs—across the United Kingdom. The fact that that EDM received the most signatures of any tabled in the past three years by a Northern Ireland Member of Parliament reflects the great level of concern. In the past six weeks, Nationwide building society has issued a report that concluded that UK financial institutions were charging personal account-holders £60 million to access their own money through ATMs. That is a disgrace. The Government should pressurise those financial institutions to display their charges clearly on ATMs to ensure that people, particularly in poor deprived areas, understand that they are being charged £1 or £1.50 to access their own money, even though in many cases they are taking out only £10 or £15.

Angela Eagle: The hon. Gentleman raises a point that increasingly worries many of us as we see the development of cash machines that charge people to access their money, especially in poorer areas where they do not have the option of getting it in other ways. Does he realise that the Treasury Committee is soon to consider that, and hopes to come up with some views to pass on to the Government about what can be done about this serious and increasing problem?

Mr. Campbell: I thank the hon. Lady. I noticed that the Committee made that announcement just after I tabled the EDM; I do not know whether the two things were connected. I heartily recommend that hon. Members sign early-day motion 93, and if the Treasury Committee advocates strong, positive and decisive action in respect of the financial institutions, many of which make hundreds of millions of pounds, in order to assist people in deprived areas, it will be doing a service.

4.9 pm

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) and I endorse the points that he made towards the end of his contribution about charging machines. I shall speak about that subject later.

I welcome the measures announced in the Queen's Speech that relate to economic affairs, especially the Government's commitment to introduce a consumer credit Bill. I endorse the comments of other hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), who chairs the Select Committee on the Treasury. We hope that the Bill will implement many of our Committee's recommendations on consumer credit. I also agree with my right hon. Friend that the matter is urgent. I hope that the measure will be introduced soon so that Parliament can begin work on it.

The Bill is important because existing consumer credit laws are approximately 30 years old. As the Government rightly stated in the White Paper, "Fair, Clear and Competitive", which was published last year, the need to overhaul consumer credit legislation has become pressing. I am pleased that Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members have so far made broadly positive noises about the Bill. I hope that there will be broad consensus for our reform of consumer credit legislation.

The need for reform is underlined by the dramatic change in the world of credit since existing credit laws and regulations were written. When the initial legislation was introduced, I believe that only one credit card was in circulation, whereas there are now more than 500. The range of credit facilities is phenomenally greater. The complexity of the marketplace that offers credit bears no resemblance to the simple world that existed when the laws were introduced. Access to many different forms of credit is far easier. It is therefore vital to bring the laws that govern credit up to date .

Indebtedness is another reason for dealing with credit. The subject has already surfaced in the debate and attention has focused on the fact that total household indebtedness in the UK has passed the £1 trillion mark. The right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin) commented on that. There is no need to get over-excited about the £1 trillion figure. Although it is a new high, it reflects 10 years of growth in the economy and the rise in disposable income. Before becoming too concerned, it is important to stress the balancing figure in the other column, which covers total household assets and wealth. That figure is £6 trillion. The relationship between one and six is reasonably stable and does not suggest an overall problem of indebtedness in the economy. However, in specific sectors and groups of society, there are problems. Some are due to weaknesses in consumer credit legislation. We need to deal with that.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it would be helpful to try to clarify responsibility for credit card fraud, especially card-not-present fraud, before it becomes a major crisis? People are not sure who is responsible once fraud has happened, and disputes between the financial institutions are increasing.

Mr. Plaskitt: The hon. Gentleman is right, and I am right to suggest that there is a growing consensus about such issues. I am happy to endorse his comments. Later, I shall consider other fraud issues, which are also the product of the market's evolution in recent years and underline the need to tackle the matter.

Many more people have access to credit as provision has grown so fast in recent decades. There are important imperfections in the credit market, and that is another reason to review the legislation. Choice and competition in the credit market and product innovation are all fine—no one would have a problem with that. They drive the market and make it so successful. However, with those things have come other consequences that Parliament needs to address. There is far more complication and a great deal of consumer confusion in this market, as well as opaqueness in terms of the consumer trying to understand what the product is or what will be the consequences of taking a particular form of credit.

That creates confusion for the average customer—many of us would include ourselves in that category—but things become far worse for the vulnerable consumer and move on from confusion to potential entrapment in a downward spiral of debt, which can lead to tragic personal consequences, as we have seen in recent years. Reform of the law is needed to realign credit legislation with the real nature of today's credit market.

Credit is very important to the economy, as it aids personal flexibility, helps us all in managing our personal finances and creates more opportunity than there would be without it, but we can improve the working of the credit market and support all its benefits while eradicating some of its excesses and bad practices, which we in the Treasury Committee have been studying and becoming increasingly concerned about.

The new Bill, when we have it in front of us, must achieve a number of important balancing acts. Yes, we need a genuinely competitive market in consumer credit, but to have it we need informed consumers. Yes, we want fair competition to be promoted and encouraged, but that requires an end to misleading promotions. Yes, it is important to achieve transparency in trading in credit, but that requires an end to the obfuscation that distorts so much of the market. We must have fair trading in credit and between credit providers and credit consumers. That means an end to many of the practices that constitute irresponsible lending.

To focus on an important issue, the market falls well short of being genuinely transparent. The credit terms that come with most credit cards are printed in minuscule type and written in the most opaque language that it is possible to envisage. It is very hard for the average consumer to understand—if they can even see them to read them—the terms of the contract that they have entered into.

Also, it is impossible to compute the cost of credit. One thing that we on the Treasury Committee discovered in considering the issue is that an average consumer who takes two, three or four credit cards from different issuers, all with the same annual percentage rate, assumes that the cash cost of credit on those cards is the same. It is not. Hidden away in the small print are so many other variables that a person can do the same transaction over the same period on those four cards, all at the same APR, and the cash cost of the credit might vary by as much as 40 per cent. It is very difficult for consumers to keep up with all that. There are even different ways of calculating APR. That, too, adds to the lack of transparency.

There is some progress in the industry—I hope that some of it is due to the work that we have done in the Treasury Committee—as it is moving towards a standardised APR, which I welcome. The industry is also introducing summary boxes, which summarise the key information on the credit, the offers and the statement. That is movement in the right direction, but it has been rather grudging and there is still a lot further for the industry to go.

I see those as down-payments on the complete reform that is needed. The summary boxes are not yet standardised, so it is still difficult to compare providers. The penalty charges that attach to the cards are still not clear and they represent a large part of the spiralling cost incurred by those whose debt goes out of control.

The point that we must try to reach when we reform the consumer credit legislation is that the full extent of the deal into which the consumer has entered must be on the table before the consumer signs up. The problem at the moment is that far too much is discovered after entering into the contract. That is the key change that we need to make if we are really to achieve proper transparency in the industry.

I hope that the Bill gives us a chance to achieve fair trading in the industry. We have found far too many examples of where that does not exist. I want to stress one, and one only: the unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques. These are being sent repeatedly to 5 million households in Britain, all of them unsolicited. They come with glossy accompanying promotional literature. Many of the banks that issue those credit card cheques encourage people, as they send them, to spend them on holidays, cars, gifts for other people, or credit transfers to yet another credit card. There is always room, it seems, to print on the cheques themselves and the promotional literature all the things that they can be spent on, but there never seems to be room to print the APR, the actual credit cost, what will happen if one only makes minimum payments and so on. There can only be one justification from the industry's point of view—it is an inducement to the consumer to use up more and more of their credit limit.

I have put the question to many providers of credit card cheques when they have appeared before our Committee: what is the justification for unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques? Answers come back along the following lines: credit card cheques provide convenience to consumers; they cover instances of payment when one cannot pay with a credit card or bank cheque; or they are helpful for balance transfers. All those are reasons for having credit card cheques as part of the credit business, but not one of them is a reason for the unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques. They are delivered repeatedly only because providers hope that they will land on the doormat on the same day as a glossy holiday brochure, and consumers will simply find it irresistible, put two and two together, and end up paying six for the privilege. It is simply an irresponsible extension of credit.

There is quite a simple answer. The industry can make the argument for the existence of credit card cheques—I have no problem with that—but the consumer should opt in to them, not have to face repeated issuing of them when they are not requested and not used. In the White Paper, "Fair, Clear and Competitive", to which I referred earlier, it is suggested that the unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques "could" or "may" be one of the instances of irresponsible lending. I would suggest that it "is" an irresponsible form of lending. There is no justification for it, and I hope that we will use the opportunity of the forthcoming Bill to end the practice of the unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques.

I also hope that when we consider the Bill in more detail, we can deal with the excessive interest rate problem in relation to store cards—credit cards issued by retailers. I can describe such interest rates as excessive, but it is not my description. When the Select Committee had the bosses of the four main banks in front of us, we asked them what they thought constituted an excessive rate of interest. The head of Barclays was unwilling to define it, but the others could—they put it in the region of 20 per cent. or more, against the backdrop of current base rates. Most of the interest rates charged by store cards are well in excess of that, so we can describe them as excessive—they are condemned as excessive by the industry itself, not just by consumer associations.

There are 21 million store cards in circulation, £5 billion a year is spent on them, 14 million adults have them, but they all charge excessive interest rates. I hope that we will have an opportunity, in consideration of the Bill, to do something about that, and to act on conclusions already reached by the Office of Fair Trading, whose report stated that "the level of interest rates on store cards does not appear to be disciplined by competitive pressures."

We must move to a genuinely competitive market, and if we do we should see an end to excessive interest rates on store cards.

I want to pick up on the observations made by the hon. Member for East Londonderry about charging automated teller machines. That issue will also be examined by the Committee, and it is another area in which it is important to review regulations on money and credit. There is an explosive growth of charging ATMs. There are 20,000 of them around the United Kingdom, and they grew by 40 per cent. last year. Of the 5,600 new cash machines installed across the UK last year, 63 per cent. were charging machines. We are nearing the point at which there will be more charging machines than free machines, because some banks are selling their networks to charging operators. This means that we are paying for our own money.

The industry argues that it is all about convenience. It says that in remote areas, if there were no charging machine there would be no machine. That is not a convincing argument. Many charging machines are in areas that could not possibly be described as "convenience" locations. In Leicester square, for instance, there is a Travelex charging machine, which does not warn people that they will have to pay but tells them that they will have to do so only after they have completed five screen actions. On the other side of the square, there are free cash machines. That constitutes a total lack of transparency, and it is a further reason for my hope that the consumer credit Bill will deliver a transparent industry.

There is an urgent need for Parliament to consider this issue. We need an opportunity to lend a hand to the millions of consumers in Britain who are wrestling with the complex, obscure and frequently misleading world of credit.

4.26 pm

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam) (LD): I have a great deal of sympathy with what was said by the hon. Members for East Londonderry (Mr. Campbell) and for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) about consumer protection in the context of financial services. However—unsurprisingly, perhaps—I want to talk about the role of information technology in the UK economy, a subject on which Cicero and Demosthenes did not regularly speak.

For a number of reasons, IT is now centre stage in the political debate. It is no longer an issue on the fringes for the anoraks to talk about; it is something that we all need to consider. The Chancellor emphasised its centrality when he told us that he had already factored into his public spending plans the Gershon review savings, many of which depend on the success or otherwise of IT projects.

Government affects the sector as a whole because about half all IT spending in the UK is now made by the public sector. As Government spending plans depend increasingly on efficiency gains that themselves depend on IT, the expenditure is being ramped up. Sadly, the track record of Governments of all colours in procuring and implementing systems has been characterised by problems that we regularly examine on the Public Accounts Committee.

Many of the mistakes that we see continue to be repeated, and this year's programme contains a huge amount of new IT risk. Both the identity card system and the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise merger will be very IT-intensive. Major contracts from earlier years will also be of interest this year, notably the national health service's national IT programme, the large-scale outsourcing for the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which has already been awarded, and the £4 billion infrastructure project for the Ministry of Defence, which is due to be awarded early in the new year.

The record of problems that should form a background to our consideration has come to the fore in recent weeks with the failure to implement the Child Support Agency system effectively, and the desktop system crash at the Department for Work and Pensions, which was truly spectacular in technical terms. It takes real skill to bring down 60,000 work stations. Normally, servers are the problem; one machine is killed, and no one else can gain access. These people managed to kill 60,000 machines simultaneously, which deserves respect from a technical if not an operational point of view.

Stories of IT failures have been well rehearsed both in Committees and here, and I would rather spend my time suggesting solutions that I believe would produce a credible Government IT strategy on which we could pin spending plans with a degree of expectation of actually being able to meet them. I characterise them as "people, practices and purposes". IT problems often lie not in the detail of the technology, but in the "people, practices and purposes" that surround it. Let us begin with "purposes", sometimes described as "requirements" or specifications. We should view it in a broader context, and start by asking what any system is for. Far too often we do not look at the context of what we are trying to achieve in the wider world, but simply mechanise existing systems.

One example of our losing track of the wider world is the tax credit system. Like me, other Members doubtless get regular visits from constituents who complain that they have been overpaid tax credits and are now being asked to pay them back. The system works; it correctly calculates that such people have been overpaid, informs them—in a way that is completely unintelligible to me, and certainly to them—and then seeks to reclaim the money. In doing so, it loses track of the wider point that we are giving these people money in the first place because they are on low incomes, so our ability to reclaim it is bound to be limited. The purpose of delivering money to people on low incomes has been lost in the process of creating a system that works well at a technical level—it does not lose the Treasury's money—but which does not deliver what the customer actually needs.

Sir Robert Smith: My hon. Friend is making a valuable point about the impact on people with low incomes. Just today, a constituent got in touch with my office to explain how their problem was dealt with. They phoned the helpline, but the system is so chaotic that it told my constituent to write to their MP because there is nothing that it can do.

Mr. Allan: I have had precisely the same experience; people have come to my surgery to point out that they have been given exactly the same advice. Such incidents show that, in the broader context, the system is not working, irrespective of whether the technology is doing what it is supposed to do. These are the issues that we need to debate. Another example is the huge electronic medical records programme that the national health service is introducing.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I am listening to the hon. Gentleman with great interest. Before he leaves the subject of tax credits, may I ask whether he will join me in congratulating the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions on insisting that claims made by people in receipt of income support will not be handed over to the child tax credit system? The decision has been delayed yet again, and it is clear that the Department for Work and Pensions is not confident that those on the lowest incomes would get the money that they need if they were handed over to that system. Long may the Secretary of State carry on battling in favour of long-established benefits and against this scheme, which is still so unreliable.

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman makes the point very effectively. I agree entirely that if there were clear evidence that a particular programme would cause distress, we should not proceed with it simply because it had been started and a target date set. I am at one with the hon. Gentleman on the decision that has been taken.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD) rose—

Mr. Allan: The subject of tax credits appears to be a minefield. I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Tyler: I am grateful and I shall be brief. Does my hon. Friend agree that this issue is very relevant in the light of the Chancellor's intention to remove many people from the various Departments, and of the recent strike action taken by professional civil servants affected?

Mr. Allan: I have an enormous amount of sympathy with my hon. Friend's observation. As our surgery experience shows, many such changes are based on a business plan that involves getting rid of lots of people, but which does not recognise that, in the early months of its implementation—but hopefully not in the long term—more people are needed to deal with teething troubles. Otherwise, a huge backlog develops. Existing queries cannot be answered and more queries arise, leading to a cycle of difficulty. Sadly, that is what is happening with certain aspects of the tax credit system.

The NHS IT programme will be another major issue for debate in this House. To my mind, the purpose of that electronic medical records system is to improve patient health by ensuring that information is available to support clinical decisions. Its purpose is not to create electronic records per se, which would have no value except where they lead, directly or indirectly, to patient benefit. Again, we should think about such systems in terms of what they are trying to achieve for the public, rather than as the simple creation of electronic records. We frequently fail to debate such issues in that way.

The shifting of purposes should always be a clear warning of potential problems, and in my view—it will not be shared throughout the House—identity cards are a case in point. Whatever the merits of ID cards and the associated politics, they are certainly an example of shifting purposes. Initially, they were wanted for their own sake, but since then we have gathered up an ill-defined set of functions—preventing illegal working, national security, access to NHS services—and tacked them on. To me, that rings very loud bells as regards whether the system will work. I cannot see it as having a clearly defined purpose. We could have a separate debate about whether it would meet those requirements, which seem to be hazy.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. If I may say so, it is one anorak giving way to another. Does he agree that the gateway system introduced by the Government is another problem? The whole point of having a gateway review is that a project should not go ahead until gateway zero has been initiated, yet quite often—the hon. Gentleman mentioned the NHS as an example—we enter gateway three a long time after gateways one and two have been ignored.

Mr. Allan: In the case of ID cards, we know that the scheme has been through the first gateway, as the general feasibility has been looked at. One of the problems that the House will face is that, after public money has been spent and the best Treasury brains in the Office of Government Commerce have been applied to the project, we will not be able to see the outcome. We will have to debate ID cards in the knowledge that a report into feasibility has been drawn up, but is unavailable to us. I know that the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) is working on the task of gaining access to the gateway reviews. After all, we are taking decisions about spending public money, so the information should be made available to us.

Gateway reviews are one of the practices that should be followed. Many have been dealt with in National Audit Office and Public Accounts Committee reports and, to be fair to the Government, there are some signs of hope in the work of the Office of Government Commerce and, indeed, of some Departments improving their game. I believe that we should compliment Departments when they start to get things right, but there are still clouds on the horizon, especially in the apparent lack of competition in the market, which leads to companies that have failed in one area still picking up lucrative contracts from other Departments.

It is an easy target, but Electronic Data Systems is often singled out for its problems with tax credit systems, Child Support Agency systems and high-profile incidents such as what happened last week at the Department for Work and Pensions, a story that writes itself. Yet EDS remains a major partner and one of only two consortiums remaining for the £4 billion defence information infrastructure project that will be awarded next year. Understandably, people ask how we can end up with failure being rewarded by the award of another contract.

Only in very few cases have contractors been written out altogether; Accenture, in its old guise of Andersen, was prevented from bidding for Government contracts for a while after a national insurance record system cock-up. Generally, we see the same faces coming back. The problem is not with individual companies. The problem is systemic, because contracts are geared in such a way that smaller innovative companies simply cannot get in. They can find no way in and tell us daily of their difficulties in obtaining Government work. The contracts, tender documents and costs of bidding prevent those companies from bidding for that work, even though they could demonstrate better value for money.

Rob Marris: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Child Support Agency in Australia, on which the UK CSA is based, got its computer system to work only by getting rid of the external supplier and taking the computerisation in-house?

Mr. Allan: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. We have already, quite rightly, done away with the private finance initiative for IT projects, but the level of in-house expertise, which I am coming on to now, is critical to getting these projects right. We have, sadly, developed a culture of tolerating failure in software development, which is simply not necessary. There are voices calling for proper software engineering principles to be applied, as mentioned in a very good report produced by the Royal Academy of Engineering and the British Computer Society. We should listen to what is being said. Correctly engineered software does not have to cost more than buggy software, yet there is a sort of lazy assumption out there that these things simply have to go wrong. That is not true. The engineering principles are there; the problem is that they are not being applied.

Improvements to Government performance could be made by instilling these disciplines in departmental IT centres of excellence. If we are to have IT centres of excellence, let us ensure that they are truly excellent and that they do not adopt some of the lazy practices offered by suppliers over the years. They must secure best practice rather than state of the art. State of the art is terrible; they need something better than that. We should use information architects, which is an important recommendation in the Royal Academy of Engineering report, and we should have requirement specialists to get the designs right from the beginning. We need to ensure that a broader range of companies is able to bid into the public sector market.

The most important, and often the most neglected, element of any IT project is the people. Industry—British Gas, BT and others—has learned to look at such projects as business change projects, rather than as technology projects. They are not about technology but about changing the business, with technology as a large element of that change. An example of how far the public sector is from that attitude is the national programme for NHS IT. The technology procurement appears robust—I am sure that Richard Granger's team will have bought some good technology—but the people have been left so far behind that the technical press, and even the more general press, are full of stories of clinicians in the NHS who are fighting the very programme that is supposed to assist them in their work. The project is getting the people side desperately wrong. If anything brings down the programme and leads to significant wastage of the £6 billion committed to it, it is likely to be on the people side, not the technology side.

We must ensure that the NHS now gives priority to working with its staff to implement the new IT systems and puts money into training. The NHS must ensure that it has in-house expertise so that people can use the systems and derive maximum benefit, rather than leaving the matter to external contractors.

The Government can improve their IT procurement, to the benefit of the public purse and, most importantly, the users of the services, if the will is there. The Government can do more to create a climate in which the UK IT sector can flourish to the benefit of the economy as a whole; the pointers to what needs doing are already there. Ofcom should be robust in promoting a competitive telecoms market and can expect a lively year ahead as it grapples with some of the more difficult issues of telecoms competition that have been left to ride over several years. The Government can respond urgently to the e-skills UK report, "IT Insights", which highlights the improvements needed in work force training. Other hon. Members have mentioned our competitiveness with China and India, but the report tells us what problems we will have if we do not address the issue of skills, all the way up to chief executive and ministerial level. We need IT skills across the work force if we are to be able to make correct and informed decisions.

We need to ensure that we continue to review our support for research and development in technology to ensure that it is genuinely additional and efficiently delivered, without the complexity that often makes it inaccessible to the very companies that would most benefit from it. Such companies often say that they cannot make their way through the bureaucracy to access the funds that are supposed to be available to support innovation, or that they have to employ an extra layer of specialists to do so for them.

I am not in the camp of those Jeremiahs who wish to see the Government fail in their objectives. That is especially so in the case of the improvement of public services through new technology. Indeed, I am desperately keen that the Government should succeed in that agenda. It is not in anyone's interests that such projects should continue to fail. It is a high-risk agenda, but not an impossible one. I hope that the Government will continue to learn the lessons. The Liberal Democrats believe that our approach to the issue is credible. We could achieve savings through the use of new technology, but it is incumbent on all parties who put forward a cost-saving agenda for the public sector to demonstrate that they have the credibility, have learned the lessons and will deliver.

Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead) (Lab): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) on the subject of IT in public services, although he made some good points about greater competition. The Government have to be clear about what they want from such contracts and there should be penalties for failure as well as rich rewards.

I welcome the programme of new legislation for next year that was announced in the Queen's Speech, including the 37 Bills—some of which are complex and important—the Chancellor's financial proposals in his pre-Budget report tomorrow, and the commitments in Labour's election manifesto, when it is published. The one thing that cannot be said about this Government is that they have run out of steam. They have plenty of ideas for improving society and the lives of our people.

I want to address one issue that the Government will have to address more fully in the next year—pension reform. I shall indicate some components of such reform that I think would achieve the most favourable outcome for the many, not just the few.

First, I shall give the House two recent examples that show pension schemes in a mess. On 19 November, under the headline, "APW staff furious as loophole threatens pensions", The Independent reported:

"More than 1,000 former and current workers at APW—the UK electronics manufacturer, which announced the winding-up of its pension scheme yesterday—are set to lose up to 80 per cent. of their retirement savings . . . The wind-up is the second such case this week, after Henlys, the bus group, left more than 2,000 workers in jeopardy when it announced that it would be winding up its pension scheme . . . Despite a fortnight of debate over the final structure of the privately funded Pensions Protection Fund and the Government-backed Financial Assistance Scheme, members of the APW and Henlys schemes are still set to fall outside the requirements to qualify for either lifeboat."

That is appalling, although I pay tribute to the Government for bringing in the pension protection fund and the financial assistance scheme.

Another report in the same paper on the same day was headed, "Royal Mail warns it must double pension contributions", and disclosed a scandal that is repeated in many other companies. The report stated that "for the previous 13 years, Royal Mail had taken a pension holiday, making no contributions at all."

The fact that companies and employers can do that is an enormous flaw in the current system, especially as the report went on to note:

"However, the organisation's top management . . . stand to collect millions of pounds in performance bonuses."

Some people get their bonuses by not putting money into pension funds.

Those are not isolated scandals; they are a flaw in the system, and not least in the Chancellor's approach of maintaining that his responsibility is the prudent management of public finances, which is laudable, while leaving the private sector largely to operate as it wants. Companies hold in trust, but are untrustworthy with, people's savings and workers' pensions.

On pensions, the Chancellor has said:

"If the voluntary sector"

—he meant the private sector—

"doesn't work, we'll have to look beyond that."

The examples I gave are among the many that show that the system does not work and that it is time for the Government to look beyond it.

The Tories attacked the Chancellor for abolishing the tax dividend on pension funds. I refer to the "Daily Politics" Tory conference special on 6 October, when the presenter, Andrew Neil, questioned the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), the Conservative spokesman on work and pensions. The hon. Gentleman had said in his speech to the conference that Labour's £5 billion per annum take from pension funds, by completing the abolition of the tax dividend—by the way, that process started under the Tories—was "the worst stealth tax of the lot".

Andrew Neil asked him whether he would restore the money and the hon. Gentleman replied:

"We're not in a position to make that pledge. We're not making that pledge."

Mr. Neil concluded:

"All right, so the £5 billion in tax stays."

The Tory attack is thus somewhat feeble.

The Chancellor is not out of the woods as far as I am concerned, however. On the "Today" programme on 27 September, he said that the £5 billion per annum taken out of pension funds was connected to rewarding investment, to give greater incentive for investment in the economy. He said that corporation tax had been cut by 3p and "the result is that companies should be more profitable after taxes".

That was not picked up at the time, as it was Labour's conference week and news moves fast, but in effect the Chancellor said that he had taken out of workers' pensions to put into company profits. That is not appropriate from a Labour Chancellor and he will have to arrange to put back that money, and a lot more, over the next period.

I believe that there has to be dignity and well-being now for today's pensioners, and I praise the Government on their efforts on that. They were right to tackle the appalling legacy of pensioner poverty that they inherited from the last Tory Government. In 1997, 2.7 million pensioners were in poverty and expected to live on a total of just £69 a week. The poorest pensioners are now £1,800 a year better off and absolute pensioner poverty has been reduced by two thirds.

Savings used to be harshly penalised by a reduction in benefits. The new pension credit has changed that. The setting up of the pension protection board, to help the workers in those firms that go broke and wind up their pension fund, is also a very welcome move by the Government. But there need to be decent pensions for people in the future, and to achieve that reform is needed.

The recent interim report of the Pension Commission, chaired by Adair Turner, formerly of the CBI, said that a sustainable comprehensive approach was required for the long term. There are, it argued, four "unavoidable choices" for policy makers, at least one of which will have to be made. The first is that pensioners become poorer relative to the rest of society. The second is that taxes and/or national insurance contributions devoted to pensions will need to rise, or public spending on other services will need to be reduced, presumably to balance tax and national insurance. The third is that each generation will have to save more and be reliant on the next generation also saving more. The fourth is that retirement ages will have to rise. Without action on this, the report said,

"pensioners will on average suffer about a 30% decline in their incomes relative to average income between now and 2035."

So doing nothing is not an option and the Government will have to start to address the issue in a realistic way from next year.

I oppose raising the retirement age; I also favour a bigger basic state pension for every older person in this country. I would like the pension linked to earnings and to be free from means-testing. The Government's minimum income guarantee raised the incomes of the poorest among the elderly, but I have seen figures showing that the basic state pension is now just 15 per cent. of average earnings. In 1980, before Mrs. Thatcher abolished its link to earnings, it was 23 per cent., so in my view the Government have to raise the basic state pension.

I favour a compulsory savings requirement upon all people to individual savings accounts, which cannot be accessed until retirement or, for a spouse, death. There should also be compulsion for employers to contribute at a proper level, higher than now. They should also lose the power to manage and, potentially, to raid their workers' pension fund. The Exchequer should insert an initial sum, like that proposed with the child bond—which I very much favour, although the Liberals opposed it—into the individual savings accounts, and add a state contribution to extra private savings made, say a pound for every pound saved.

There should also be an extra boost from the Exchequer for women's pensions. Many women lose out on their occupational pension because they undertake important but lower paid jobs and miss out for a long while in their working career due to the time that they take out to raise their children.

I am not against Exchequer use of the private sector. It could use the private sector to manage the savings account sum in total, but managers' performances would need to be monitored and their contract terminated if their performance was inadequate.

The Government would also need to address the impact of stock market fluctuations upon savings for retirement, perhaps by adopting a system whereby they inserted extra cash during bad times and took it back at times of stock market rises. It should be possible to do that consistently in this day and age.

Effective robbery from pension savings by fat cat directors of finance companies who take excessive salaries and dividends for themselves, even when the savings that they are managing are underperforming, must be stopped. It is also time that the salaries, dividends and other payments that directors receive from companies, including their pensions, are published in annual accounts and not kept secret, as is often the case. I introduced a Bill to require that in the last Session and I hope that the Government will take up that point.

Those are my basic components for pension reform, which I hope will be taken on board. Over the next year, I hope that the Government will be for the workers, not the bosses, and for the many, not the few.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The Gracious Speech contains a massive number of Bills—32 in all: thank goodness most of them will not see the light of day before the next general election.

I cannot sum up the Queen's Speech any better than Anatole Kaletsky, who said that it is a rag-bag of unfortunate measures. It is one of the most illiberal Queen's Speeches for a long time. On identity cards, I walked past eight policemen this morning. That is the most I have seen in many towns in my constituency in the 12 years that I have been a Member of Parliament. Each one could have stopped me and asked for my identity card. Had they done so, I would have been late to make my speech. That shows what an ID card could do to the relationship between this country's citizens and the police.

The Queen's Speech is set against a world environment in which two particularly important things have happened. One is the general situation in the middle east, which has severe consequences. It has led not only to a huge oil price spike but to a significant cost, both here and in the USA, of keeping our troops in Iraq. That, of course, has led to the special provision by the Chancellor. The second is the substantial decline of the dollar, which has now reached a rate of almost 50p. That is because other world uncertainties have led commentators and others to concentrate on the very large twin deficits in the States and here.

The Chancellor has had an extremely lucky tenure since he has been at No. 11 because of the stable world environment. From what I said, it is clear that I believe that that might, sadly, become less stable. That will give him even greater problems in meeting his fiscal and monetary targets. In tribute to him, but in concert with many other central banks around the world, central banks have become much better at managing the macro-economy, injecting liquidity into an economy when it is needed, but also engaging in monetary tightening when economies are starting to overheat. That has led to a much more stable economic cycle.

Angela Eagle: I do not recognise the description of a stable world environment. We had the Asian contagion, which the British economy managed to work its way through because of our economic policies, and the aftermath of 9/11.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My comments on the stability of central banks include the Chinese and other Asian central banks. In particular, the United States Federal Reserve and Alan Greenspan's work, and the Governor of the Bank of England, have led us to manage the macro-economy in a much more stable way. That has been helpful.

The decline of the dollar will be important to both the American economy and our own and could well lead to a slowdown in world demand and growth. I hope that the same will not happen here, but there is no doubt that imports to the American economy will now be more expensive. America has been living on its huge fiscal deficit and on cheap imports, principally from China and India, but the US deficit and the huge Chinese economic surplus will have to be addressed in the not-too-distant future.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one of this country's industries that operate in a dollar market is aerospace? A weak dollar could cause problems to the aerospace industry, which is important in my constituency in the north-west and in many other parts of the country.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Gentleman is entirely right, but aerospace is not the only industry for which the weak dollar might cause difficulties—there are several others. It is something that concerns us all. I hope that in the coming months the central banks of America and Europe will pay greater attention to the problem and see whether the dollar's further decline can be prevented.

Under present policy, over the next Parliament taxes set by the Chancellor will rise to their highest level for 24 years. The UK public sector has undergone a period of dramatic expansion and taxes are now rising to pay for it. They will have to rise even further after the next election, to pay for the Chancellor's black hole. Many people predict that next year the fiscal deficit will rise massively to about £20 billion—the equivalent of 8p on income tax. My right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer has set up the James committee, of which the Gershon committee—to which, as usual, the Government gave very limited terms of reference—is a pale imitation. The James committee has real teeth and I understand that it has identified savings of approximately £20 billion. The message for the British people is simple: under the Chancellor's proposals, there will be a £20-billion black hole and their taxes are likely to go up by the equivalent of 8p on income tax; under my right hon. Friend's proposals, taxes will stay the same for the same level of public services. The choice at the next election will be clear.

Paul Farrelly rose—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: And the hon. Gentleman will now try to dispute that fact.

Paul Farrelly: How does the hon. Gentleman explain the fact that the ratio of what used to be called the Government deficit to the national debt now stands at 32.7 per cent., compared with the 43.6 per cent. ratio that Labour inherited in 1997?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The difference is that we were at a different stage of the economic cycle. At that point, we were on a rising part of the cycle; the Chancellor is in difficulty because now we are on a declining part of the cycle. He will have great difficulty filling the black hole; the only way he can do it is by putting up taxes.

In 2000–01, the Government were spending about £1 billion a day, whereas it is estimated that by 2006–07, they will be spending about £1.5 billion a day—a 50 per cent. increase in public expenditure in five years. That is not sustainable, but even if it was, we would have to ask whether it is buying results. As my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) said, measured internationally, that is very inefficient public expenditure.

I wish to mention specifically one or two stealth taxes that have crept in. The first was highlighted in a fairly sharp exchange about the savings ratio. One of the nasty stealth taxes that have appeared in the Government's fiscal policy is the measure to cut ISAs in 2006, so that ISAs in equities will be cut from £7,000 to £5,000 and ISAs in cash from £3,000 to £2,000. Given that some of our lowest tax payers derive great benefit from ISAs, that is a spiteful measure.

The change by which Business Link will no longer be able to recover VAT will mean that millions of pounds that had been available to help small companies with tax and employment advice will go straight to the Chancellor. It is a small and mean-minded measure. Stephen Alambritis of the Federation of Small Businesses said in relation to this measure:

"We would be very concerned about any fall in overall revenue which would affect the efficiency and effectiveness of Business Link's operation."

Surely we want to encourage the 3.5 million small businesses, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) spoke so eloquently.

There is also the disaster of pension credit, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen), whom I am pleased to follow. Pension credit was introduced by the Department for Work and Pensions, which, incidentally, now has more employees than all our armed forces put together. Pension credit, introduced by the Department in October last year, guaranteed an income of £105.45 a week. That is good for anyone over 60. It guarantees £160.95 for couples. However, effectively it taxes savings of £6,000, which is only £120 a week, at more than 40 per cent. If the full indexation rules remain the same—the pensioners' withdrawal tax—experts estimate that as much as 80 per cent. of the pensioner population will eventually qualify for means-tested benefit. That is a situation that Mr. Adair Turner of the CBI has rightly described as unsustainable. It is wrong that pensioners who have a small amount of pension are taxed on that small amount and are often worse off, or no better off, than someone who has managed to organise their lives to claim the maximum amount of benefits. I know that my hon. Friends on the Opposition Front Bench have proposals to deal with this problem.

Mr. Prisk: My hon. Friend is making an excellent point. Does he agree that there is also the human question for pensioners? Is it not humiliating for the oldest members of our community to have to give to strangers their personal financial details through this disgraceful process?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend has eloquence when he speaks on behalf of small businesses and even more eloquence when it comes to clairvoyant powers. He has touched on exactly what I was about to say.

The minimum income guarantee system, which was introduced by the Government, is an utter disgrace. Some of the poorest pensioners in the land—about 2 million—do not get the full MIG because they are too proud, for one reason or another, to claim it. The basic state pension is only £70 a week. The difference between that and the MIG of £105 affects some of the poorest people who cannot afford properly to heat their house or to feed themselves. That is an utter disgrace. The proposal to link pensions to earnings to improve the lot of our poorest pensioners is greatly to be welcomed. I think that the British people will greatly welcome it too.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): My hon. Friend is bringing to the debate a welcome sense of realism about pensions and also a sense of despair among many pensioners. There is a looming crisis, for example, about the possible and uncertain ending of the traditional pension book in February next year. This will affect many very elderly pensioners who are infirm and fragile in their health. When the Government first mentioned this, they talked about an exception service. We have heard nothing about that for the past two years. I want a statement from the Government on this looming crisis in the very near future.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) will refer to the matter when he makes his winding-up speech. Indeed, he is nodding. This is an area where the Government, who claim to be the champion of some of the poorest people in the country, have failed our poorest pensioners. I put it as strongly as that because I believe that that is the case. Something needs to be done. I have no doubt that there will be a clear choice at the next election.

I want to refer to what I call fiscal drag. It is the issue of not uprating allowances in line with inflation, let alone earnings. The example of property taxes is perhaps the most stark. I declare my interest—it is in the Register of Members' Interests—as a fellow of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, so I do know a thing or two about property. It is a disgrace that the threshold for stamp duty is set at £60,000 when the average house price is £100,000. When the threshold was set, the average house price—my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford, who also knows a great deal about property will correct me if I am wrong—was £22,500. The ratio is therefore the wrong way round, and a huge number of low and middle earners with modestly valued houses will be caught by the tax for the first time. It is a tax on mobility, including job mobility, which we desperately need to maintain a competitive economy. That feeds through to the allowance for inheritance tax. If we uprate stamp duty to reflect the increase in house prices, we must also uprate the exemption for inheritance tax from £262,000 to about £300,000. That is a much more realistic allowance for inheritance tax.

In his 2002 Budget, the Chancellor forecast net borrowing of £13 billion in 2003–04. A year later, he said that it would be £27 billion, but it turned out to be £35 billion, or 3.1 per cent. of gross domestic product. In his first tenure—and I listened to him hour after hour—he said that he was providing prudence for a purpose. Goodness knows how often we heard those words. Prudence has now jumped out of the window—poor Prudence has gone, never to be seen again by the Chancellor, who is now running the country into huge debt and does not know how he will get us out of it, except by taxing the people of this country more and more. The tax take has doubled in the past seven years, costing the average family £5,000 each. The British people have a stark choice—either their taxes are increased significantly under another Labour Government, or they can have a Conservative Government who will hold taxes at the same rate, do their best to reduce them over the cycle, yet produce a better level of public services. The choice is clear—I am sure that they will want to vote Conservative.

5.12 pm

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), who is clearly drawing up battle lines for the election. I merely point him to the latest polls showing how people may vote in any election in the coming year.

[Angela Eagle]

The themes of the Queen's Speech were clearly security and opportunity for all in a changing world. Before talking about opportunity, I congratulate the Chancellor on his economic record and the achievement of economic stability, which underpins all our subsequent policies as a Government and gives us the chance at long last to invest in and reform our sorely neglected public services, ensuring that we can create a fairer society with opportunity for many people who were left behind in the years of Conservative government. That economic stability has been achieved through political choices about, for example, the independence of the Bank of England and monetary policy, as well as a system of fiscal rules that have enabled us to steer a steady course through internationally choppy waters.

Whatever the Opposition's motivation in attempting to paint a different picture, the economic facts are unchallengeable and need to be put on the record. We have had growth in every quarter for the past seven years, thus achieving the longest period of continuous growth for 200 years. We have had the longest period of low inflation and interest rates since the 1960s, and while the Government have been in office 2 million more jobs have been created. Unemployment is at its lowest for 29 years. In my constituency, there has been a 57 per cent. fall in unemployment, and youth unemployment has been wiped out. Those are the lowest ever figures for my constituency, and I will be proud to campaign on them when the time comes.

Economic stability and growth have enabled sustained public sector investment in our schools and hospitals, child care, skills and the knowledge economy. For example, in Wirral borough, before a Labour Government were elected, capital investment in schools ranged from £1.5 million to £2 million a year. That has steadily risen to £18 million a year, and we have a transformed infrastructure in which our children can learn. In addition, there is a £55 million private finance initiative project that will deliver seven new schools.

Many people would have thought that such a changed environment for my constituents was impossible when the Government came to power in 1997. It contrasts with our experience of 3 million unemployed, 1.5 million households in negative equity and constant cuts in public services, which was the Tory record. We have heard today of the £35 billion of cuts that are the Tory threat and their platform for the next election.

I welcome many Bills in the Queen's Speech. I shall speak briefly about the consumer credit Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) made an extremely good speech dealing with the details of the problem that must be confronted in the Bill, including the introduction of summary boxes to deal with confusing interest rates, misleading advertising and the proliferation of complex products with opaque and confusing prices, sometimes with extremely high rates of interest, which are not clear, and even higher rates of penalty charges, which can often drag modest borrowers into serious trouble. We have all had examples of that in our constituencies.

Mr. Pike: I had an example of that this very week, with a constituent who took out a loan and has been ill. A reduced payment was agreed, but the interest payment is more than his monthly payment, and he now owes quite a lot more than he originally borrowed. Such a state of affairs is a disgrace.

Angela Eagle: Indeed. I hope that with the passage of the consumer credit Bill, we will ensure that such practices are brought to an end.

I want to deal with the prospects for the future, now that we have the economic situation triumphantly right. With the basics in place, we have an opportunity to carry out more structural change and engender greater protection and fairness for all our citizens. I shall spend the next part of my speech talking about the realities of post-neo-classical endogenous growth theory. I refer to the opportunity and anti-discrimination Bills in the Queen's Speech. Translated into English, that high-falutin' economic phrase means that if people are happier and are treated more fairly, they will generally be more productive and work harder, and the economy will benefit. We should remember that and act on it.

I am happy to see in the Queen's Speech a welcome package of reforms promoting protection from discrimination and exploitation for many people who are not properly protected at present. I have in mind the Disability Discrimination Bill and the equality Bill. I shall make a case for extending our activity to introduce what I call a single equality Bill updating the equality legislation that the joint commissions will be tasked with putting into effect.

The Disability Discrimination Bill will help the 14,000 people in Wallasey who suffer from some form of disability, as it will help the 14,000 people, on average, in every constituency who struggle to manage with one form of disability or another. The Bill will complete the Government's manifesto commitment to legislate for full civil rights for disabled people and is to be welcomed for that. It will put in place an end date for transport to be made accessible. It will introduce a positive duty to promote equality, which will help to prevent much of the thoughtless discrimination against people with disabilities that we see around us. It will extend the scope of reasonable adjustment provisions to allow the many hundreds of thousands of disabled people who feel able and ready to work now, and the million or more who aspire to be able to work, practical access to the labour market to enable them to get on with their lives and contribute to both the wealth that we create in our society and their own personal fulfilment and development.

The Disability Discrimination Bill will complete Labour's historic mission to introduce full civil rights, which was begun by Lord Morris of Manchester. The mission is currently being continued by one of the most talented Ministers in the Government, the Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle), whom I have known quite well for most of my life.

Ian Stewart (Eccles) (Lab): All of it.

Angela Eagle: Yes, all of it.

I want to discuss the equality Bill.

Mr. Willetts: We all look back fondly to the time when the hon. Lady spoke on disability issues, or at least benefits, from the Front Bench. In his remarks earlier today, the Chancellor said that he will announce changes in the rules for incapacity benefit tomorrow. Can I take it that she supports those changes?

Angela Eagle: Clairvoyance has never been one of my talents, so I await tomorrow's announcement with interest.

Many things can be done to help those who have been stuck on incapacity benefit to get back into the labour market and make their contribution. It is important that the Disability Discrimination Bill accompanies any effort in that direction, because it is no good expecting people with disabilities to be reasonable and try to get back into work if barriers in the workplace prevent them from doing so. We must sort out both sides of the equation. When the measures are unveiled, we can all judge whether they are practical and whether we support them.

I welcome the equality Bill, which will put together the current commissions for disability, gender and race and add other duties in order to create a more user-friendly organisation. I welcome the idea that different types of discrimination are not in competition with one another. If we can get anti-discrimination work right in one area, it strengthens the argument for promoting it in another.

I disagree with the Commission for Racial Equality's worries. A single commission for equality and human rights will strengthen the drive in our society to deal with some all-too-persistent discriminations, which are still around 30 years after some of the pioneering legislation in that area was put on the statute book.

Rob Marris: Does my hon. Friend share my disappointment that, having signed up to the Amsterdam treaty in 2000, it will take the UK Government until December 2006 to introduce age discrimination legislation, which will have taken six years to get on the statute book? The situation is ridiculous.

Angela Eagle: I am slightly more patient that my hon. Friend and am happy to see the Government getting on with it. On age discrimination, many knotty and thorny issues must be worked through, and the exemption until 2006 was implemented for a specific and good reason. However, I would like to see the work being done as quickly as possible as that date approaches.

I particularly welcome the positive duty to promote equality on gender grounds in the equality Bill, because I had a ten-minute Bill on that subject not long ago. Although I am sure that the Government have been listening to me, I suspect that the process went on behind the scenes for quite a while.

The Government have delivered on their commitment, which was made in 1999, and the legislation will help to shift the structure of our battles against discrimination in our society on to a preventive footing. The older legislation protects people and gives them compensation after they have been discriminated against. The new positive duties will prevent discrimination from happening in the first place and will enable us to create a culture—initially in the public sector, and in due course in the private sector—of prevention, which will enable employees to know that they have rights, and employers to know that they have responsibilities to ensure that unthinking and illegal discrimination does not happen. I welcome that move.

I welcome the equality Bill's extension to goods and services of protection on the grounds of religious belief. I should like that to include sexual orientation and age, which are the only two strands of employment protection that have not had goods and services protection extended to them. This important Bill will change the equality delivery infrastructure.

The UK's existing anti-discrimination legislation needs to be updated, as it is inconsistent, piecemeal and complex. Since the enactment of the first such legislation by Harold Wilson's Labour Government—the formidable and fantastic Barbara Castle piloted it through this House more than 25 years ago—it has developed into a package of 30 Acts, 38 statutory instruments, 11 codes of practice and 12 EC directives and recommendations. I am not surprised that even those employers who wish to do right find the increasingly complex and sometimes inconsistent regulations facing them to be a bit much. It is about time that we had a Bill to simplify, harmonise, consolidate and extend our legislation to make it much easier for employers and employees to comprehend.

Unless that is done, the Government's plan to combine the three different commissions, welcome as it is, will be flawed. It is important that employers who wish to do right know exactly what is expected of them and that employees who are subject to unlawful discrimination realise that they have been discriminated against and know that they can have redress. It is even more important that employers and employees can work together to eliminate from the labour market and from the provision of goods or services any unlawful discrimination on the grounds of gender, race, religious belief, disability and, I hope very soon, sexual orientation and age. Then, as our economy develops in the choppy waters that our Chancellor has managed to navigate so well, we can make certain that opportunities that have not been available in practice in the past are opened up to all our citizens regardless of their gender, race, creed, colour, disability, age or sexual orientation.

Extending and consolidating that approach will make our economy more efficient and enable us to use the undoubted skills and talents of our citizens, many of which are grossly underused, much more effectively. That will put us in a position to continue to make our way in the world and to enjoy the ever rising standards of living that we have experienced. It will also, crucially, help us to fight inequality, poverty and disadvantage, which we still find in all too many parts of our communities where discrimination has been suffered.

With the Bills in this Queen's Speech, the continuing work to ensure that we preserve our economic stability and the equality Bill to consolidate anti-discrimination legislation, we truly look forward to a much fairer and more progressive future.

5.29 pm

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I apologise to the House for my absence for a large proportion of the afternoon owing to another engagement, after being present for the opening speeches.

[Mr. Peter Atkinson]

The commitment of the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) to dealing with discrimination and to disability issues is undoubted and it is hard to disagree with much that she says. However, I would counsel that, although many of the initiatives are worthy and desirable, they have an impact on business, especially the operation of small businesses. That must be carefully considered and I shall say a little more about it later.

I have heard the Chancellor make similar speeches on several occasions. Today, he simply made one of his typical speeches. He comes to the Chamber and is surrounded by Brownite Members. It is interesting to see who sits behind the Chancellor; we shall keep a little note of that. He approached the Dispatch Box with a fistful of press cuttings and extracts from broadcasts. He spoke for about 40 minutes and said little apart from reading comments that Conservative Members and Liberal Democrat Members had made to the newspapers. We witnessed a bit of a record today because, if I heard the right hon. Gentleman correctly, he quoted from the Lincolnshire Echo. He must have been scratching around for press cuttings to reach that level.

As always with the Chancellor, what he did not say was notable. We expected some sort of trailer for tomorrow, but there was nothing. He said little, if anything, about pensions, almost nothing about borrowing and the attendant problems that he faces, and nothing about the golden rule. We are determined to hear what he has to say about that tomorrow but we expected him to give us a bit of a clue to what it is all about. If he had taken an intervention from me, I would have asked about the rules of the golden rule, which get more mysterious as the days pass.

Mr. Prisk: Does my hon. Friend agree that the supposed golden rule has become a flexible tool? Is not it better described as a golden elastic band?

Mr. Atkinson: That is a good point. Given that the Chancellor's borrowing requirement is predicated on the golden rule, he should give the House his interpretation of it. We think that we know when it started because the Treasury tells us that, but we do not know when it finishes because we do not know when the right hon. Gentleman believes that the economic cycle will finish. Will that happen in 2005–06 or next year? The Governor of the Bank of England more or less hinted that it could be in a few months. It is difficult for anyone to make a substantial judgment on our position and that of the Chancellor's borrowing requirements without knowing the basis for the golden rule.

In 2002, the Chancellor predicted a borrowing requirement of £13 billion; a year later, he predicted a figure of £27 billion and now, if we are to believe PricewaterhouseCoopers and others, he predicts a borrowing requirement of £36 billion. That shows that he is on a rake's progress for borrowing. I hope that tomorrow will shed some light on the country's true financial state so that people can make decisions that affect their future.

The Chancellor said little about pensions, whereas many hon. Members have said a lot about them. They constitute the big crisis that confronts the country. I do not need to rehearse all the comments about specific problems, but one of the Government's most shameful acts has been to reduce a world-class pension system to a third world pension system, leaving many people in serious doubt about their future.

The boom in house prices is one result of the uncertainty about pensions. If people are faced with the prospect of their pension being of less value than they expected, the safe alternative is to pour money into bricks and mortar. That has driven up house prices recently as people have baled out of pension funds and gone into property. The consequent increase in interest rates becomes a serious problem for many people who have chosen that form of investment. Although there has been a softening in recent weeks and we have heard predictions that interest rates will not increase, it is alarming to read in the papers today that the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development believes that we should have four more interest rate rises in the near future. Other predictions are that interest rates should go beyond 5 per cent. next year. That is alarming news for many people who have invested in property.

Ms Keeble: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that mortgage interest rate predictions of 5 per cent. are alarming, what on earth did he think about the 15 per cent. rates under the Conservative Government?

Mr. Atkinson: I agree that that is alarming, but the difference is in how interest rates go up. In earlier times, they were traditionally much higher and had been for many years, but they went down to 2.5 per cent. and have now doubled. That is a substantial jump in the calculation that people make and considering— [Interruption] If the hon. Lady will let me finish, considering the sums that are invested in property compared with those invested a decade or so ago, it hurts hugely.

The collapse of the pensions system explains another phenomenon.

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): Collapse?

Mr. Atkinson: The Secretary of State says, "Collapse?" and laughs at the word. He comes from a different background—public service—but if he had his own private pension he would know that he will probably get back more or less what he has put in, pound for pound, over the last 20 or so years and not a single pound in profit as a result of his investment. That is what most people in the private sector face, if they have a pension at all. Protected though he was by the public sector, he should, I hope, not be ignorant of what is happening in the real world.

Alan Johnson: There is obviously political knockabout here. The hon. Gentleman used the word "collapse" in relation to pensions, but will he confirm that the Pensions Commission has said that, at the moment, pensioner income is at record levels? It will continue to rise. There is no crisis at the moment; it will come 15 to 25 years down the road if Governments, whatever their political persuasion, do not act to ensure that we will be able to deal with the baby boomer generation moving on to retirement.

Mr. Atkinson: Crisis? What crisis? In fairness, the Secretary of State is talking about something slightly different. I am talking in particular about those with company pensions and private provision pensions. They are the ones who have been putting their money in bricks and mortar and in commercial property to safeguard their future. They are the people who are hit by the Chancellor's ridiculous decision to cut the amount that can be put tax free into individual savings accounts and other investments.

I accept what the Secretary of State says—in the long term, of course there is a problem down the line for the basic state pension—but that is a different problem from the immediate crisis that this Chancellor has caused for those with private sector pensions. It is a shame that he had nothing to say about that. The one word that we did not hear, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) pointed out, is the magic word—prudence. Sadly, prudence is now dead and buried.

I want to make one or two other points about the problems facing business and to deal with the point made by the hon. Member for Wallasey about the welter of legislation, such as all the European directives. I agree that such measures must be simplified, but it is important to acknowledge their impact on growing and smaller businesses.

I represent a constituency in the north-east of England, which, as everyone knows, had a large number of old, declining industries such as coal, steel, chemicals and shipbuilding, which have long since been laid to rest. We needed to replace those, which we did with a large number of important high-tech inward investors. Some of them, such as the Nissan car company, have been tremendously successful, but others have been what might be described as false friends. They came here and made a contribution, but when economic circumstances changed they moved from the north-east to lower-cost economies. The lesson we have learned is that while they helped with the transition from the old heavy industries to a new type of economy, they are beginning to disappear.

Regions such as the north-east must now rely on home-grown industries. We in the north-east have been very successful in doing so and, to name a few, we now have companies such as Sage, Greggs of Gosforth, which was a little baker's shop but is now a national chain; the Go-Ahead group; and Reg Vardy in motor distribution. Those are great success stories, but we need many more. We will achieve that by building up our new smaller businesses, but regulation can damage them so much.

Regulations on discrimination, paternity leave and maternity leave are well intentioned, but for a small business employing three or four people they become a considerable burden in both time and expense. Letters and representations from local businesses in my constituency, which are mostly small businesses, show that such regulations are becoming a heavy burden that restrict their development. That fact must be taken on board when such matters are discussed.

Angela Eagle: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that consolidation and simplification of many different statutes, introducing a much-simplified and easier-to-understand statute, both for employees and employers, would improve the situation and not worsen it?

Mr. Atkinson: I wait to see the small print of what is produced and how it works, but in principle I agree that that would be desirable. When we have such a plethora of regulation, the way in which officialdom interprets it can often be the problem. In one area, enforcement can be draconian; in another, it can be more reasonable. Regulation in relation to access for disabled people requires a certain amount of common sense, and if common sense is not forthcoming, that can be very hard on a business. Such businesses need to grow, and we must not throw huge obstacles in their way. If the north-east is to rebuild itself and have a decent future, we need to encourage them, not discourage them.

I should also slightly chide the hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill). Yesterday, if I read my Financial Times correctly, referring to the concerns of the British Chambers of Commerce about over-regulation, he said that its figures were "statistically dubious" and that employers were "obsessed" with protesting against regulation. I disagree fundamentally. My experience is that they are genuinely worried about such regulation, and see it as possibly one of the biggest drawbacks to expanding and developing their business.

Mr. O'Neill: I was questioning, in the first instance, the rather haphazard way in which the British Chambers of Commerce conducted its survey. There was no real sampling—it was a self-selected group of people, who had perhaps replied by computer, and perhaps sent in forms. It was rather sloppy, and it did not stand up to close examination as an accurate expression of opinion of British business. It was more of a propaganda tool for a group of people who seemed to have as much a political as a business agenda.

Mr. Atkinson: I am not sure that I can complain about the hon. Gentleman's last comment, but I am grateful that he has put it on the record. I urge him and his Committee to bear it in mind that over-regulation, and bad regulation, is seen as one of the greatest drawbacks for business.

Regulation can also be amazingly trivial. There is a small butcher's shop in my constituency, which, because it is owned by a number of farmers, likes to put up a sign saying, "This lamb came from so-and-so's farm", or "This beef came from so-and-so's farm." It received a letter about how it should label meat, its interpretation of which was that all that could be displayed on the board was a holding number, which would be utterly meaningless. I wrote a series of letters to Lord Whitty to try to get to the bottom of the matter. I discovered that the shop can show which farm the lamb came from, but that if it wants to do the same for beef it needs to obtain permission from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and then get a form, which it can download. I worry slightly about chaps who work in the butcher's shop downloading forms from DEFRA. Nevertheless, they can download the form, fill it in, send it back on-line, and, I hope, get permission to put up a sign saying that the beef came from Joe Bloggs's farm. That is a silly example, but it nevertheless illustrates the kind of regulation with which people must deal these days.

[Mr. Atkinson]

The Chancellor was silent on many aspects of the economy about which we wanted to hear. He was silent on one little aspect that is not mentioned much here nowadays, although it is very important, certainly to my constituency. Although it is never mentioned in Budget speeches or economic debates, agriculture—which had a reasonable year last year—has had a disastrous year in terms of farm incomes this year, because of wet weather and the new single farm payments scheme, which is causing uncertainty about the way in which they are paid. There have also been hugely rising costs.

Rising costs affect all businesses, but one of the businesses that they affect most is agriculture. Fuel and imported fertiliser costs form a large part of the agriculture bill. At a time when incomes have fallen because of a poor harvest, the supermarkets are yet again pushing down the price that they pay dairy farmers. One of Asda's suppliers is reducing the price by 0.5p a litre, which is a serious blow to the dairy farming community.

There was nothing much, apart from a rant, in the Chancellor's speech. I hope that we shall hear more tomorrow about how he proposes to address the real problems that face so many people in this country today.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I am grateful for the chance to speak, and particularly grateful for the chance to speak in today's debate. The Queen's Speech includes measures on the economy that are fundamental to the well-being of my constituents, and will be fundamental to what happens next year when the election comes along. They affect my constituents particularly in two ways: they illustrate the Government's continuing commitment to economic stability, and they introduce important new provisions. Economic stability has been fundamental to the security enjoyed by my constituents in their homes and in their work, and to their sense of well-being under the present Government. It has made possible sustained investment in public services, which has also greatly improved my constituents' quality of life.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) said that none of that was visible. In particular, he said that the spending was not visible and that public sector spending was ineffective. That is certainly not true in Northampton. The change in the fortunes of people there under a Labour Government are extremely visible, and continue to be so.

I well remember, in the run-up to the 1997 election, taking our then housing spokesman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich and Woolwich (Mr. Raynsford)—now Minister for Local and Regional Government—to look at some repossessed houses. We thought that we would see one or two, but we saw rows and rows of them. Now repossessions are at record low levels because of low mortgage interest rates. I accept that the rates have gone up a little recently, but given higher employment and financial security, people have been able to maintain their mortgage payments. Unemployment has fallen further, by 28 per cent. in my constituency. The constituency has always had high employment levels, but this drop has made a substantial difference to the well-being and financial security of families who work.

As for public sector investment, one of the things that we inherited from the last Government was scandalously low pay in the public services. It is right that some of the extra money going into public services should deal with pay levels and employment conditions for the people who provide those services. But over and above that, such investment has transformed the prospects of many young people. For example, a £106 million private finance initiative scheme is rebuilding all our schools.

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) spoke persuasively about the problems that businesses encounter with regulation, and all of us can understand their frustration with red tape. But when I first became an MP, the local chamber of commerce's biggest complaint was the underperformance of schools and the skills gap. The extra investment in schools, particularly in secondary schools, is key to expanding the economy and creating the long-term security that the people of Northampton want.

Mr. Prisk: The hon. Lady is right: schooling, the calibre of individuals and the skills aspect of learning in particular are important issues. Given that she recognises that the burden of regulation is an important issue for small businesses, does she think that the 53 per cent. increase in such regulation since 1997 is a good thing or a bad thing?

Ms Keeble: As the hon. Gentleman may have noticed, I am not a particularly tribal politician. Small businesses usually consist of people who are simply earning an income for their families, and for that reason many banks have virtually turned their small business financial services into personal financial services. I recognise that those who run such businesses do not like filling in forms. Of course we want to see a reduction in regulation, and I understand people's complaints in that regard. Nevertheless, if we want to expand the economy, we come back to the major issue of skills shortages.

We should remember that this Government have made available the finance to expand small businesses. The investment in early years has been key to the economic well-being of families, particularly because it has enabled women to go out to work. One of the last things that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions did before getting his current job was to visit University college Northampton, a higher education college in my constituency that will shortly get university status. The expansion of university places, and what that says about our attitude to skills, has been extremely important to the economy.

I want to highlight some of the wallet-to-purse measures that, although I previously identified such criticism with the Liberal Democrats, both Opposition parties have criticised—such as the new deal for lone parents, the pension credit and investment in child care, particularly the children's trust fund. The new deal for lone parents has been transformative, in that it has enabled some of the most excluded of unemployed people to return to work. It has allowed some of the women to whom I have spoken to get work, to provide a role model for their children, and eventually to buy their own homes. Similar things can be said of the investment in child care.

The pension credit has its shortcomings, but anyone who tried to persuade a female pensioner—a lot of the recipients are indeed women—that they would be better off without their £5, £10 or £20 a week would receive a blunt suggestion about what to do with their argument. As we approach the election, it will be interesting to discover what such people have to say once it becomes clear that not only are the Conservatives taking a hostile attitude to many of the measures that provide equality for women—we are well used to their doing that—but the Liberal Democrats are doing the same.

I want to move on to a couple of the measures in the Queen's Speech. There is a child benefit Bill, which will provide for an extension of the education maintenance allowance. I suspect that it will be one of those measures, little heralded and little talked about in this place that will produce lasting benefits for many people. Support is already provided for more than 1,000 people in Northamptonshire, and the feedback that I receive from single parents who are struggling to ensure that their older children stay on at school rather than go out to work has been very positive. I am rather surprised that we have heard no comments about that from either the Liberal Democrats or the Conservatives. I quite understand that people may be waiting for Second Reading, but the fact remains that this provision has been piloted and is already out there, so I would have expected to hear some comments from the other two parties on the theory or practice of that support. The legislation will reach a particular section of the community and bring real benefits to my constituents. Not everyone among my constituents aspires to go to university—more's the pity, in some ways.

Mr. Willetts: I assure the hon. Lady that my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State for Education and Skills touched on the measure in his comments on the Queen's Speech, and welcomed the child benefit measures. His concern was with the introduction of new and higher charges for adult learners in further education colleges—another matter that we can debate further in the weeks ahead.

Ms Keeble: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for clarifying that point, and I wish that the Liberal Democrats would clarify their position, which their spokesperson today did not do.

Some of my colleagues have mentioned the consumer protection Bill, which will provide important safeguards for my constituents. People in Northampton carry high levels of credit. We all know that Christmas is coming, and this morning I was told by the housing and money advice centre, which provides an excellent service for my constituents, that on average people will spend about £800 in presents, about half of which is likely to be on credit. Consumer debt and the need for safeguards are important matters at this time. I welcome the fact that the Bill will make provision for much needed better regulation and raise the present £25,000 limit. On the subject of local debt, about half the people who had severe problems, with debts of about £9,000 or more, were not in work. In an area with relatively high levels of employment, that is quite surprising. One sure way to deal with debt problems is to deal with the problems of poverty and unemployment, and the Government are committed to doing so.

I greatly welcome the measures in the Queen's Speech, although there is always room for more to be done—not just in extra measures, but in speeding up those already in place. The ending of child poverty was mentioned earlier. I would greatly welcome that, as I would the speeding up of the extra safeguards for children, particularly in connection with housing. I am reminded that last Friday night I visited a constituent who lived with her five children in a single room in the basement of a bed-and-breakfast hostel, placed there by a Labour council—no, it was not a Labour council but a Conservative one. That was a Freudian slip. It used to be Labour, but is now Conservative and standards have deteriorated. For a woman with five children to live in a basement flat is not appropriate in 21st century Britain, and she was but one of three women who came to my advice surgery with that problem. I hope that we can speed up some of those measures.

I would also like to see improvements to pensions, as several of my hon. Friends have said. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is very aware of the issues around women's pensions and the problems that women face as long as basic state pensions are closely linked to national insurance contributions. The issue of first-time buyers is also important.

The main thing that will safeguard the interests of my constituents is having a Labour Government, and the main threats to their interests are the two main Opposition parties. As always happens in debates on the economy, people focus on the big picture and the macro-economy, but for many of our constituents the little picture is the big picture. The £5, £10 or £20 in pension credit is what makes a big difference to their lives. Being able to get their children into nursery schools and the investment in the child trust fund will also transform the lives of my constituents. The education maintenance allowance, too, will help single parents who are struggling to ensure that their children stay on in school and get the qualifications that they need in an expanding economy.

I very much welcome the measures in the Gracious Speech and I look forward in particular to the two Bills that I have mentioned becoming law well before the magic date of 1 May next year. When that day comes, my constituents will have had their letters about the child trust fund, which the Conservatives think that they should not have, some of them will be receiving the education maintenance allowance, and they will all continue to see the benefits of having a Labour Government.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): I wish to touch on three subjects that are fundamental to the Government's objective of building a stronger economy and an even fairer society—employment, training and opportunity for all. I also want to make some remarks about Britain's economic stability, because we have heard some wild and outrageous attacks on the competence and record of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, not least from the shadow Chancellor, who is not in his place.

[Paul Farrelly]

The House has already been reminded that the right hon. Gentleman was such an embarrassment to the Conservatives at the last election that he had to go into hiding. What was his offence? He had accidentally blurted out the truth about £20 billion of cuts—a lower level of cuts than he now promises openly under the party's new regime.

Mr. Prisk: Did not the Gershon report recommend a reduction in expenditure of £20 billion?

Paul Farrelly: We will have to wait for the Gershon report and we will all welcome debate on the James report when it is published.

The Opposition need a history lesson on economic competence that stretches further back than the one that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has already given them today. That is just as well, because this debate falls on an anniversary well worth remembering for my constituents. It is 20 years to the month that post-war unemployment peaked in Newcastle-under-Lyme. Today, after seven years of growth and stability under this Government, the number of people looking for work in my constituency stands at just over 700. Twenty years ago, the dole queue was longer by 4,500 people—six and a half times more people. That is a fair measure of how much outlook and opportunity have changed under a Labour Government.

Twenty years ago, north Staffordshire's oldest pottery firm had just bitten the dust. Elijah Cotton founded his firm in 1758, a year before Josiah Wedgwood started out on his own. However, Cotton's descendants lasted barely a year under Margaret Thatcher. We should remember that that industry was more than decimated as Geoffrey Howe unleashed raw, uneducated monetarism on this country.

Mr. Peter Atkinson: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that, had there been a Labour Government 20 years ago, that pottery factory would still be open and that men would still be working in the coal mines in his constituency?

Paul Farrelly: I shall come on to the beneficial inheritance of oil, especially for the Conservative Government. To set the record straight, under Labour, from 1976 until the 1979 general election, unemployment fell. It continued to fall until just a few months into the Tory Government, from which point it rose, rose and rose again.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor is fond of quoting the 15 per cent. level to which interest rates shot up during the second recession that the Tories unleashed on this country much later, in the 1990s. Today, as we know, rates are still below 5 per cent. Then, however, there was a worse bogey figure with which to scare the wee bairn: during the first savage downturn under Thatcher, rates reached 17 per cent. Sterling soared and yet more industry fell. By the time the monetarist experiment was killed off, quietly, during the Falklands war, one in six families in my area—north Staffordshire—had been hit by redundancy. There was no respite, however. Far from it. In 1985, the biggest mine in my area, Wolstanton—our super-pit, which we visited when I was at school there and which had the deepest shafts in western Europe—closed for good.

Let us compare that legacy with the current record. We have never had lower unemployment; we have never had more employment and regeneration. The unemployment figure for the whole country is 836,000—nearly half the total in 1997, when it was 1.6 million. Since 1997, the figure has fallen steadily. Under the Tories, when the Wolstanton pit closed, unemployment broke through the 3 million barrier for the first, but far from the last, time.

Early on, the Tories' record made a mockery of their infamous slogan, "Labour isn't working". Our record shows that people are working, businesses are working and Britain is working. Labour certainly is working.

As we heard earlier in the debate, we are educating and training, too, and what a record of Conservative failure we are trying to reverse on that score. Before the Tories got into power all those years ago, skills in the pottery industry in my area were supervised by the ceramics training board and pay negotiations were industry wide, but under the Tories there was no such thing as society. They swept all that away and it was every man for himself.

Members may not believe this, but at the Michelin factory in Stoke-on-Trent all those years ago, apprentices were given free milk, lunch tokens and sun-lamp sessions to keep them healthy. Remember what the Tories did to apprenticeships—they disappeared. I am not asking for the return of the sun-bed sessions—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, go on."] Some Front Benchers already benefit from them.

Over the past seven years, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has been doing his level best to reverse that legacy of neglect in education, skills and training. When I made my maiden speech, I called for the pilot schemes for the education maintenance allowance to be extended to my town and nationwide. They have been extended. In Stoke-on-Trent, next-door to my constituency, the EMA has already led to more children from poorer backgrounds staying in education and training after the age of 16. In my constituency, our version—the Newcastle achievement scheme—is having similar positive effects that everyone can measure. Conservative cuts would, of course, sweep all those opportunities away.

In my area, the Ceramic Resource Centre, a partnership between the Ceramic and Allied Trades Union—the potteries trade union—the DTI and our regional development agency, is helping workers to retrain and find new jobs. It also helps to preserve valuable industrial skills that would otherwise be lost. Tory and—I am sorry to say—Liberal Democrat cuts would sweep that away, too.

In Newcastle, the new deal has helped nearly 2,000 people into work. Of those, more than 1,200 have permanent jobs as a result. As we have already heard, the Tories and the Lib Dems would scrap the new deal. The Chancellor has done all that while presiding over the longest sustained period of economic growth for two centuries. There has been no savage boom and bust, unlike the early '80s, the late '80s and the early '90s under the Tories and yet, despite that, and despite their record, they have the nerve to cast aspersions on our competence, on the Chancellor's prudence and on his golden rule. Conveniently their memories fail them again.

Today, we should remember that we are not living in what should have been the heydays of the '80s and '90s, when the Government enjoyed a twin set of riches—booming tax receipts from North sea oil and untold billions from privatisation. Labour did not enjoy them in the 1970s either, when the country, like the international economy, was suffering oil shocks and when we were investing for the future in the North sea. Now, of course, we are having to prepare for a post-oil and gas economy too. But what did the Tories do with their one-off riches? Did they invest in education and skills? Did they invest in public services and the country's infrastructure? No. They blew it and threw it away.

I remember well—I was working for The Observer at the time—all the gloomy faces on the Tory Benches when the Government announced that they had raised £22.5 billion from the sale of the third generation of mobile telephone licences. That was worth three privatised BPs, five British Gases, two whole British Telecoms—worth as much, indeed, as was raised from the sale of the electricity, gas and water industries all put together under the Thatcher and Major Governments. And of course, unlike their sell-offs, it was not a botched sale below value. Great care was taken. Bidders went through a carefully crafted auction of 150 rounds. My right hon. and hon. Friends immersed themselves in the intricacies of game theory.

Now compare that care, competence and prudence with what went on before. I remember the privatisation of the National Bus Company in 1986. I remember it very well because I was working in the City at the time, with Barclays De Zoete Wedd, the bank charged with its sale. [Interruption.] I am not afraid to admit it. No sooner had Nicholas Ridley chopped the buses up into 90-odd pieces than the patchwork quilt was zipping itself up again as the first companies privatised started buying the rest, as we warned the Government that they would.

The Conservative Government ignored our advice too on insisting on clawbacks of the profit on the future sale of companies, which was standard procedure in the private sector. They ignored it, and what happened? Ten years later, they were at it again, breaking up British Rail, wrecking an industry, selling state assets at a discount to profiteers. They did not listen and they did not learn because they did not care. And here is the nub. How did they treat the money? Did they, like the Chancellor, treat it as a one-off to pay off debt, as any prudent household—in Grantham, for example—might be expected to do? No. Conservative Governments treated it as negative public expenditure. No wonder then, when the silver ran out, that the public finances were in such a mess. The Chancellor need take no lessons in competence and no lecturing from the Tories on his golden rule or his golden record.

I think that it was the last Chancellor but one, Mr. Norman Lamont, who said, quite callously, that high unemployment was a price worth paying for low inflation. Now we have record low inflation and record low unemployment. Of course, Lord Lamont's repertoire also includes the infamous, "Je ne regret rien", which he sang in his bath both before and after the pound was unceremoniously dumped out of the exchange rate mechanism. I gathered with others around the Reuters screen when I was working for Reuters, just as the Chancellor and the Prime Minister gathered around the Reuters screen at No. 10, and I remember that, when the interest rates had gone from 10 to 15 per cent., that was not the limit of it because overnight money rates trying to keep money in this country were reaching 70 per cent.—a far bigger bogey figure.

Mr. Prisk: I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's sunlamp-lit contribution, but can he confirm what the Chancellor said earlier—that the Chancellor voted in favour of going into the ERM?

Paul Farrelly: Quite right. We are all committed to a stronger Europe, but we did not decide the level at which we entered the ERM, out of which we were then unceremoniously dumped. [Interruption.] I will say one thing to the hon. Gentleman. The Tories are nothing if not consistent: they learn nothing and they still regret nothing. The shadow Chancellor's promised tax cuts and massive spending cuts are the sort of fairy-tale accounting that we saw for 18 long years.

The Tories had a black Monday when their bubble burst in the 1980s. They had a black Wednesday when their reputation was ruined with the ERM fiasco in the 1990s. Some time very soon, they will have a black Thursday when the Government's economic and social achievements condemn them to a third successive defeat at the next general election.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I call Mr. Jim Cunningham.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

6.15 pm

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): I did not know I was so popular.

It has been an enlightening afternoon listening to the Opposition. They said the Chancellor was ranting. I thought he said one or two interesting things. Very little has been said about how he has led the way on third world debt, which has been acknowledged internationally. He also touched on the new vaccine that will help people to combat AIDS in the third world. It was not all a rant; his speech contained some positive things. On the other hand, the shadow Chancellor never gave us any alternative. He said that we would all know what was going to happen a couple of months down the road. That was enlightening. So if anybody ranted, it was the shadow Chancellor.

The Liberal Democrats raised the issue of tax credits in terms of research and development. I do not know whether they know this, but research and development is a hefty cost in any industry. When that is linked to companies, and taking into consideration the input from universities—many of which are funded by research and development money—it is clear how vital it is to British industry. If we do not put money into research and development, we will lose out in trade, exports and balance of payments and we will have problems.

[Mr. Jim Cunningham]

The other thing that surprised me was that the Liberal Democrats did not offer a replacement. It is not good enough to say that the money will be taken anyway because it will be on offer. In fact, I and a number of others used to go with the trade union movement to lobby the Department of Trade and Industry under the Conservative Government to get money pumped into research and development. Anyone could see that if we did not do that, the country would run into serious problems. As time has proved, the current Goverament are having to put money into not only research and development, but technology education to teach people how to use that technology.

When I am talking about industry, it would be remiss of me not to mention the useful demonstration in Coventry on Saturday to show the feeling about Ford's arbitrary decision to close the Browns Lane plant. Ford entered into an agreement in 1998 that if the work force increased its productivity and quality, further investment would follow for new models to be built at that plant. It was used as an example up and down the country, certainly in Ford plants, as the road the labour force should go down to secure their future. What did they get in return? A slap in the face, because the factory is closing.

In debates on the economy, successive Governments have exhorted the labour force to increase quality and productivity. The Government encourage it, the workers do it and there are relevant orders, but the plant gets closed. What signal does that send to the labour force up and down the country? We know that we have to be competitive. We have to improve quality, technology and other things. I could not let that closure go without mentioning it. The year before, it was Massey Ferguson in Coventry. Under the previous Administration, it was the Standard motor car company.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill), the Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, mentioned Peugeot, which has a grant to use on development. We are waiting to see how that money will be used. We Members of the Parliament and the Government have to keep an eye on the companies. We must not forget that Ford got about £85 million in Government grants. It has been suggested that it would probably be cheaper to keep the Browns Lane plant open than to close it, but we have all heard that sort of suggestion. The company has given us all sorts of assurances about the Whitley plant, but if it has broken the assurances it gave us four or five years ago, why should we believe the company now? Ford tells us that it has exciting plans, but why should we believe the company when it has broken an agreement?

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Paul Farrelly), I remember when we joined the ERM and the consequences of doing so. I remember when interest rates went through the roof and when they changed three times in one day; that did not stabilise the money markets, did it? The Conservatives say that we will have to borrow as a result of the Chancellor's Budgets, but they forget that they borrowed £50 billion. Of every pound paid in interest, 50p came from the taxpayers' pocket. We should not let the Opposition get away with some of the things that they have said today.

Opposition Members have talked about old-age pensioners, but I remember coming down on a Friday morning trying to get winter chill payments passed. When the Conservatives were in Government, they blocked the measure time and again. I also remember the Conservatives increasing VAT on fuel; was that going to help pensioners? It was the Labour Government who reduced it. We have long memories. We know what the Conservatives are capable of doing in government and no matter how they try to dress it up, their past will come back to haunt them. I am sure that most of us remember negative equity; Opposition Members have talked about rising house prices today, but I am sure that most people would agree that negative equity is far worse.

Mr. Allan: Before the hon. Gentleman complains too loudly about negative equity, he should look at some of the forecasts that suggest that it might return in the near future.

Mr. Cunningham: I like to look on the bright side of life. Opposition Members are full of doom and gloom, but it is part of their job to exaggerate and twist figures.

The CSA has been mentioned, but I seem to remember that it was the Conservatives who introduced the Horizon project, which cost about £500 million and then cost about £90 million to put right. We should not let the Conservatives forget that they introduced some of the systems that we are suffering today. If we have problems, they are the ones who started them.

The Government have done some positive things. The introduction of the national minimum wage was a milestone in many ways and it has steadily been increased since its introduction. I do not think that employers see it as a fair rate; we can debate the proper level for the national minimum wage, but I do not think that employers use it as a benchmark. That was a red herring that someone introduced into the debate.

The Opposition failed to mention that although pensioners can now take their giro cheque to a post office and get it cashed, there is concern about bank charges. Ministers are aware of this, because we have raised it with them. Some banks are charging about £1.50 to cash a pension cheque, and I hope that my hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench will look into that.

The Opposition have not set out their policies. It is all very well for them to attack, but it is no use if they do not do so constructively, which involves saying what they would do. It was interesting to note the Opposition parties' proposals on assistance for small businesses. The Liberals want to abolish the Department of Trade and Industry and the Tories want to restrict its sphere of interest, yet both say that they want to help small businesses. Their proposals are a contradiction in terms: they want to help industry but to cut the means to do it. When the proposals are analysed by others outside the House, the problems will be seen.

Mr. John Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cunningham: Yes. I always give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Taylor: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his characteristic courtesy in giving way. May I suggest that there is not quite the anomaly that he suggests? One of the best ways of helping small businesses is to leave them alone.

Mr. Cunningham: I am sure that everybody would agree that we should leave them alone, but we must think about health and safety. There must be some regulations in place. There is an argument about red tape and regulation but we should not forget that health and safety issues are part of that. We will debate corporate manslaughter, for example, and it is clear that regulations have many meanings. We have minimum wage regulations. The Opposition raised the issue of regulations from Europe, and I remind them that when they were in government they brought in more regulations from Europe than any other Administration. They would deny that, but the Council of Ministers approved the regulations and read them into the British system—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend referred to the need for improved health and safety. Does he agree that one of the welcome intentions flagged up in the Queen's Speech was the legislation relating to corporate manslaughter? If more attention had been given over many years to the highest of standards for health and safety, there would be less need to act on corporate manslaughter in cases where that has tragically been the position.

Mr. Cunningham: As someone who worked in industry, I always think that it is a tragedy when it is necessary to introduce legislation to get employers to act as good employers. They have a duty of care. For too long employers have been getting away with many things that they should not have been allowed to ignore.

I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate. It has certainly been interesting to listen to the speeches of Opposition Members. They do not have any policies and want to postpone any answers to the questions that we put to them. If we were to listen to the main Opposition party, the Conservatives, we would be back to the days of boom and bust. So far, all we have had from the Opposition Benches is baloney.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): I begin by drawing the attention of the House to my entry in the Register of Members' Interests.

As we come to the end of the debate on the Queen's Speech, perhaps as well as covering some of the Bills that are in the speech I might ask about one or two Bills that are not in it. We are in a strange position because we have all the Bills that have been announced in the Queen's Speech but if there is an election next May, as we have been told, very few of them are likely to come into law. [HON. MEMBERS: "Who told you that?"] We know from Mrs. Blair. What greater authority could there be? There is also The Sun. If they agree, who are we to disagree? If we have Mr. Trevor Kavanagh and Mrs. Cherie Blair saying that it will be 5 May, I think we can work on the basis that that is quite likely.

A great deal of legislation has been announced in the Queen's Speech that may never have the force of law, but I wonder whether the Secretary of State could cast any light on a measure that might well enter into law though it was not referred to in the Queen's Speech: the judicial pensions Bill. For some strange reason it was not referred to but there was then a press release from the Lord Chancellor's Department announcing it. It appeared on the Lord Chancellor's website as an item of legislation, but it has since been removed.

I am perplexed as to the status of the Bill. As it has "pensions" in the title and as the Secretary of State has "pensions" in his title, there might be a chance that he can tell us what is happening. We would be interested to hear from him about the status of the Bill. We very much look forward to watching Labour Members walk through the Division Lobby to vote for judges to have a pension of more than £1.5 million. I am sure they will enjoy that. I should make it clear that we, the Opposition, believe in good pensions for the many, not just the few. We look forward to hearing the arguments that the Secretary of State and his Front-Bench colleagues advance for special arrangements for the few rather than the many. That is one piece of legislation that may or may not come into law. We hope that the Secretary of State will explain the position.

There is also the problem of age discrimination, to which the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) alluded. She set the Chamber alight with a reference to post- neo-classical endogenous growth theory, and went on to talk about the importance of tackling age discrimination following the European Union directive that was agreed several years ago. In a parliamentary answer on the subject—and I have checked this—the right hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), who used to be Minister for Pensions, said that legislation would be "forthcoming" in 2003. It has been forthcoming for an awfully long time, so it would be interesting to know from the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the timetable is. The Government have already failed to meet their objective of introducing draft legislation by the summer, so what is their position on age discrimination?

The Queen's Speech, of course, includes an Identity Cards Bill. My right hon. Friend the shadow Home Secretary has already asked some telling questions about ID cards that need to be answered. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) made some powerful points about the issue, drawing on his expertise in IT projects. The introduction of identity cards would involve a major Government IT project—indeed, it would be one of the biggest in the country. I was wondering which member of the Government would want to have a word with the Home Secretary about running such projects. Perhaps it would be the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who could say a quick word about his success with the Child Support Agency computers. Perhaps the Paymaster General would like to chip in with her success with child tax credits. We have two ideal witnesses to testify to the success of large-scale IT projects, and I am sure that the Home Secretary would be interested to hear exactly how they have done it, and pick up tips from the CSA and child tax credit projects as he embarks on his even more ambitious project.

The Government believe that they need to tackle the problem of insecurity, and the Home Secretary claims that his measures will increase our security. The theme behind several interventions and speeches today, however, is insecurity in the economic arena. Financial insecurity is at least important as physical security, and is an equally niggling anxiety. The Chancellor's record has exposed the British economy and individuals in the country to a range of insecurities, including the balance of payments deficit, the budget deficit, and the problems of economic inactivity and insufficient savings. It is a pity that he is not in the Chamber. [HON. MEMBERS: "He has just arrived."] Ah, he has entered on cue, adding another touch of pantomime to the several that we have had in our debate. For example, his latest claim is that we are supposed to be responsible for £70 billion of cuts. As he becomes more desperate, so the figure grows absurdly large. His arguments, however, were demolished very effectively by my hon. Friends the Members for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) and for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown).

As the Chancellor is here, let me talk about the four imbalances in our economy that are a threat to the security that we all want our fellow citizens to enjoy. First, the balance of payments deficit, as my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) skilfully pointed out, is a crucial piece of evidence in a modern global economy. It shows that our economy faces demand far in excess of its ability to match it with supply. Even if we do not have growing inflation, a growing balance of payments deficit is evidence of an imbalance, and the Chancellor clearly lost the exchange with my hon. Friend.

The second imbalance is the growing budget deficit. If the economy is doing so well, as the Chancellor claims, why is the deficit deteriorating steadily? Why, at this stage of the economic cycle, this year, can we see such a large fiscal deficit? It was disappointing that the Chancellor failed to engage with all the warnings that he was in danger of breaking his own golden rule. He seems to be in a world where we do not face any long-term fiscal problems as a result of his policies. Let me quote to him what he said on the "Today" programme on Monday 18 November. He said that > "in the Euro area pensions expenditure is 10 per cent. of national income and is due to rise to 15 per cent. over the next 30 or 40 years. And that's why major reforms are taking place in pensions in Germany, France and elsewhere. But in Britain the picture is one where we have 5 per cent. of our national income spent on pensions. It is a perfectly sustainable position over the longer term."

Does the Chancellor really believe that with his pensions policies, public expenditure on pensions will be 5 per cent. of our national income from now till kingdom come? It is already higher than that. If he read the Turner commission report, which brings together fully all the different items of expenditure on pensions and includes not just the basic pension but expenditure on all the means-tested benefits for pensioners and public sector pensions, which he tries to hide away, he would see that the figure is already more than 6 per cent. and is forecast to rise still higher. With his policies, we are converging with Europe on one of the continent's worst problems—growing public expenditure on pensions. An earnings-linked pension credit going to three quarters of pensioners or more has not been factored into his calculations.

It is not just the flow of expenditure but the liability and the stock of debt that are problems. The Chancellor talks about how he has brought down the national debt, and we heard that again from the Labour Benches. A truer measure of the national debt would include the liability to pay public sector pensions in the future. If the cost of public sector pension promises is included, the true national debt has risen under the Government by 5 per cent. of gross domestic product, as the expensive promises to pay public sector pensions have racked up.

So we have problems on the balance of payments and on the fiscal policy. Let me speak briefly about unemployment and economic inactivity. We have heard from several Labour Members how unemployment has fallen, but more than half the fall in official unemployment has been offset by a rise in economic inactivity. There are more people who are economically inactive—out of the labour market—in Britain today than at any time for the past 20 years. People are being driven out of the labour market altogether. That is what is happening under this Government. The problem is affecting some of the groups that they claim to care about most.

I am sure the Chancellor is familiar with table 14 of the labour market statistics produced every month. The figures for economic activity and inactivity show that for people aged under 25, the total number who are either unemployed and not in full-time education or economically inactive and not in full-time education is 1.112 million. That is a higher number of young people who are not working, studying or training than when the Government came to office in 1997. That is a lost generation of more than a million young people.

The position is deteriorating. Despite everything we hear about the new deal for young people, the figures represent a deterioration on the position that the Government inherited. That is why we say that the new deal for young people is not working. We have heard in the past from the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, and I must correct him. He has claimed:

> "We've virtually eradicated long-term youth unemployment".

Again, on the Government's own survey measure, the latest figures show that there are more than 150,000 young people aged 18 to 24 who have been unemployed for more than six months. There is a problem of young people who cannot find jobs, who are out of the labour market, who are not studying, training or working, and it is a pity that the Government do not engage with that, instead of endlessly repeating their mantras about the new deal.

Rob Marris: Will the hon. Gentleman switch focus to the first line of the amendment to which he has put his name, which discusses reducing regulation? He has had five hours to think up an answer to this: will he tell the House three regulations that he thinks should be revoked?

Mr. Willetts: We have made it clear that we will reverse many regulations. I will not fall for a desperate attempt to divert me from my critique of this Government's failure to tackle inactivity and unemployment. I want to discuss the failure of the new deal for lone parents, which several hon. Members have discussed. The Chancellor may be one of the few people who reads with relish the evaluations of the schemes that he invents, but it is a pity that he does change his policies in the light of the evidence.

I shall quote an evaluation of lone parent work-focused interviews, which are an important part of the new deal for lone parents, published earlier this year. The research report by outside academics states:

"The Introduction of Lone Parent Work Focused Interviews brought about no detectable change in exit rates from Income Support for eligible new or repeat claimants".

That is the evidence about the failure of the Chancellor's schemes, which is why we are so sceptical.

Finally, I shall discuss the pensions crisis and the amount that we, as a nation, are saving. I pay tribute to the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, who has taken a novel and refreshing approach to his job. He has given up defending Government policy, and I wonder whether the Chancellor knows exactly what his colleague gets up to. I am not sure that the Granita pact permits the Secretary of State to make these statements, because I thought that it meant that the Chancellor determines such matters.

On the pension credit, the Secretary of State has said:

"we should not talk in euphemisms. It is a means test."—[Official Report, 13 October 2004; Vol. 425, c. 302.]

and

"It would be crazy to say"— that means-testing—

"did not act as a disincentive to some people."

At a conference, he admitted that the Government

"still has a take up problem on Pension Credit."

He has wholeheartedly endorsed all the arguments put by Conservative Members.

This is the Secretary of State's most ambitious statement of the lot:

"People feel there is no reward for playing by the rules, and one of the critical areas is pension provision. We have to bite the bullet and look at the state pension system, certainly for the longer term, so that if you do a lifetime's work, it will deliver a pension above the basic level of means-tested support."

That is it. We would not abolish the pension credit, but we want to see a pension with a value higher than that of means-tested support. We welcome the Secretary of State's conversion, but it would be great to hear the Chancellor endorse his colleague's analysis of what is wrong with our pensions system.

Conservative Members look forward to a constructive and reasonable debate about how we can gradually get pensioners off means-tested benefits, create incentives to save and tackle the problem of the 1.7 million pensioners who are entitled to pension credit but do not claim it. The objective should be to get a basic pension with a value higher than that of the pension credit, which is why we endorse the imaginative thoughts advanced by the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. It is slightly unfortunate that those thoughts are not yet official Government policy, but given that the Chancellor is aware of his Secretary of State's strong views, it is only a matter of time.

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): The debate has been interesting and informative. At the outset, we found out that the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the shadow Chancellor, has been a long-time advocate of independence for the Bank of England setting interest rates—it was fascinating stuff. He presumably argued the case at dinner parties all over north or south London, and perhaps he grabbed strangers on long train journeys to tell them that it was the thing to do. When he entered the House as a Member of Parliament and went through the Lobby, however, he voted against independence for the Bank of England.

The Chancellor ate the shadow Chancellor alive, but left a little bit over for cold sandwiches tomorrow.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Alan Johnson: Not yet; I will later.

The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who is just taking his seat, gave a winsome and ruminative little speech in which he acknowledged the success of our economic stewardship, but expressed scepticism, if not disparagement, about the research and development tax credit. He continued his party's vicious and sinister vendetta against the Department of Trade and Industry. He might like to know that when I was a Minister at the DTI and that policy first emerged, I went to tell my staff, because I thought that they should know about it. I said, "Look, if there's a Lib Dem Government you're going to lose your jobs." They took that as a guarantee of job security, which was not what I intended to convey.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) spoke eloquently about the need to meet the challenge of the huge investment in science and skills that is taking place in the Asian economies. He used his enormous expertise and experience in this field to warn us of some of the problems that we will face.

My right hon. Friend also talked about means-testing, comparing its use as a means of targeting pension credit with what went on under the previous Government—never mind going back to the '30s. Let me make this absolutely clear to the hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), because he invited me to do so. When we came into Government we found that 2.8 million pensioners were living in abject poverty. The Conservatives are experts on pensioner poverty, but unfortunately experts on creating, not alleviating, the problem. Those 2.8 million pensioners needed help and assistance immediately. The hon. Member for Havant argues, in effect, that we should have told them—many were in their eighties, and two thirds were women—that the problem with giving them the kind of income increase that they really needed was that it could create a savings disincentive in future. I find that argument incredible. In government we have tackled the real pensions crisis, and we should be proud that we have reduced absolute poverty for pensioners by two thirds and taken 1.8 million pensioners out of poverty.

I do not accept that a 32-year-old accountant in the City who is looking at a lump of money and deciding whether to go to Lanzarote for a fortnight, spend it on a new car or put it into a savings scheme says, "Hold on—there's this thing called pension credit that may well affect my savings in years to come." In fact, it would be a good thing if people looked that far ahead.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con) rose—

Alan Johnson: I will take interventions from Members who were in the Chamber during the debate.

I do not accept that we are looking at marginal tax rates of 40 per cent. Under the previous Government, the marginal tax rate on benefits was 100 per cent.—pound for pound withdrawal. But when we introduce a system whereby there is, for the first time, a 40p in the pound withdrawal rate so that people are not penalised for their savings, we are told that it is a tax. It is a strange tax that pays people money—an average of £41 a week with £1,000 arrears to 3.2 million pensioners—but it is certainly one of which we will be proud to take ownership.

Mr. Flight: May I point out to the Minister that our proposals do not involve abolishing the pension credit? How does he explain the fact that there has been a huge increase in the number of people without private sector pension savings? It has gone up to nearly 11.5 million people—virtually half the labour force—and has risen very substantially since the pension credit.

Alan Johnson: I shall deal with that shortly. The hon. Gentleman made a thoughtful contribution and I shall tackle his point. Let me address his first point. The policy of Her Majesty's official Opposition is to restore the earnings link. Several hon. Members said that we should accept that, if we are to work, perhaps in a bipartisan way, genuinely to tackle the problems that the Pensions Commission set out, we must ensure that pensions are fair, equitable, attack pensioner poverty and sustainable, not only now but in future.

At the beginning of the debate on the Queen's Speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Alan Howarth) intervened on the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) to say that Conservative policy on restoring the earnings link would mean a commitment of £98 billion in 2050. The right hon. and learned Gentleman replied:

"I think that ... pensioners are more interested in the real difficulties that they face today than in what might happen in 2050."

I despair. If the Conservative party does not consider the sustainability of its policy, it betrays future generations of pensioners and taxpayers.

Of course, the Conservative party removed the link with earnings. The hon. Member for Havant said only two years ago that restoring the earnings link would be an expensive error, but more recently he said that withdrawing the link had been a mistake. However, when it was pointed out to the Leader of the Opposition that he was a member of the Cabinet when the earnings link was withdrawn, he said:

"It was the right thing to do then, and restoring the link is the right thing to do now."—[Official Report, 23 November 2004; Vol. 428, c. 17.]

When will it be the right time to break the link again? It is already unsustainable, not only in 2050 but in four years. There is a gap of £500 million in Conservative funding plans. Conservative Members say that they will sustain the link for four, not five years.

Mr. Willetts rose—

Alan Johnson: I shall let the hon. Gentleman explain his policy. However, I say to the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Mr. Flight) that the Conservative party, on its figures, will send pensioners backwards from pensions of 20 per cent. of average earnings to pensions of 16 per cent. of average earnings.

Mr. Willetts: If the Secretary of State wants a rational debate on long-term costings, we need to know the Government's estimate of the long-term cost of increasing the pension credit by earnings from now to 2050. During that time, it will spread to more than three quarters of pensioners. Does not he accept that outside estimates of the cost reach £120 billion a year? That is why I said earlier that we need a grown-up recognition from the Chancellor of the cost of his policies. We could then have a rational debate.

Alan Johnson: That is fascinating. In the Queen's Speech debate a week ago, the Leader of the Opposition said that the important issue is what pensioners want now, not in the future. Today, the hon. Member for Havant says that what happens in future is important. We have said that we will link pension credit to earnings for this Parliament.

Mr. Willetts: Then?

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman must wait and see what happens in future Parliaments, but we are committed to eradicating pensioner poverty. The Conservative party, having created that poverty, now espouses a policy whereby poorer pensioners will go backwards rather than forwards.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs is one of a brigade of former shadow Chief Secretaries who have popped up today. He made a point about private pensions, which he repeated in his intervention. There are two points to make.

First, the hon. Gentleman tried to argue that the reforms to advance corporation tax created the problem. The Turner commission did not reach that conclusion. It pointed out, among other things, that in the 1980s, a Conservative Chancellor insisted that pension funds could not be funded by more than 5 per cent. above 100 per cent.—setting a 105 per cent. cap—and created a problem that forced pension funds to get rid of surpluses because they could not put any more money into the funds. That point was made earlier. The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs, in seeking to use that argument, forgets that many companies during the 1980s—redundancies then and in the early '90s were running at 16 for every 1,000 workers, whereas they now run at four for every 1,000—had to raid their pension funds to pay for early voluntary retirement. That is a major reason for the current problems.

The hon. Gentleman also talked about the wonderful world—the nirvana—in which we lived during the late '90s. The Turner report calls that a fool's paradise and makes it absolutely clear that these problems started in the early '80s. Anyone who thinks that we inherited a wonderful position for pensioners should remember that they were in abject poverty and that there was mis-selling of pensions. Pensions had gone up only once in 18 years. Why did they go up? They went up because the previous Government put VAT on fuel. To suggest that that was a wonderful world for pensioners is pretty perverse.

A good contribution was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill), who raised the important point about the lack of trust in financial institutions, which is an issue that needs to be overcome. He also referred to the fragility of the engineering supply chain and the importance of retaining fiscal incentives.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) has a fabulously named constituency; it seems that people are now naming their constituencies after my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. The hon. Gentleman spoke well about the need for further liberalisation of the European Union energy market and said that the Queen's Speech is an election gimmick. I concede that his party does not know much about Queen's Speeches, but it certainly is an expert on election gimmicks.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Denzil Davies) made an extremely important point about the Government's strong economic record.

When the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk) made his speech, my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury, who was sitting next to me, said that it showed what a loss the hon. Gentleman is to the Opposition Treasury team. He made a thoughtful speech and, although I do not agree with him, he is a doughty defender of small businesses.

We heard good contributions from my right hon. Friend the Member for Coatbridge and Chryston (Mr. Clarke) and from the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), who made a good point about IT and spoke knowledgeably on the subject. In fact, he spoke so knowledgeably that I am thinking of hiring him to work with me at the Department for Work and Pensions.

Indeed, today, I sent an explanation of what happened last week to the hon. Member for Havant; it might be an inverted analogy for what is happening in today's Conservative party. We were doing a software upgrade and it all went wrong, but our mainframes were not affected. In the Letwinisation of the Conservative party, the Opposition are attempting a software upgrade, but unfortunately their mainframes have collapsed completely.

I am sorry that I cannot cover all the contributions made by right hon. and hon. Members in what has been an important, entertaining and interesting debate.

This Government have built a legislative programme that embraces the challenges of the future. It is built on the foundations of economic stability and prosperity; the longest period of sustained economic growth on record—growth every quarter since 1997; the lowest inflation and lowest sustained interest rates for 30 years; and unemployment at its lowest for a generation with 2 million more people in work since 1997. We all remember that Roger McGough turned a newspaper headline into a great three-line poem. The headline was, "Conservative Government Unemployment Figures"; the poem was, "Conservative Government. Unemployment? Figures."

I commend these measures to the House.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, as follows:

Most Gracious Sovereign.

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom and Great Britain and Northern Ireland, in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Majesty for the Gracious Speech which Your Majesty has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

To be presented by Privy Councillors or Members of Her Majesty's Household.

PETITIONS

Traveller Sites

7.40 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): It is my privilege and honour to present a petition bearing more than 1,000 names taken in my constituency. It expresses the anger and frustration that many people feel about the Government's disjointed policy on Travellers' sites and travelling people. The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The petition of residents of North Essex,

Declares that Colchester Borough Council and Essex County Council have been forced to consider locating permanent travellers' sites on greenfield areas—where no development would normally be allowed and which would damage the value of surrounding properties—because, in the absence of a designated site, travellers and others have acquired excessive rights to occupy and spoil private land in the area.

The petitioners further declare that Colchester Borough and Essex County Councils should reject proposals for a travellers' site at Severalls Lane or the Crown Interchange just north of Colchester.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons calls upon the Deputy Prime Minister to introduce legislation to enable local councils to protect the interests of those they are elected to serve, including genuine travelling people, by transferring to local councils complete responsibility for Travellers and their activities within their local areas.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Primary Schools (Stevenage)

7.41 pm

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): It is my honour to present a petition on behalf of 11,000 residents of Stevenage who wish to express their anger and dismay at the actions taken by Conservative Hertfordshire county council to try to close four schools in the southern half of Stevenage.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of residents of Stevenage,

Declares that the consultation document 'Raising achievement in Stevenage, reducing the Number of Primary Places' proposes the closure of Longmeadow Infant, Longmeadow Junior Burydale Junior and Shephall Green Infant and Nursery Schools and the establishment of a new school on the sites of Burydale and Longmeadow. The Petitioners reject this proposal on the grounds that the consultation process was flawed.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Education and Skills to ensure that further consultation on the future of primary education in Stevenage—taking into account demographic projections and other options—is undertaken.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Coroners' Courts

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Ms Bridget Prentice.]

7.43 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): No one could reasonably say that coroners' courts are not important. When the Harry Stanley inquest said that Mr. Stanley was unlawfully killed, it threw into crisis the whole of the Metropolitan police's armed police response in London. When the coroner in the inquest on Joseph Scholes' death wrote to the Home Secretary requesting a public inquiry, it cast a spotlight on the dangers of suicide when we lock up children in detention. If our system for registration of deaths and coroners' investigations is inadequate, the impact can be severe. To illustrate, I pose this question: could we not have detected sooner the murderous activities of the general practitioner Harold Shipman? I add immediately that the third report of the Shipman inquiry made it clear that it was not the individuals working in the system who were to blame for Dr. Shipman's long run of murdering patients in Hyde, but the system itself.

I asked for this debate precisely because coroners' courts are important. Alongside the registration of deaths, they should provide a reliable system for collecting data on deaths and monitoring trends in deaths. They should provide an adequate investigation into suspicious deaths, to uncover wrongdoing or to provide reassurance as appropriate. They should provide also a thorough and sensitive service for the relatives of those who die suddenly and unexpectedly. Indeed, they should provide advice and guidance to us all on how to prevent avoidable deaths. They should provide the means of dealing with inquiries into mass deaths after major disasters.

The present system does not have the appearance of a modern and effective service able to respond to public concerns over deaths, whether of individuals or of groups, and to command public confidence. Nor does the Government's response to the reports that have exposed the failings of the present system and made recommendations for reform, which I shall come to, suggest that they are giving to the improvement of the system the priority that its importance demands.

In criticising the current state of the system for registering deaths, investigating them and holding inquests, I am not making any adverse judgment on the 120 or so coroners—their number fluctuates, but there are 23 full-timers—and their support staff and investigators. I am sure that most of them are hard-working and dedicated, but they are working with statutory powers and procedures that were established in a different era.

It is my case that there are serious and obvious flaws in the current arrangements, and that those have been drawn repeatedly to the Government's attention, yet the Government have not acted to put them right with the urgency that the situation requires. Action is required at two levels, legislative and administrative. I can understand that securing a slot in the Government's legislative programme may take time, but there is no reason why the urgency of the need for change cannot start to be met by administrative actions straightaway.

I move on to the reports that show the need for reform. I shall call the first one the Luce report, after Mr. Tom Luce, the former head of social care policy in the Department of Health, who chaired the review team for the report called "Death Certification and Investigation in England, Wales and Northern Ireland—The Report of a Fundamental Review 2003", Cm. 5831. At the front of the report is printed the review team's letter to the Home Office, dated 28 April 2003, which states:

> "During the last three-quarters of a century, the Government has twice commissioned reviews of these subjects, in 1936 and 1965. Very little happened in response to their reports. The services are showing the consequences of this neglect."

The first lines of the report read:

> "The systems in England, Wales and Northern Ireland for the certification of most deaths by doctors and the investigation of others by coroners have been seriously neglected over many decades. They must undergo radical change if they are to become fit for the purposes of a modern society and capable of meeting future challenges. The need for reform is widely recognised and supported."

I would add to that that there are other high-profile cases that demonstrate the need for an effective system to be in place. I have already mentioned the case of Harold Shipman, whose unlawful killings were counted in hundreds. To that I would add great disasters like the Bowbelle/Marchioness incident, and more recently the rail crashes at Ladbroke Grove and Potters Bar.

In addition to these obvious demands for a modern service there are linked issues demanding a strategic response from a modern coroner system. For example, article 2 of the European convention on human rights is about a state's obligation to protect the lives of its citizens, which the courts have ruled implies an obligation to investigate deaths. There is the White Paper entitled "Civil Registration: Vital Change", and registration changes are happening now. A more weighty inquiry is needed where there are deaths capable of causing serious damage to public confidence—for example, the death of the Government scientist, David Kelly. Perhaps not everyone appreciates this, but the Hutton inquiry into the allegations surrounding the death of David Kelly was also the inquest into his death, thanks to an addition to the Access to Justice Act 1999 that was well secured by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore).

Most recently, the inquiries into the Shipman deaths provide more evidence for my arguments. The third report surveyed the present state of the coroners service and described coroners' resources as varying widely. It mentioned that some coroners worked from home. It describes a situation in which there is virtually no training, and the training that is available is not compulsory. It says that coroners operate in isolation, and receive little advice or guidance. There is no leadership structure and no reasonable process for complaints and appeals. In fact, a coroner's inquest can be challenged only through judicial review. The Shipman inquiry said that coroners should have consistent quality standards, training, leadership, a wider range of investigative methods and greater powers.

As for handling of the reports in the media, an article in The Guardian on the Luce report carried the headline, "Coroners face big shake-up after 800 years". It said that the report recommended a package of sweeping reforms—bereaved relatives would have much stronger rights at inquest, and coroners would be able to deliver fuller verdicts. It talked about the "forgotten" coroner service, and pointed out that it needed radical change after decades of neglect. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Paul Goggins), who will respond to the debate tonight, is quoted as saying:

"The shortcomings in the current system have been increasingly evidenced and it is essential that we build an effective, supportive and transparent system that commands public confidence".

The Guardian began an article on the third report of the Shipman inquiry thus:

"All deaths, including those that do not appear suspicious, must be investigated to ensure that murders such as those committed by Britain's worst serial killer, Harold Shipman, do not go undetected".

Dame Janet Smith, who presided over the inquiry, identified an urgent need for a more focused, professional and consistent approach to coroners' investigations. She said:

"There must be radical reform and a complete break from the past, as to organisation, philosophy, sense of purpose and mode of operation".

In a joint statement, the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Health said that work was already under way to identify how best to reform the coroner system.

Eventually, in March this year the Home Office produced a position paper proposing a coherent system based on full-time coroners with legal qualifications, closely supported by appropriate medical expertise, together with tighter rules for death certification, notification of all deaths to coroners and stronger support for scrutinising cases and investigation where necessary. A coroner and burial team was set up. In a news release, the Minister said:

"The proposals outlined today will introduce a new system that will combine an independent check on all deaths and a professional oversight of death patterns with, for the majority of cases, the minimum of bureaucracy".

A BBC news report on the Home Office plans suggested that those changes had taken place. It said that all deaths would be referred to an independent medical examiner and that a wide-ranging review would result in the numbers falling from 127 part-time coroners to a total of 40 to 60 full-time coroners. Coroners have been handed new powers to seize documents, and the reforms will change the way in which verdicts are recorded, doing away with terms such as "suicide" and "misadventure" and replacing them with a short narrative account of the facts of the death.

The Minister was reported as saying that the proposals would prevent an individual doctor from being able to ensure that someone was buried without any further scrutiny within the system. He said that that was "a huge step forward". What has happened since March 2004, and what urgency has been ascribed to this policy area by the Home Office? In September the independent support group INQUEST described the position paper as "aspirational" and drew attention to the lack of clearly stated commitments. It expressed concern because any changes were expected to take place within existing budgets and without any new money. The Luce report, however, recommended a series of reforms which, it estimated, would cost an additional 10 per cent. over and above the current £70 million budget for coroners' courts.

Will the Minister explain what has been done since March 2004? Which of the proposals in the position paper have been put into practice? What is still to be done before new legislation is introduced? The Luce report helpfully includes a section on what can be done without waiting for a new Act of Parliament. NHS doctors could be allocated to work in an advisory capacity with the registration service and local coroners. The existing coroners' rules could be changed to reflect the recommendations on the outcome, conduct and scope of inquests. The registration service, the Home Office and the chief medical officers could give guidance on the use of autopsies. Here I interpose that in the third report of the Shipman inquiry, it is said that the immediate resort to autopsies by coroners is undesirable, and some coroners' autopsies are "seriously deficient".

As further examples of what can be done now, a new charter of standards of service to families could be produced. Training programmes for coroners' officers should be introduced with some support from central funds, and the development of new training arrangements for coroners themselves could be started. Informal piloting of death certification changes could be started. A new coronial council could be appointed on an informal basis and asked to oversee progress with the reforms. That is an excellent idea. The report states on page 219:

"All these changes could be made in advance of new legislation and all would be very worthwhile."

I am asking for reassurance. Will my hon. Friend the Minister reassure me and the public at large? I am talking about the relatives of those who die tragically in suspicious circumstances, in the custody of the state or in a terrible disaster; the technical and expert groups such as the Office for National Statistics, which collects and publishes the data on deaths, and the Health and Safety Executive, which has responsibility for preventing avoidable deaths at work; the organisations that work professionally with the coroners, such as doctors, police and prosecutors; and the media and all those who have a legitimate interest in the process and outcome of coroners' investigations?

When will we have a modern coronial jurisdiction with national coherence? Will we have a standing rules committee, a coronial council and an inspectorate? Will we have a nationally consistent complaints procedure, an appeals process and compulsory training? Can my hon. Friend tell me that defects in coroners' powers as identified in the reports that have been published will be remedied, and that in future coroners will not solely be reactive, but will be able to investigate any death or group of deaths on their own initiative, making recommendations that may avert further deaths from similar causes in future?

Can my hon. Friend tell me that in future, coroners will have the back-up that they need for expert medical input and effective investigations, and that families will by right have access to reports and to investigators, and that they will be accorded the assistance and the respect to which they are entitled throughout the investigative process, including at an inquest, if one is held? Will he tell me when all this will happen? Can he tell me that that will be soon? It is urgent. Can he tell me that the media will be able to report those actions as fact, because they will be fact?

When my hon. Friend says that he remains committed to taking urgent action, when he reassures all those with an interest in the coroners' court system, especially the families of the deceased, the coroners and their staff, that he is constantly on their case, and when he says that he is determined to see through radical reform in a timely and cost-effective way, I will be satisfied that this debate is worth while, and that some good will come of it.

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on securing the debate and putting the case for reform of the coronial system in a thorough and persuasive way. There is one aspect that I shall mention briefly—the Luce recommendation about bringing the coronial courts into line with the ordinary courts system, where there is a structured system of appeal.

The issue was brought home to me about a year ago, when one of my constituents, a Methodist minister, was criticised by a coroner after a death outside his church. It is neither appropriate nor possible for me to go into the details, but when my constituent sought my advice, all I could say was that he could challenge the finding by judicial review, or possibly by getting the Attorney-General to support a High Court application. Neither course of action was practical, given the cost involved. Ultimately, the coroner was prepared to enter into correspondence with me, and at the end of the day my constituent and I felt that justice had been done. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to recognise that this is an important issue, on which the agenda must move forward quickly.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) on obtaining this debate and giving us the opportunity to discuss the important issue of the reform of the coroner service. He is clearly knowledgeable about the issue and, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) pointed out, he spoke eloquently and persuasively. I also welcome my hon. and learned Friend's contribution to the debate.

I have been a Minister long enough now to have my earlier remarks quoted back at me. I have also been a Minister for long enough to know that it is a long way from a position paper to a fully reformed system. However, I agree that the issue is important. I reiterate the need diligently to follow through on it and again place on record my determination to do so.

The coroner's office and death certification are, thankfully, places and systems to which we do not often have to go. When we use them, we may be upset and distressed, which is all the more reason why the Government need to ensure that the systems are reliable and effective. As my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford said, the system goes back many hundreds of years. It functions as well as it does largely because of the dedication and professionalism of the staff involved. I assert that we owe it to them and the wider public to modernise the system so that it is fit for purpose and fully effective.

The Government set out our proposals for reform in the position paper that we issued in March this year. As we said then, our intention is to issue a White Paper early next year. The work undertaken by Dame Janet Smith, which is contained in her third report from the Shipman inquiry, and by Tom Luce, in the fundamental review he carried out on behalf of the Home Office, has been crucial in helping to inform and work out our proposals for the way forward. We need a system that is simple to understand and easy to run. We need to close any gaps that could be exploited by those who have criminal intent or who fail to provide proper care. In particular, we must do all we can to ensure that horrific crimes such as those carried out by Harold Shipman can never happen again.

To do that, we must connect a number of different but associated systems, such as the registration service and arrangements for forensic pathology. In addition, we will also need strong links between coroners and health services. It is essential that we learn from deaths of all kinds and use that knowledge to prevent avoidable and unnecessary deaths. We must also make sure that the public have a better understanding of how the system operates.

We plan to reform not only the coroner system, but the arrangements for death certification. New procedures to verify the fact of death will be introduced, and the system will be the same for all deaths, whether there is to be a cremation or a burial. We will also ensure much stronger medical oversight. The new system will mean that in future all deaths, whether or not they need to be reported to the coroner, will be reviewed by medically trained professionals based within the coroner's office.

Those trained doctors—in the position paper, we call them medical examiners—will review the medical certificates of the cause of death in all cases. They will have new powers to call for supporting documentation and make any inquiries that they see fit in order to satisfy themselves that each death is properly certified and that there is no reason for a coroner's investigation. They will also need to be able to review cases as quickly as possible, so that our new procedures do not lead to delay and additional distress for the bereaved.

Each medical examiner will be properly trained in death certification and will work full-time in fulfilling their duties. The checks that they make will be much more effective, and the availability of that additional medical expertise will assist lawyer coroners to interpret and understand the medical information about a death and the details of any medical treatment and procedures that the deceased may have been receiving prior to the death. All that will help coroners to decide what action they may need to take in each case. In turn, we expect that better medical information, and the greater competence and confidence it brings, to lead to a reduction in the number of post-mortem examinations.

Families will have a crucial role in this reformed process. I know, not least from the consultations we have carried out, just how important it is for families to have an opportunity to provide information, to raise questions and to express their own views. Under our proposals, families will have new rights to receive information about a death and to challenge anything that seems to them to be wrong. Their views will also be taken into account when key decisions are taken about the investigation of a death. There will be new and more accessible opportunities to appeal such decisions. Although I cannot at this stage go into the details of that, I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North will appreciate that we are committed to ensuring that families have more opportunities for redress.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my hon. Friend for all that he is saying. The main complaints from families concern great delays in getting an inquest at all and difficulties in getting access to the investigator's report to the coroner. Can those matters be dealt with without the need for legislation, and can my hon. Friend promise that they will be dealt with soon?

Paul Goggins: Later in my remarks I will show how, under plans to develop a family charter, we want to share more information with families. Of course, we want to speed up the inquest system, although in our current system it is hard to do that in cases where coroners have a backlog of cases, with all the difficulties that that entails. We need to carry out the fundamental reform, but there are things that we can do now and we will continue to do so.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): I am grateful to the Minister and to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney).

In rural areas, there are sometimes very few suitable venues for coroners to hear their cases. Will the Minister lean on the Lord Chancellor and his Department when people who run the Crown courts, magistrates courts or county courts seek to oust a coroner from using a court although no suitable alternative accommodation is available?

Paul Goggins: I am aware that sometimes locating a suitable venue for an inquest can be problematic. That remains a responsibility for the local authority. None the less, in Government we do of course try to assist and support coroners where they have a particular difficulty. All they need do is approach us, and if we can help, we will.

As all Members have emphasised, we have much to learn from the experiences of families. Indeed, some of the most instructive and compelling evidence that I have received came during two discussions that I was fortunate enough to have with the families of Harold Shipman's victims—people who have more reason than most to know of the shortcomings of the present system and who expressed themselves to me with remarkable clarity and calmness given the circumstances. I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell) for arranging those important opportunities for me to meet them.

Under our proposals we will, for the first time, have a national system to oversee all deaths. In order to provide focus and direction for that new service, we will create a new post—a chief coroner, who will lead the service by setting and driving up professional standards, deploying coroners within the national service, and, where necessary, undertaking the most complex cases himself or herself. The chief coroner will also have statutory powers to give directions to coroners in the interests of consistency and good practice.

There will also be a chief medical adviser, who will have particular functions in relation to the medical examiners and will ensure that the new service has access to the best possible medical expertise.

The chief medical adviser will provide top level medical advice to the chief coroner and link the new service with the regional directors of public health, who will provide additional oversight and scrutiny.

As I said earlier, we plan to publish a White Paper early next year. That will set out the basis on which we intend to legislate—as soon as parliamentary time is available—for a unified and reformed system.

We are carefully considering the resources that we will need. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford mentioned that. Our position paper expressed the hope that, in broad terms, the changes would be cost-neutral. Further detailed analysis suggests that there may be a need to identify further funding, over and above the blocks of funding that local authorities and the police allocate to the coroner service and coroners' officers. Given that those funding arrangements were designed to cope with around 200,000 deaths a year, while the new service will be required to deal with approximately 500,000, that should not be too surprising. We are, of course, examining the efficiency savings that will accrue.

We are also considering some of the payments made in the current system, including, for example, the £30 million paid privately to doctors for providing certificates prior to cremation, to ascertain whether some of that money could help to improve the scrutiny that families clearly expect. All that will be clearly set out in the White Paper.

As my hon. Friend said, we can do a great deal in advance of a fully reformed system and some of that work has already started. We are working closely with coroners to increase the focus of the service on bereaved families—many coroners already consult families as a routine part of their investigations. I am delighted with the way in which several coroners are taking that work forward. They are seriously considering the way in which families and others receive information about a death and how communications can be improved. I know that some coroners are reviewing the leaflets that they provide and are in discussion with groups and others who work with the bereaved to ascertain what improvements they could make.

In the longer term, building on such work, we will develop a family charter to set out the service standards that can be expected throughout England and Wales. We are also promoting the sharing of good practice. Using modern techniques developed by the Coroners Society of England and Wales, coroners are already making far more use of each other's experience. At the Home Office-funded training courses for coroners, we are making sure that sharing good practice is built into each course.

I pay tribute to the coroners for the way in which so many have made real strides in ensuring that their work and that of their staff meets the increasingly high standards that the public and central Government now expect. Working with local authority funders and local police forces, many coroners have made significant progress in their case management systems and their approach to inquests—especially those that take a long time to arrange—in reviewing their performance and making sure that they work closely with other local services. For example, many coroners have been actively reviewing the number of post mortems that they request, and others have been developing important new links with registrars and primary care trusts as well as with voluntary groups who can support the bereaved.

As I explained earlier, the next milestone in our programme is publication of a White Paper. That will set out the details of our reform programme. We will need primary legislation to give us the powers that we need and we will also need to develop the necessary professional leadership in the form of a chief coroner and a coroners council.

I reiterate the Government's full commitment to the delivery of fundamental coroner and death certification reform at the earliest opportunity—

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Enterprise Education

1. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What plans he has to develop enterprise education. [201227]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): It is vital that we encourage young people to become more enterprising and to consider the possibility that with the right dedication and skills they could set up their own businesses. That is why, in September 2005, we will provide £60 million for enterprise education for all key stage 4 pupils. To help schools deliver that new entitlement, we have spent over £30 million on 195 Pathfinder projects involving more than 700 schools and funded an enterprise adviser service to help to prepare schools, especially in poorer areas, for that entitlement.

Mr. Blizzard: Will my hon. Friend join me in congratulating Lowestoft schools on winning the Enterprising Britain competition for the eastern region, and Hazel Johnson in particular on her dynamic leadership? With four enterprise advisers from his Department's Pathfinder project and another provided by Shell, enterprise education is inspiring young people in Lowestoft and bringing schools and business together, which we need if we are to regenerate the town. The funding, however, finishes this year, so will he study that success and maintain the funding by supporting the current schools bid to set up a community interest company in conjunction with another local company, Adnams?

Dr. Howells: I certainly join my hon. Friend in praising the work in Lowestoft, especially by Hazel Johnson. It has been a great achievement, and I am only too glad to look at the proposals from the town.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): One of the key components of enterprise education is a grasp of basic mathematics. Was it because the maths results in English schools in the programme for international student assessment 2003 were so poor that the Government were happy to accept the decision by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development to exclude the figures for England from the international comparisons, even though the participation rate of 64 per cent. was higher than the 56 per cent. participation rate for the USA, whose figures were included, and the 61 per cent. participation rate in PISA 2000, the figures for which were accepted by the OECD?

Dr. Howells: As I understand it, the OECD has been complimentary about the fact that primary schools in this country have the best ever mathematics results, and we should celebrate that. The hon. Gentleman is right that we still have a long way to go, but we are making genuine progress.

Linda Perham (Ilford, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept the role of business education partnerships in promoting enterprise in schools? In my area, the Redbridge business education partnership does excellent work, and I have been pleased to support it over the years.

Dr. Howells: I am very much aware of the good work that my hon. Friend has done in and around Redbridge, and I am happy to endorse her point about business education partnerships, which are the way forward. Our hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) mentioned the involvement of Shell in Lowestoft, and the company is to be congratulated on showing the way forward. If we can inspire more young people through business education partnerships to consider setting up their own businesses, that will go a long way towards transforming the economy.

School Transport (Leicestershire)

2. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What recent representations he has received regarding the provision of school buses in Leicestershire. [201228]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): In addition to the valuable points made by my hon. Friend on Second Reading of the School Transport Bill, since August this year the Department has received one piece of correspondence on this issue.

David Taylor: Regular readers of the Leicester Mercury will know that our county has its share of overcrowding, antisocial behaviour and vandalism on school buses. Will the Minister ensure that the School Transport Bill, which was introduced in the House last week, includes measures to ensure that student journeys are free of danger, free of loutishness, free of damage and, most importantly, free of charge?

Mr. Twigg: I am not sure whether I can reassure my hon. Friend on his last point, but he is right to emphasise the importance of promoting positive behaviour on the school journey. We have said in the prospectus accompanying the Bill that the promotion of such behaviour is a necessary condition of any scheme by a pilot authority. More broadly, the promotion of positive behaviour on the school run is at the heart of the work that we are doing with our colleagues in the Department for Transport on travelling to school.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): Will not the people of Leicestershire be angry that school buses that are currently free could cost parents £200 per child under the School Transport Bill? Will not they see that as another third-term tax rise aimed at filling the Chancellor's black hole?

Mr. Twigg: I am sorry that in the Chamber the hon. Gentleman is not following the constructive path that he followed in Committee when we considered the School Transport Bill, which will return to the House soon. As he knows, one in 10 children currently benefit from free school transport. The purpose of the Bill is to enable local communities, if they want to, to try new ways of providing school transport to more children. I believe we should be worried about the many, not the few. Once again, the hon. Gentleman is concerned only with the few, not the many.

Teachers (Malicious Allegations)

3. Tony Cunningham (Workington) (Lab): What steps he is taking to protect teachers from malicious allegations made against them by pupils. [201229]

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): In November my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched a consultation on a new process for dealing with allegations against teachers and school staff. The consultation covers the reduction of time scales, new procedures to improve the management of cases and, significantly, advice by the Association of Chief Police Officers that anyone under investigation should not be named until they are charged with an offence.

Tony Cunningham: I am sure my hon. Friend would agree that there should be zero tolerance of abuse in the classroom. Equally, there must be zero tolerance of malicious complaints against teachers. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that complaints will be dealt with speedily, and that firm action will be taken against those who make malicious complaints?

Mr. Miliband: As a former teacher, my hon. Friend speaks with real knowledge of the matter. He is right that the trauma of abuse of trust and of unfounded allegations need to be tackled. I am pleased that about 70 pr cent. of all cases are currently dealt with within three months, but we want to raise that figure to 95 per cent. because speed is of the essence. I remind the House that the sanctions on false and malicious allegations are extremely serious, including charges of perjury and perverting the course of justice.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Does the Minister agree that the most important consideration is to preserve the anonymity of those charged? He referred to that in his answer. Will he assure the House that from now onwards, any teacher who is charged will have his or her anonymity preserved until we know that that man or woman is guilty?

Mr. Miliband: It is certainly our view that teachers should have their anonymity preserved until they are charged, if they are charged. I should point out that very few are charged; about 17 per cent. of all cases end in a prosecution. I am pleased that ACPO has issued new guidance to preserve anonymity. There is also the responsibility of the press in the matter. The Press Complaints Commission guidance is very clear about what those responsibilities are, and I would expect the press to follow that guidance.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The Minister will know that it is not only in formal education that the poison of malicious allegations has been a terrible problem in recent years; it also occurs in informal education through the youth service. Will he ensure that the processes affecting teachers that he hopes to introduce in the next couple of years will also apply in the youth service?

Mr. Miliband: My hon. Friend raises a good point. When we speak of unfounded allegations and of anonymity, simply to speak of teachers is not sufficient, given the range of professionals who work with young people. The safeguards that we want for children and for staff should apply to all those who work with young people in and out of schools.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): Significantly, in Portcullis House there is a conference dealing with false allegations of abuse and what has happened in the courts over the years. We welcome the improvements and the commitment from police officers, but will the Minister consult his colleagues throughout Government so that legislation might be brought in to safeguard children and teachers? It is important that in the youth service at large, those who devote themselves to teaching can be protected, as well as those whom they teach.

Mr. Miliband: The House knows that the hon. Gentleman has a long and distinguished record in campaigning on these issues and bringing attention to them. I am happy to say that there is proper consultation right across the United Kingdom on the issue. It is important, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has pointed out, that the Bichard inquiry referred to matters in this area, and we will respond to that shortly. I hope we will help to provide some of the reassurance that the hon. Gentleman seeks.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): What the Minister said about speeding up trials is welcome, and his remarks about the importance of preserving anonymity will also be welcomed by many teacher unions and their representatives. But he knows that they want more than simple guidance from ACPO and exhortations to the media from the Minister, so why will he not act on what the teacher unions have specifically requested: legislation to guarantee anonymity in those circumstances?

Mr. Miliband: The teacher unions have actually said that they want to see how the new ACPO guidance works, because this is an area where there are difficult issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) referred to adults who do not have teaching status but work with young people none the less. We want to ensure that the guidance works, and I hope that we can count on the hon. Gentleman's support in ensuring that it does.

Mr. Collins: The Minister will know that we of course hope that guidance works, but he will also know that many teachers have been in extraordinary distress because their details have been published in the local media, placed there either by people in schools or by the police. He will know that a head teacher committed suicide this year in the Isle of Wight because his details were released in that way.

May I press the Minister again to say why he will not legislate? My party is committed to support legislation on this matter. We will support any legislation that this Government introduce. If they continue to refuse to introduce that legislation, we will introduce it in a teacher protection Bill in the first Queen's Speech of the next Conservative Government.

Mr. Miliband: It is very sad that the hon. Gentleman has sought to make a party political issue of this matter, but I cannot let it pass. His right hon. Friend the Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) said that, under a Conservative Government:

"In the first hour, ministers will explain to officials that we are not in the business of passing 4,000 new laws a year."

I urge the hon. Gentleman to look at what his right hon. Friend is saying. This area requires careful application of the law and due diligence in every case. I think that the trauma both of abuse of trust and of abuse of teachers needs to be dealt with in a serious way by this House, and not in a posturing way.

Employer Training Pilots

4. Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the national employer training pilots. [201230]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): An evaluation of the initial six pilots published in November 2003 showed a high level of employer satisfaction with particular value being placed on the flexible and responsive delivery of training in the workplace.

Mr. Simon: I thank the Minister for that answer, and I invite him to join me in commending the Birmingham and Solihull employer training pilot, one of the six initial pilots and, I think, one of the most successful; thousands of people employed by hundreds of employers were trained. Training for small businesses in particular can be a problem and a drain, and it is really difficult. What else will the Government continue to do to help?

Mr. Lewis: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his support for the pilots in the Birmingham and Solihull area, which are among the best in the country, as he would expect me to say at the Dispatch Box. The pilots are demonstrating a number of elements in terms of attracting employers and small and medium-sized enterprises in particular to invest in training. We are reaching employers who would have been reluctant to train in the past and getting to employees who lack basic skills or level 2 qualifications and who would not feel able in ordinary circumstances to go back to education. We are removing the bureaucracy and complexity of accessing training, particularly for small businesses. We are also bringing employers and trade unions together at the workplace to improve employment relations. We see that approach to encouraging employers to invest in the training of their work forces as central to a future demand-led training system.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): We are generally supportive of the pilots and work-based training, but there is huge confusion among employers and in the further education sector about the future. Now that the windfall levy, which paid for most of the initial work, has gone, will the Minister confirm that future funding will come out of Learning and Skills Council adult budgets? What proportion of the learning and skills budget will be devoted to the national employer training programme, and what effect will that have on FE budgets? Finally, on the point made by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon), what compensation package has the Minister agreed with the Chancellor to support small employers in particular in releasing people for training?

Mr. Lewis: First, I think that the hon. Gentleman's party opposed the windfall levy, and we would not have had the employer training pilots if that policy had been followed. I thank him, however, for his genuine support of the principles underpinning the employer training pilots. On his substantive points, there are two issues. First, it has always been part of our vision that we need to re-engineer some of the existing money that we spend on training through the Learning and Skills Council, and move that money from the classroom to the workplace. As for the implications for colleges of further education, what we are seeing in the pilots is that many entrepreneurial colleges are now doing outreach work, going into workplaces, engaging with employers and providing the training in a customised, tailor-made way that meets the needs of the employer and the employee. I believe that further education has nothing to fear from the employer training programme. As for the final part of my answer, the hon. Gentleman will have to wait with bated breath for the statement on the pre-Budget report, which I think is about an hour away.

Mr. Bill Olner (Nuneaton) (Lab): I urge the Minister to go further, and implore him to ensure that there is plenty of training in schools. Sometimes young people miss a golden opportunity because they come to training late. I urge him to ensure that people go into not only further education colleges, but the classroom, so that we can get the right people in the skilled work force of the future.

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. All these policies bring the worlds of work and school closer together: specialist status for secondary schools; the new vocational pathways that we are developing; the flexible partnerships by which young people spend two days a week at school, two days a week at college and a day with local employers; enterprise education, which has become a mainstream part of the curriculum; and the new 14 to 16 young apprenticeship. In the future, we want a dynamic, day-by-day relationship that ensures that the choices that young people make about their curriculum are linked to the labour market and are based on authentic, real life contact with the world of work.

Sure Start

5. Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment she has made of the effects of Sure Start programmes on speech and language development. [201231]

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): The initial findings from the national evaluation of Sure Start's effect on children's speech and language development will be available in summer 2005. We know from individual Sure Start local programmes that the early support is having a positive impact. In one of the Stockport Sure Starts, for example, the number of children in reception classes with identified speech and language needs fell in successive years from 31 per cent. to 14 per cent. to 11 per cent. We also know from the comprehensive survey of more than 3,000 children published last week that two years of high-quality pre-school education boosts children's results at key stage 1 by four to six months.

Linda Gilroy: I thank my right hon. Friend for that response and for her work to ensure that children in the Keystone Sure Start in my constituency get a better start in life. What is she doing to ensure that children in other disadvantaged areas get such a good start and to mainstream the lessons learned from the Sure Start programmes?

Margaret Hodge: We are committed to mainstreaming all those Sure Start policies and programmes right across the country in every community. That is precisely why we have announced that we will develop 2,500 Sure Start children's centres by 2008. My hon. Friend must wait until after the pre-Budget report to see what further progress we can make in providing that revolution in children's services.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend knows that the Education and Skills Committee has taken evidence showing what a good investment early years intervention is. Will she examine the evidence that we received from the Social Market Foundation on Monday this week, which suggests that some Sure Start programmes are much more effective than others? Will she examine that evidence and make sure that good practice is spread as rapidly as possible, because the money should be spent wisely and effectively?

Margaret Hodge: My hon. Friend makes a good point. In the early days of evolving the Sure Start programmes, we enabled local Sure Start programmes to develop at their own pace and with their own priorities. We are now learning what works. As we develop Sure Start children's centres across the country, we will build on best practice to ensure that every family and every child in every community benefits from the Labour Government's investment in early years.

International Development

6. Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): What steps he is taking to promote the understanding of international development in schools. [201232]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): On 15 November this year, I launched the Department for Education and Skills international strategy, called "Putting the world in world-class education". It makes clear my Department's aim to ensure a strong international dimension across our education system, which we intend to achieve by building on the good work already being done in many schools by the British Council, the Department for International Development and voluntary organisations. We have also developed the Global Gateway, which is a new international website to allow schools across the world to engage in creative partnerships and develop mutual understanding.

Ms Keeble: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. Will he join me in congratulating the 25 schools in my constituency that have been studying the plight of HIV/AIDS orphans in Kenya and preparing Christmas parcels of toys and school equipment for them? Will he join me in paying tribute to Kappa Packaging, the local firm that made the boxes, and to DHL, which is flying all 1,800 of them to Kenya? Does he agree that such work done by schools and backed by businesses is the way to build the kind of understanding that we need in future to tackle international problems?

Mr. Clarke: I very strongly commend the schools and organisations supporting the Kenya project in my hon. Friend's constituency. She has described that work to me, and it is genuinely impressive and exciting. Such work with Kenya fits absolutely with the Commission for Africa and the Government's focus, through our G8 presidency, on promoting Africa and how we can work together in so many ways. Education is the key to contesting HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa, and the kind of work in Northampton that my hon. Friend can happily represent is inspirational.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): In my estimation, young people really are interested in international development and want to study it; many do so in their own private time with youth groups, church groups and various other organisations. I therefore encourage as much as possible the wider accessibility of learning about international development. I ask the Secretary of State look for ways further to assist young people in their gap years after school to enable them to go abroad to give assistance in the third and developing worlds, as Prince Harry did in Lesotho although clearly many of our young people do not have access to the resources that he has. Will the Secretary of State ensure that young people who want to go abroad are not prevented from doing so merely by lack of resources?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is entirely correct, and we are considering volunteering in the gap year in the way that he described. The Russell commission, in particular, is examining it and will make recommendations. The hon. Gentleman's point—I am delighted that it has all-party support—is fundamentally true. Young people know that they are growing up in an international, global world; they understand our interdependence and want to contribute to solving the problems of the world.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend commend Ross Workman, the head of Nailsworth school in my constituency, who has established very close links with Uganda? Does my right hon. Friend agree that we should permit teachers, particularly head teachers, to go out and see different parts of the world, especially Africa, ensure that funding is in place and bring back teachers from those countries so that they can share in the developed world's education system and learn from what we do here?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is correct. I strongly commend the schools in his constituency that are doing this work. I have seen outstanding examples of such work, which is facilitated by the Global Gateway. I had a video conference with a school in Lagos, Nigeria that is working with a school in east London. It is exhilarating to see how people can begin to understand issues in this way and I commend it most strongly.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): A few months ago I had a wonderful series of visits to primary schools to discuss the international campaign on the 100 million children around the world who do not go to school. In view of the statement by the Department for International Development that educating girls is the single most effective measure in tackling international poverty, will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity of that Department's forthcoming document on the subject to raise it more often in schools to promote greater understanding among our schoolchildren and to gain still further support for the international campaign on the efforts to educate girls around the world?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Yes, we will take that opportunity. We are working very closely with the Department for International Development. Incidentally, through campaigns such as Comic Relief, with its focus on the G8 presidency this year and the importance of Africa, we have already had initial discussions about how we can develop this and take it forward in a much stronger way. Returning to the comments of the hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans), the fact is that there is a desire among young people in schools and colleges to get involved in this matter, and we have to enlist that.

Sex Education

7. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): What guidance he has issued to schools on the teaching of sexual health and the prevention of sexually transmitted infections. [201233]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): Our sex and relationship guidance issued to all schools in July 2000 requires schools to teach about sexual health and sexually transmitted infections. Teaching strategies should include helping pupils clarify their knowledge of sexually transmitted infections.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: With one in eight young women in this country infected with chlamydia, and with a huge increase in the incidence of syphilis and gonorrhoea, will the Government carefully consider the example of the Ugandan Government, who have promoted the ABC campaign to highlight abstinence and faithfulness in sexual relationships? That campaign has resulted in a 75 per cent. reduction especially in HIV infection among 15 to 19-year-olds. Cannot we learn something from a developing country in that instance?

Mr. Twigg: Obviously I am happy to consider all the evidence from other countries about what works and what does not. The research evidence about abstinence-only education in the United States suggests that it is not effective on its own, although it can be one element of a package of measures to teach young people about sex and relationships. I am happy to examine the specific evidence from Uganda that the hon. Gentleman has drawn to the House's attention.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): Is not there a parallel between the development of the Sure Start programmes that have local autonomy and the teenage pregnancy strategies? Although they build on professional integration and working with the community, is not it important to share good practice to get the best out of the investment that we have made, as well as clear guidelines? If specific teenage pregnancy strategies work, other people should be told about them. If people do not want to find out, guidelines should be issued.

Mr. Twigg: My hon. Friend is right. In the past two years, there has been a disappointing, if small, increase in teenage conceptions, although there has been a significant fall, especially in conceptions among under-16s, across the four years of the strategy. We are now doing precisely what my hon. Friend suggests and focusing our attention especially on the hot spots—wards in the country that have particularly high levels of teenage pregnancy. Something like 50 per cent. of teenage conceptions happen in one in five local government wards. I am prepared to consider the available guidance in the way in which my hon. Friend suggests.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend ensure that any guidance that he issues is flexible so that it is relevant to areas of chronic educational under-attainment such my constituency? I recently had a letter from a primary head teacher, who said that, at 10 and 11, the sexual education that the youngsters receive is irrelevant because they know far more than what is being taught. That is a sad fact to relate to my hon. Friend. Will he ensure that we do not have a one-size-fits-all programme and that people are allowed the flexibility to meet the needs of their circumstances?

Mr. Twigg: My hon. Friend is right. Flexibility is critical and it is vital that we learn from best practice in different schools and different communities. It is also important that teachers and others who work with young people in our schools have the confidence to address those issues. Evidence shows that teachers sometimes lack that confidence. We place great emphasis on continuing professional development for teachers so that they can deliver sex and relationships education with confidence in the classroom.

Primary School Funding

8. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What the average spending is per primary school pupil in England in the current financial year. [201234]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): Average revenue spending from the schools budget in 2004–05 is £3,120 per maintained primary school pupil. As part of our package to restore stability to school funding, we guaranteed all schools an increase in their funding this year of at least 4 per cent. per pupil. More than two thirds of schools received an increase above the guarantee and the remaining third, an increase in line with the guarantee.

Paddy Tipping: Is my right hon. Friend in a position to compare that impressive figure with that in, for example, the financial year 1996–97? If he could do that, would he find that primary school budgets—for example at the Annie Holgate infant school, which he has visited in Nottinghamshire—have doubled?

Mr. Clarke: I am not in a position to make the exact comparison but I can give the comparison in real terms with the year 1997–98. In Nottinghamshire, the total recurrent funding for pupils aged three to 19 increased by £760 per pupil in real terms since 1997–98, with the effect that my hon. Friend described. Anybody who goes into schools would have to acknowledge the massive increase in resources—capital spending as well as revenue spending—that drives up educational standards. That is a major dividing line between the Government and the Government whom we succeeded. I hope that everyone will bear that in mind when considering the choices that they have to make.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will the Secretary of State explain why a primary school child in Nottingham gets more money than a primary school child in Derbyshire?

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): They have good MPs.

Mr. Clarke: One of my colleagues suggests from a sedentary position that the reason is the quality of the Member of Parliament, but I am sure that that cannot be part of the explanation in any respect whatever. The fact is that different children have different needs in different parts of the country. But in Derbyshire, Nottingham and every part of the country, there has been a massive increase in resources in every school, for every child. That is something of which this Government are rightly proud.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): My schools in Cambridge are extremely grateful for the extra money that has been received throughout this Government. May I point out to my right hon. Friend— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is addressing the House.

Mrs. Campbell: May I point out to my right hon. Friend that Cambridgeshire county council is still not receiving the amount of funding that it was led to expect in 2002 that it would receive, which means that schools, in some cases, are still underfunded, even though funding has improved so much since 1997? I hope that he will join me in making representations to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister on the need to increase their funding in line with what they would expect to receive.

Mr. Clarke: First, there is an announcement later on these matters, after the pre-Budget report. Obviously, my hon. Friend is right to make the case for Cambridgeshire as she does. In relation to Cambridgeshire, it is very important that schools there work well with the local authority, as there have sometimes been issues that have not been as straightforward as they might seem; I urge them to do that. In addition, I acknowledge her point that the increase in spending since 1997 in Cambridgeshire has been dramatic, and is raising significantly standards in schools in Cambridgeshire.

Level 3 Entitlement

9. Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): What assessment he has made of level 3 entitlement provision. [201235]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Ivan Lewis): We set out in the skills strategy the ways in which we propose to improve opportunities at level 3 for adults, targeting support to meet regional and sectoral skill needs. We are maintaining fee remission for those on low incomes. For 16 to 19-year- olds, those who are able to benefit can pursue study through to level 3 achievement, through academic or vocational study in schools, colleges or apprenticeships.

Ross Cranston: May I ask how we make significant progress at level 2 and basic skills level so that we have the base to move on to level 3 attainment? In addition, may I ask him about a problem raised with me by Dudley college about funding? Will funding for level 2 crowd out funding for level 3 and, in particular, might employers be dissuaded from funding level 3 attainment?

Mr. Lewis: First, my hon. and learned Friend is right to make the point that we need to support progression all the way from basic skills to level 3. We were proud to announce only two weeks ago that we hit our target, so that 750,000 adults who did not have basic literacy, numeracy and language skills before we came to power have achieved those skills in the past few months, which is a major achievement. At the moment, we are trialling our level 2 entitlement in two regions—the north-east and the south-east—with a view to rolling that out across the country. We have already spoken this morning about employer training pilots.

We are also committed to ensuring that where there is market failure in regions or sectors of the economy, we would be willing to consider extending level 2 entitlement to 100 per cent. subsidy for level 3. But as a matter of principle, in relation to achieving level 3 qualifications, it is reasonable to expect, on the whole, a greater contribution from employers and individuals because, at that level, they have a direct gain and benefit. In relation to where we put the bulk of the Government's resources, it will go unashamedly into basic skills and level 2 qualifications. In terms of the needs of the economy, level 3 and higher qualifications are equally important, but we will expect a greater contribution from employers and individuals at that higher level.

Skills Gap

10. Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central) (Lab): What steps he is taking to close the skills gap. [201236]

The Minister for Lifelong Learning, Further and Higher Education (Dr. Kim Howells): In July 2003 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State launched the skills strategy White Paper. Since then we have made significant progress, setting the foundation for future activity. There are 20 sector skills councils in place, over 12,500 employers and 80,000 employees benefit from employer training pilots, since 2001 over 750,000 learners have achieved a skills for life qualification, and over 620,000 more adults are qualified to at least NVQ level 2 or its equivalent.

Mr. Illsley: At a recent event in my constituency hosted by the local chamber of commerce, we heard encouraging news about the initiatives that my hon. Friend has mentioned. However, one issue that was raised was the lack of basic skills among some school leavers and other young people going into the world of work. The situation is a little worse in my area, because for the first time for ages we have full employment. Will my hon. Friend bear it in mind that we need to encourage better numeracy and literacy among young people going into employment?

Dr. Howells: I agree that that is vital. I have visited some wonderful colleges of further education where 14-year-olds are at last waking up to learning. That is long overdue. Those young people have either excluded themselves or been excluded from school, or else school simply did not work for them. It is amazing to see them working on automobiles, welding or electronics.

Those young people do not talk of basic skills or core skills but of reading, writing and arithmetic. I have made a point of asking them what they think of having to do all that. They say—this is a wonderful thing—"We do not like it, but if we did not do it they would not let us in here." That is a great trick, and it just might work. If so, we will see skills start to increase to the benefit of everyone, not least the economy.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): Does the Minister agree that if we are to close the skills gap, it is vital for young people to be aware of the employment and career paths that are open to them and of what is required to gain access to those paths? Does he accept that while accessible careers advice from universities is fundamental, it is being compromised by being mixed up with other advice for young people through the Connexions service? Will he consider removing careers advice from Connexions, so that young people can be guaranteed the independent careers advice that they so badly need?

Dr. Howells: I understand that we are reviewing all that and will produce a Green Paper. The hon. Gentleman is right to raise the issue. I am amazed at the number of agencies out there and I have been trying to draw a map of them. I think that people are often confused by the sheer wealth of advice. We need to make the system much simpler, and I think that the review will be an interesting exercise.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): I agree that genuinely exciting things are happening in further education and in skills training generally, but our hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills mentioned market failure, and we know that there are bad and indifferent employers, and freeloading employers, who will not shoulder the burden of upskilling their work forces. It is vital for the country's future that we ensure that all involved play an active and proper part. Will my hon. Friend continue to monitor the skills gap, and ensure that the possibility of introducing an element of compulsion where necessary will not be ignored?

Dr. Howells: We have been developing sector skills councils to drive forward that agenda. I certainly do not want public money to go to companies that do not have an agreement with a sector skills council to ensure that it is used properly, that good education and training are being provided and that that is seen as a vital part of economic development in every part of the country.

Educational Psychologists

11. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): When he will announce his decision in respect of the future training of educational psychologists. [201238]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Stephen Twigg): Educational psychologists play an important role in supporting children with special educational needs and behavioural, emotional and social difficulties. Their future training will need to reflect the changing role of the work force involved in children's services, and we will publish a consultation paper on this in January. We are also planning a review of the functions of EPs, which we aim to complete by the end of 2005.

Mr. Heath: That is a very disappointing reply. When I had an Adjournment debate on the subject six months ago, which the hon. Gentleman answered, we had already had the consultation and agreed the general shape of educational psychologists' training. The view was taken that we should move to three-year postgraduate training instead of the current teaching qualification. The problem is that many of the people leaving university and who are still engaged in such education do not know what they should do with their future careers and on what course they should enrol. It seems unfair that the Government should shilly-shally on this issue, if we are to have a properly motivated educational psychologist caucus in future to do the job that we want. Will the Minister please try to reach a decision, and to make sure that the people whom we want to train as educational psychologists know what qualifications they should have?

Mr. Twigg: I am sorry to have disappointed the hon. Gentleman, and I do want to acknowledge the interest that he has shown in this issue by securing the Adjournment debate to which he referred. We are absolutely determined to get this right, and it is clear that a great deal is changing in respect of children's services and some other services provided through schools. We want to ensure that the review of the role of educational psychologists is absolutely part of that wider review of children's services, so that the particular needs of the children with whom EPs work are properly met. That is the purpose of the review.

Children's Commissioner for England

12. Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): When he last met his counterpart in the National Assembly for Wales Government to discuss the role of the Children's Commissioner for England in Wales. [201239]

The Minister for Children, Young People and Families (Margaret Hodge): I had contact with various representatives of the National Assembly for Wales during the passage of the Children Bill in 2004, including the First Minister and the Minister for Health and Social Services. Discussions have also been held with the Minister for Education and Lifelong Learning, the latest of which was on Monday.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. She will know that during the Children Bill's legislative passage, the concern was expressed that problems could arise if the commissioner for England carries out his duties in Wales while the commissioner for Wales continues to have a role in Wales. I urge my right hon. Friend to do everything possible to ensure a seamless service for children in Wales, and to ensure that there will be no confusion between the work of the Children's Commissioner for Wales, and that of the commissioner for England when operating in Wales.

Margaret Hodge: I am aware of these concerns, which have been expressed by my hon. Friend and others on several occasions. I hope that he shares my delight at the Children Bill's having become an Act. We have advertised the post of the first children's commissioner for England, and we hope to appoint someone shortly after Christmas. I am sure that the new commissioner will want to meet the commissioners in the other countries and to ensure a seamless service for children, wherever they live.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): Is it realistic to expect vulnerable children to know the difference between devolved responsibilities and those that are not? Surely a better solution would be a single commissioner—a single port of call—as suggested by the Welsh Affairs Committee and the National Assembly for Wales.

Margaret Hodge: All children will be competent and able to ensure that their rights and concerns are expressed to wherever is appropriate. We will ensure, and all the commissioners will doubtless want to work together to ensure, that children's aspirations, needs, priorities and concerns are heard loud and clear in this Chamber, as well as in other areas of public life.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): I am very pleased that my right hon. Friend has advertised the post of children's commissioner for England. Has she discussed with officials in Wales how the Children's Commissioner for Wales was appointed? She will doubtless be aware that children were involved in the advertisement and shortlisting, and in the actual appointment of that post.

Margaret Hodge: My hon. Friend will be pleased to hear that we have ensured that children in England are involved in the job specification of the children's commissioner for England, and in the advertisement design. Indeed, they will themselves be interviewing candidates.

We are determined that the commissioner will be a powerful champion of children and I am sure that we will hear the voice of children loud and clear once the post is filled.

Mathematics Teaching

14. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): If he will make a statement on the progress made in implementing the recommendations of Professor Adrian Smith's report regarding mathematics teaching. [201241]

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): We continue to make good progress in taking forward the measures for mathematics teaching announced on 28 June. In particular, on 9 December, I will be inviting expressions of interest from organisations to create and run the national centre for excellence in the teaching of mathematics. Advertising has begun to promote increases in training bursaries and golden hellos from September 2006. There has also been a welcome increase of 4 per cent. this year in recruitment to mainstream teacher training courses in mathematics.

Dr. Cable: Does the Secretary of State recall Professor Smith's words that there was "a dire, catastrophic, crisis-level shortage of specialist maths teachers"?

Does he also recall that in an Adjournment debate six months ago, I was told that the Government were considering writing off the debts of maths and science teachers? How far have the Government got with that initiative and other inducements to maths teaching?

Mr. Clarke: As I have already said, we have already started advertising to promote increases in bursaries and golden hellos for the next academic year. The strong point that I would like to make is that Professor Adrian Smith and my recently appointed chief adviser, Professor Celia Hoyles—an outstanding individual in the subject—would both acknowledge that we are working extremely expeditiously to deal with the matter. I am committed to increasing the number of mathematics teachers, and the Government have a strong record on such matters.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

The Solicitor-General was asked—

Crown Prosecution Service (IT Systems)

19. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): What assessment she has made of the effectiveness of the IT systems available to the Crown Prosecution Service. [201247]

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): I have kept a close eye on the development of the Crown Prosecution Service IT system, which is called Compass. My assessment is that it helps with the timely and efficient management of cases by the CPS and helps it account to the House for what it does. More generally, the criminal justice system IT offers the prospect of better communication between the police, the CPS, courts and defence lawyers and of keeping the victim and witnesses informed of what is happening in cases in which they are involved.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for that reply. It was the Glidewell report that recommended modern IT systems for prosecutors and we surely have here a public sector IT system that has been introduced successfully. We should all be pleased about that. Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in Staffordshire, as a result of new electronic systems, the CPS is more effective, more accurate in the advice that it gives, delivers a faster service and is well placed to do a good job in respect of electronic links with the police and the courts?

The Solicitor-General: I am sure that the Crown Prosecution Service in Staffordshire will warmly appreciate my hon. Friend's comments, but he is inviting me to tempt fate by telling the House that it is probably the only computer system in government that is working properly. There has been a good deal of investment—£56 million over the next 10 years—and the prosecution system has gone from a largely paperwork system to one that had three computers on each prosecutor's desk and now to one single system that is joined up with the rest of the criminal justice system.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Will the Solicitor-General commend the work of Nottinghamshire Crown Prosecution Service and its chief prosecutor, Kate Carty, in introducing information technology systems? Will she also ensure that excellent IT is complementary to, and not a substitute for, the softer skills of local prosecutors meeting police officers and the local community informally to deal with misunderstandings and undertake a process of mutual education?

The Solicitor General: My hon. Friend is right and I thank him for his comments on the workings of the CPS. Of course it is important that people communicate not only through IT but in person and that the CPS work closely not only with the police and the courts but with the local community and MP. I welcome the involvement that he seeks with the CPS, which is after all an accountable service, although it works independently.

Serious Organised Crime Agency

20. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What relationship the Serious Fraud Office will have with the Serious Organised Crime Agency. [201248]

The Solicitor-General: The Serious Organised Crime Agency will bring together the National Crime Squad, the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the drug trafficking investigative and intelligence work of Customs and Excise into a single agency to lead the fight against organised crime. The Serious Fraud Office will continue to investigate and prosecute serious and complex fraud. The Serious Organised Crime Agency will offer support to the SFO in its investigations and the SFO will advise SOCA.

Hugh Bayley: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for that answer. Unlike France and some other countries that have mounted successful prosecutions, as they are obliged to do under the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development convention against international bribery, the United Kingdom has yet to do so. The Serious Fraud Office has expressed concern that it does not have sufficient resources to investigate these complex cases abroad, but it is important to investigate them because they undermine development in so many developing countries and those responsible for taking bribes internationally—corrupt politicians and officials—use the same money-laundering channels as organised crime. Will SOCA be able to provide support to the SFO to investigate some of these cases and secure prosecutions?

The Solicitor-General: Yes, it will. I agree with my hon. Friend about the corrosive effect of corruption in developing countries and that we have to do what we can to tackle those giving and taking bribes. We are working closely with the international community. The SFO's budget rose to £23 million and will increase again to £35 million. That will enable it to increase its staff to 300, which will include lawyers and accountants.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): Two of the most important weapons in the fight against crime are intelligence and co-ordination. Will the right hon. and learned Lady give the House the three most compelling reasons why the investigations arm of the SFO is not to be merged into the Serious Organised Crime Agency?

The Solicitor-General: I think that they will work together, but the work of the SFO involves a prosecution process, while that of the Serious Organised Crime Agency is largely investigative. The SFO will work closely with SOCA, but it will continue to prosecute, just as Customs and the CPS will continue to prosecute when information comes before them from SOCA.

Fraud Prosecutions

21. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What plans she has to ensure effective prosecutions of those who commit fraud against small enterprises. [201249]

The Solicitor-General: Effective prosecution of fraud against small business depends on good police investigation and evidence gathering, and close working between police and prosecutors. It is also important for small business to do what it can to protect itself against fraud. Both the Home Office and the Department of Trade and Industry have advice on their websites about how to recognise fraudulent approaches.

Mr. Bellingham: I thank the right hon. and learned Lady for that reply. Is she aware that there has been a significant increase in the number of small businesses that have fallen foul of so-called phishing scams, in which the sender of the e-mail tries to get their banking password, and of scams from countries such as Nigeria, in which the sender promises a commission on money that is wired to the recipient? What is she doing to try to protect small businesses from such scams?

The Solicitor-General: I am aware of those attempted scams. The hon. Gentleman has raised them and brought them to the attention of the authorities. I thank him for doing that because it helps warn small businesses of the problem. I would say to small businesses, and everybody who sees offers on the internet—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are very important matters. The House must come to order.

The Solicitor-General: I would say to small businesses that they cannot get something for nothing and that if they see on the internet offers of huge sums without having to do anything, such offers are probably a scam. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the new guidance on policing priorities for fraud cases that the Home Office sent out, which says that, even if the sum involved is small, if the effect on the small business victim is large, it should be a priority for police investigation and prosecution.

Extradition

22. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What guidance is given to the Crown Prosecution Service on the consideration to be given to requests for extradition by foreign Governments in determining whether to prosecute an individual in the United Kingdom. [201250]

The Solicitor-General: The Crown Prosecution Service follows the guidance given in the code for Crown prosecutors when deciding whether to instigate or continue a prosecution. If a request for extradition is received in respect of someone against whom a prosecution is under way, the prosecutor will consider whether the public interest is best served by continuing with the proceedings here or discontinuing proceedings in favour of allowing extradition.

Mr. Heath: Does the Solicitor-General see any problem where there is a grossly unbalanced extradition arrangement such as we currently have with the United States of America, which has not even been ratified by the US Congress but nevertheless binds this country to extradite suspects without prima facie evidence? Is she content that that process might be used in circumstances in which a crime had been committed in Britain or upon British citizens and no prosecution had been undertaken by the CPS, but someone stood trial for it under American jurisdiction?

The Solicitor-General: The hon. Gentleman is under a misapprehension. The extradition system is not unbalanced. It is for us to decide how we deal with requests for extradition. We have made those decisions and debated them in this House during proceedings on the Extradition Act 2003. Those who were charged to put into effect that legislation—the staff of the CPS—act wholly independently, they act in the public interest and without reference to policy, let alone foreign policy matters. The hon. Gentleman alleged that extradition could take place without prima facie evidence, but evidence was put before the Bow Street magistrates court in the case in October to which he refers. The district judge decided that there was sufficient evidence to send it to the Home Secretary who will consider extradition.

Pre-Budget Report

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): At the core of this pre-Budget report is the belief that the Britain of long-term economic strength will be the Britain that at a time of rapid economic change and uncertainty locks in our economic stability for the long-term; the Britain that, as by 2015 Asia acquires a growing share of low-cost production, resolves to invest in high-value-added, high-technology manufacturing and services, and achieves world leadership in science and technology; and the Britain that, with enterprise and high-skilled jobs now the key to long-term prosperity, takes the tough decisions to achieve American levels of business creation and has, at every level, the best educated and most flexible work force in the world. In other words, it is a Britain of opportunity for all that, with this pre-Budget report's long-term measures to support families, ensures that every child and young person has the best start in life.

I turn first to the measures to entrench stability. In last year's Budget I forecast growth for this year of between 3 and 3½ per cent. When I made our forecast, the Leader of the Opposition said that it was not just wrong but a deliberate misrepresentation of Britain's economic position and that not to meet it would destroy credibility. I can report today to the House that growth this year will be, just as I forecast, above 3 per cent.—3½ per cent. In other words, Britain will extend the longest period of uninterrupted growth in the industrial history of our country.

Let me give the House the detailed figures. Even after the doubling of oil prices, inflation this year is 1¼ per cent. In any other decade, a 100 per cent. increase in oil prices, a 50 per cent. increase in industrial materials prices and a 70 per cent. increase in metal prices would have led to British inflation and British instability. But with continued and necessary discipline among wage bargainers in the private and public sector and with the resilience of the monetary and fiscal framework, inflation is expected to be just 1.75 per cent. next year and 2 per cent. in the years to follow.

All policy makers will keep a close eye on continuing risks from global trade imbalances, from exchange rate movements and from an uneven world recovery, but with manufacturing output growing this year and next, British business investment is also expected to rise—this year by 5¾ per cent. and next year by 4 to 4½ per cent.

With the expected moderation of house price inflation now under way and as export and industrial production strengthen, domestic demand, which has been growing by 4 per cent. this year, is expected to grow by 3 to 3½ per cent. in 2005; and we expect consumption to grow by 3¼ per cent. this year and by 2¼ to 2¾ per cent. in 2005.

Overall domestic investment we expect to grow next year by 6¾ to 7¼ per cent. We expect exports to rise in line with world trade at more than 6 per cent. and, with inflation—as I have said—below its target, growth overall is projected for 2005 at 3 to 3½ per cent., in line with the average growth of G7 countries.

We will remain vigilant to inflationary pressures, both globally and in Britain; but it is the success of the Bank of England's forward looking approach that is the key to sustaining growth with low inflation, just as since 1997 it has maintained both inflation and interest rates at historic low levels. Thepre-Budget report shows that since 1997 interest rates have averaged 5.3 per cent.—half the 10.4 per cent. average from 1979 to 1997. Mortgage rates have averaged 6.1 per cent since 1997, almost half the 11.4 per cent. average from 1979 to 1997.

Since 1997, Britain has 1.2 million additional home owners, and as we take forward the Barker review and the Deputy Prime Minister publishes his five-year housing and sustainable communities strategy, we will also pilot mixed communities in deprived estates and, therefore, provide further support for first-time buyers in our country.

Since 1997, mortgage rates have been lower than in any seven-year period since the 1960s. Interest rates have been lower than in any seven-year period since the early 1960s. Inflation has been lower than in any seven-year period since the 1930s. Employment has been higher than in any seven-year period since records began.

Let me sum up for the benefit of the House.

"Inflation is low. Unemployment is low. We're growing faster than many other European countries."

That is not, Mr. Speaker, exaggerated gloating, but the words of the Leader of the Opposition, speaking to an employers federation only two weeks ago.

The strength of our economy is matched by the strength that comes from the decisions we made after 1997 to cut our national debt. Yesterday, I was able to announce £520 million more for the special reserve for Iraq and our international obligations; and I thank our armed forces for their dedication and their courage. Having since 11 September doubled the budget to 2008 for security at home, I am also releasing today a further £105 million for necessary security measures to counter terrorism, to enhance surveillance at our ports and to improve civil resilience.

The pre-Budget report also sets out detailed savings achieved of £2 billion in procurement, an additional one third of a billion saved in NHS drugs procurement and, on target, the reduction of the first 9,000 civil service posts, as we implement the Gershon principles, a £21 billion efficiency saving that we have achieved while at the same time accepting his recommendation that to go beyond that figure of £21 billion could put the delivery of front-line services at risk.

I can also announce the relocation of 1,230 Ministry of Defence posts from the south-east to Yorkshire; 2,300 Department for Work and Pensions posts to Liverpool, Wrexham and Newcastle; 600 from the Office for National Statistics to Wales; and 220 from the Revenue and Customs to Cardiff, Liverpool, Bournemouth, Truro and Manchester. Those are further steps on the way to a total, by 2010, of 20,000 civil service jobs relocated to our regions.

Sir Michael Lyons is also setting out today departmental guidelines for the disposal by 2010 of £30 billion of public assets. And because there is scope for further rationalisation of public sector spectrum, I have asked Professor Martin Cave to lead an audit of public sector spectrum with the aim of releasing the maximum amount of spectrum to the market.

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

Lower debt has meant that debt interest payments each year are £4 billion less than in 1997 and because we have more people in work than other countries—75 per cent. of adults in work in Britain, compared with 71 per cent., in the United States, 69 per cent. in Japan and 65 per cent. in Germany and France—social security bills for unemployment are also down by £4 billion a year since 1997.

Having previously set both the fiscal numbers and the detailed spending plans for the years 2005–08, the public finance projections I have set out today are based on our cautious view of trend growth in the years to 2010 and on public spending rising from £579 billion in 2007–08, to £606 billion in 2008–09 and then to £634 billion in 2009–10.

When, in the Budget, I estimated borrowing for the year to April 2004 at £37.5 billion, some external commentators suggested that that was an underestimate. At the same point in the economic cycle 10 years ago, the equivalent figure was £90 billion, but I can report that our final outturn for the year to April is not £37.5 billion; it is £35 billion. And even after taking into account additional expenditure on defence and security, and other decisions that I will announce today, including on fuel duties and council tax, the cash figures for net borrowing for this year will fall to £34 billion, and in future years, fall further to £33 billion, falling again to £29 billion, then falling to £28 billion, £24 billion and £22 billion.

The deficit in 2004 is 3.9 per cent. of GDP in Germany, 3.7 per cent. in France, 4.4 per cent. in America and 6.5 per cent. in Japan. In Britain, the figure is 2.9 per cent., and in future years, it will fall to 2.7, 2.2, 2 and 1.6 per cent., falling to 1.5 per cent. of GDP. For those who take an interest in these matters, it is well within the Maastricht criteria of the European Union.

Our first fiscal rule is to balance the current budget over the economic cycle. For the years to 2009–10, the current balance is minus £13 billion, minus £7 billion, then plus £1 billion, plus £4 billion, plus £9 billion and plus £12 billion. So we are meeting our first fiscal rule in this economic cycle, and we will meet it in the next economic cycle, too.

Our second rule is our sustainable investment rule—that we should borrow for investment, while keeping debt at a low and sustainable level. Because of the world downturn, debt has now risen to 45 per cent. of national income in France, 48 per cent. in America, 55 per cent. in Germany and 85 per cent. in Japan, but in Britain this year, our debt is 34.3 per cent. of our national income. In future years, it will be 35, 36, 36, 37 and 37 per cent., meeting at every point our rule that debt should be kept below 40 per cent. of national income.

So with our deficits lower than our competitors' and lower than in past decades, and with our debt lower than our competitors' and lower than in past decades, we are meeting both our fiscal rules: in this cycle, our first rule, with a margin of £8 billion and our second rule, with a margin of £59 billion, and we are therefore on course to meet both our rules in this cycle and in the next cycle, too.

The measures that I now announce for this pre-Budget report are informed by the Treasury's assessment, published today, of long-term global economic challenges to 2015. To succeed in the global economy, Britain should build on our strengths—our stability, our scientific genius and our world-class universities and our global reach—with a concerted national mission to invest long term and establish world leadership in science, education and skills, and enterprise.

To build on our new 10-year science framework and the £2.5 billion investment in science and to make Britain the best place for research and development, we will continue our reforms to re-examine the R and D tax credit for mid-sized science-based firms; to remove tax barriers to the formation of university spin-off companies; and to pilot a matched-funding scheme to help universities to build up their resources through new endowments. To benchmark progress in raising business R and D, we will establish an industry-led science forum chaired by the chief executive of AstraZeneca, Sir Tom McKillop, and as part of their £100 million technology investment programme, the northern regional development agencies are together announcing that they will promote science cities for the north, starting with Manchester, Newcastle and then York.

By 2015, Asia will be responsible for as much as 25 per cent. of world trade, yet, today, only 1 per cent. of British exports go to India and only 1 per cent. of our exports go to China. So having set an objective to build trade links with Asia that match those that we have with America and Europe, we propose that the China-UK financial dialogue now expand its role, with enhanced private sector participation, and that the new UK-India dialogue is also broadened to include private business. And a new Asia taskforce will bring together experts to focus on boosting British exports to, and investment in, Asian countries in the years to come.

In the years to 2015, the greatest number of new jobs will come from a larger number of small businesses, and that is why we must achieve American rates of business creation and success.

For long-term investments, I have already reduced capital gains tax from 40p to 10p. I have cut corporation tax from 33p to 30p and cut small business tax from 23p to 19p. We will legislate for tax relief for the renovation of empty business premises in our 2,000 enterprise areas, and through deregulation and self-certification of business angels we will remove barriers to high net-worth investors, enabling them to invest directly in small businesses. We will align the tax treatment of leasing with other forms of finance. For new and ambitious start-ups and high-growth businesses, we have asked the development agencies to make available in every region tailored coaching and support. Building on the success of Britain's first ever national enterprise week, detailed guidance is being issued for schools on the content of enterprise lessons.

In recent Budgets, we have removed the independent audit requirement on small firms, introduced a simplified VAT flat-rate payment scheme, and I am today publishing the interim report of Philip Hampton on rationalising inspection and enforcement regimes. Having concluded that outside high-risk areas, the regulatory focus should be on advice, not inspection, and that data-sharing should avoid duplication of requirements on business, his final report will include recommendations to reform the regulators charged with inspection and enforcement and to reform the penalty regimes.

In parallel, the new executive chairman of the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise, David Varney, is also today announcing the creation of a small business unit, consulting on the scope for a single tax return that would bring together all taxes, and setting as his long-term objective a single account for payments by business.

I am also announcing further detailed reforms that include deregulation in the financial services industry and common commencement dates from 2005 for all new health and safety, company and consumer legislation. Building on what the Foreign Secretary has already announced, he is setting out new rules guiding implementation of European Union regulations.

In the coming decades, as populations age and the dependency ratio grows, the most successful economies will be those that encourage the maximum number of people of working age into the labour market. Alongside greater local and regional pay flexibility, the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions and I agree that it is time to do more to attract into the work force incapacity benefit recipients with the capacity to work and lone parents who at the moment are not able to work.

By extending our successful in-work credit, 250,000 lone parents throughout our country will be offered a £40 a week—that is £2,000 a year—first-year return-to-work bonus. Incapacity benefit claimants, under the successful pathways to work scheme, will have a £40 a week return-to-work credit allied to rehabilitation help, which has been the most effective way of helping incapacity benefit claimants into work. This will now cover a third of the country, on the road to making this a nationwide offer. We will build on successful experience by also locating employment advisers in GPs' surgeries. We are allocating today £30 million more to expand the numbers who can benefit from the new deal for disabled people.

To make work pay, I am also raising the national minimum income guarantee for a single earner couple with one child to a guaranteed income in work of £258 a week, and a lone parent working part-time with one child on the minimum income guarantee will receive £199 a week, the equivalent in work of £12 an hour.

With unemployment among ethnic minorities still twice that of the rest of the population, and the proportion in work just 59 per cent., I have asked the National Employment Panel, working with the Ethnic Minority Business Forum, to report by Budget time on measures to address what is a waste of potential by encouraging employment, self-employment and the growth of small businesses.

Because of the environmental challenges that all nations confront, our 2005 G8 presidency is going to give priority to climate change. It is the view of this Government that all industrialised nations—from the smallest to the largest—must accept their responsibilities and each must bear its share of the burden in reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

Oil prices have declined from the peak of $50 a barrel, and today are $42. They are well above the long-run average of $23, and they make promotion of energy efficiency and alternative lower carbon sources of energy far more urgent. For Britain's part, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is going to review the innovative technologies and policies that can deliver that step change in energy efficiency. As a first step, she is announcing today measures to accelerate innovation in energy efficient technologies, with the creation of a development fund of £20 million managed by the Carbon Trust.

It is our policy that, each year, fuel duties should rise at least in line with inflation as we seek to meet our targets for reducing polluting emissions and fund our public services. But this financial year, because of the sustained volatility in the oil market, I propose to match the freeze in car vehicle licence duty with a continuation of the freeze on the main road fuel duties. While we will not set a duty differential this year for sulphur-free fuels, we will go ahead with the 20p per litre lower duty differential for bioethanol on 1 January 2005, matching the equivalent differential for biodiesel. Because of oils fraud and the tax evasion that has resulted from the lower rate of duty for rebated oils, it is not right to delay the planned increase on this duty, but I will set it not at the expected 2.4p per litre but at just 1p a litre.

Further anti-avoidance measures published in detail today include action against avoidance on contrived remuneration arrangements, on financial and international transactions, on VAT and on the abuse of the 1992 film tax legislation.

The limit on the value of overseas purchases from outside the European Union, brought back into this country through customs duty and tax free, has been set by the European Union at £145, excluding alcohol, tobacco and perfume. I have written today to the European Commission and member states stating that this limit was last revised in 1994, is now out of date and that we should now raise it.

With the Commission for Africa reporting next year and with the focus for our G8 presidency on debt relief and development, the Secretary of State for International Development and I have written to G8 Finance Ministers saying that our priorities for 2005 will be to institute the international finance facility; 100 per cent. multilateral debt relief; to develop the development round in trade; and, as the second largest donor in the fight against HIV/AIDS, to maximise efforts to develop an infrastructure for co-ordinating research for a cure for AIDS, increase funding for AIDS research and develop innovative advance purchasing agreements for drugs for both AIDS and malaria—Britain making its G8 presidency count to meet the needs of the developing world.

Also, 2005 is the year of the volunteer. To encourage voluntary work, the Home Secretary and I are ready to take forward the Russell commission's proposals for a national youth volunteering and community service. I will report back in the Budget.

The long-term review of English local government finance under Sir Michael Lyons will report next year, but it is also right to take action where there are immediate pressures this year. In order that English council tax rises will be substantially below last year's

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

5.9 per cent., I am able to release the following: an extra £125 million resources for England, alongside £521 million reallocated to local councils from Government Departments and a further one third of a billion reallocated from the reduction in ring-fencing and other obligations—in total £1 billion to reduce pressures on the council tax. The Minister for Local and Regional Government will later this afternoon give full details, including on the position of pensioners.

Since 1997, 1 million pensioners have been lifted out of poverty. Raising the basic state pension by earnings would have provided an average of £5 a week more for the poorest pensioners. But the pension credit and our other measures have ensured that many are over £40 a week better off. I can confirm that, next year and in the spending round, the pension credit will rise faster than inflation—by average earnings—meeting our obligation to take hundreds of thousands of pensioners out of poverty in this country.

To help savers, it is right to extend the tax free advantages for the first £7,000 of savings—£3,000 for the cash component—in individual savings accounts each year. So I am consulting, prior to the Budget, on extending the ISA limit for another five years to 2009. We will proceed from April with the low cost savings and investment products recommended by the Sandler report, and we will now extend our savings gateway—the scheme where the Government match the savings of low-income families—to a wider range of income groups.

Two million families still have no bank account. It costs them more to pay their bills, credit costs more and it makes it harder for them to do many things, including, on some occasions, getting a job. I can announce that the banks and Government have agreed to work together to reduce by half the number of families without bank accounts. To expedite this, we are setting aside £120 million to tackle financial exclusion, including more face-to-face money advice, supporting local citizens advice bureaux, support for not-for-profit lenders and with the possible extension of the community investment tax relief.

Our child trust fund will build savings and wealth for every child in the country. In addition to the £250 and £500 down payments that families will receive early next year, we will now consult on extending the child trust fund so that, at the age of seven, we add to the £250 and £500 with another £250 and another £500 for the poorest child in poverty. I hope that, given the long-term commitment that this proposal involves to invest in every child in our country, every political party in the House will now support the child trust fund.

It is because of sustained growth and, after 1997, the prudent reduction of debt and debt interest payments that we can make extra resources today available to local authorities, we can meet the costs of Iraq and the fight against terrorism, we can freeze fuel duties to deal with the impact of the oil price rise, do more to equip the country for the challenges of the long term and are still able to meet all our fiscal rules, with levels of debt and deficit below all our main competitors.

Within the overall fiscal figures, I am now also able to move forward our long-term agenda for opportunity for all: to make Britain ready to meet the global challenge by moving people from low-skilled jobs to high-skilled jobs, with a new programme to improve skills and employment in our country and to ensure opportunity for every child while meeting the demands of modern family life—a 10-year child care strategy for Britain.

Since 1997, with education maintenance allowances, modern apprenticeships and the new deal, our priority has been to ensure that no teenager in the United Kingdom after 16 should be outside employment, training or education. With the Queen's Speech legislation to extend benefits to teenagers staying on in unwaged training as well as in college or school, we are removing from teenagers the remaining financial barriers so that every young person can stay on in education or training after 16 to get the qualifications that they need.

But we know also that 80 per cent. of the 2015 work force have already left school and are in the world of work, and it is their skill levels and their qualifications that will, over the next decade, determine the prosperity of our country. So a policy of opportunity for all must provide opportunity for those who have missed out and who should, in the economic interests of the country, have a second chance.

Today 30 per cent. of employees have very low skills or no skills at all. We have, unfortunately, the highest proportion of unskilled of any major European Union country. The unskilled worker is four times less likely to be offered training in work than the highly qualified. For decades, low skills have been an Achilles heel of Britain as a modern economy and the post-war laissez-faire training system has not, and will not, meet the skills needs of our future.

Learning from successful training policies among our European competitors and building on the 100,000 individual success stories of those given time off for training through what have been called the employer training pilots in Britain—the majority who have benefited from them are women, the majority of them have no prior skills and the vast majority of them successfully attain their qualifications—we are able to announce today their roll-out to the whole country, creating for the first time in Britain a national employer training programme, with employers recognising their responsibilities to offer time off, employees recognising their responsibilities to take up the opportunities and the Government recognising our responsibilities to play a part in funding the training.

Since the Budget, lower spending on unemployment has released resources, which means that, together with additional money reallocated by the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the funds are now available for every employer to make an offer to every adult employee without skills. In future, every adult who has missed out at school will have the funds and the opportunity to acquire skills, starting with a level 2 qualification equivalent to GCSEs at A to C, through time off, free training provision and the help on offer from employers.

With that national employer training programme, combined with the new deal for skills, the offer is, for every adult without skills, in or out of work, a skills check-up and free training provision to achieve level 2 qualifications. And to extend this offer more widely to the unskilled out of work and on benefit who, up until now have been debarred from training by the 16-hour rule, we propose to pilot an additional £10 a week learning allowance.

Britain's future as a productive nation depends on a shared determination, from parents and teachers to management and trade unionists, that the acquisition of skills by all and their continuous upgrading is a shared national purpose. In furtherance of this, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and I have asked the chairman of the National Employment Panel, Sandy Leitch, to build on today's decisions, report on the long-term skills needs for intermediate and degree level skills in the economy, and work with employers throughout the country to ensure that every employee is offered those new opportunities.

The successful economies and societies of the next 20 years—[Interruption.] They have some rethinking to do. The successful economies and societies of the next 20 years will also invest in the potential of all children. We want to transform the way parents are enabled to balance work and family life. A long-term strategy for children and child care starts from recognising two facts of modern life: that the life chances of children are critically determined by the care, support and education they can receive in the years before five as well as after five; and that while 50 years ago fewer than a third of married women were working, today over two thirds of two-parent families have two earners striving to balance the needs of work and family life. The Government's response to this new reality must start from the enduring principles of the Beveridge report: that the family is the bedrock of society; that nothing should be done to remove from parents their responsibilities to their children; and that it is in the national interest to help parents meet their responsibilities.

As part of the new 10-year framework that we are announcing today, the Government set out and make the choice to allocate funds for new reforms in the coming Parliament. First, parents should be able to stay at home longer when their child is born and have the means to do so; secondly, parents should enjoy more flexibility in the workplace when their child is young; thirdly, parents should be guaranteed more accessible, affordable and safe child care while they are at work; and, fourthly, at all times their children, no matter what their background, should enjoy the highest-quality education and care—a welfare state that is truly family-friendly for the first time in its history.

The first choice that parents want is more choice to stay at home. Building on the extension of maternity leave from 18 to 26 weeks, the increase in maternity pay from £56 a week to more than £100, and the introduction of two weeks' paid paternity leave already in this Parliament, we will for the first time respond to the case made to us for greater choice, and we will make paid maternity leave transferable from mothers to fathers. Parents want more flexibility to be with their children not just in the infant years but as their children grow up, so the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will consult on extending what has been the successful right to request flexible working, which has already helped 800,000 parents, to parents of older children, again creating more choice and more flexibility for today's parents.

Secondly, having taken the best educational advice about the learning needs of children, and building on the successful introduction of free nursery education this year for three and four-year-olds, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills and the Minister for Children, Young People and Families will, from April 2007, extend our free nursery education to 15 hours a week, as we move towards our long-term goal of 20 hours of free nursery care for 38 weeks a year for every three and four-year-old child.

Thirdly, improvements in the availability, affordability and quality of pre-school and after-school child care are indeed required to meet the needs of working parents struggling to balance the demands of employment and of family life, so the Secretary of State for Education and Skills is today setting aside additional resources to enable schools to remain open from 8 am to 6 pm and to improve the quality and career prospects of those who undertake child care. It is right that parents make a contribution towards out-of-school child care costs, but it is also right, in the interests of both the economy and parents, that we do more for all parents. From April, employers will be able to offer employees, right up the income range, £50 a week extra for child care free of any tax or national insurance. For those on lower and middle incomes we will raise and extend the child care tax credit. It will cover up to 80 per cent. of child care costs, up to £170 a week for the first child and £300 for two or more children, benefiting families on incomes up to £59,000 a year. For a two-earner household on median earnings of £34,000 with typical child care costs, it will be worth an extra £700 a year.

Our fourth goal is that every child should have the best start in life. There are now 600 Sure Start children's centres, and anyone who has visited them knows that they provide not just children's services but a great focus for community life. By 2008, instead of 600 centres we plan 2,500; and today I can go further and announce that by 2010 in England alone there will be 3,500—one for every community, and on average five children's centres in every constituency in the country. As a result of these announcements there will be another 1 million new child care places by 2010. That is a commitment to children and child care worth in total £600 million more by 2007–08—money that could not be delivered if public spending plans were cut by £35 billion.

I have one further announcement to make for families. So that mothers and fathers can spend more time at home with their young children, I am today allocating £285 million, so that from April 2007 we will extend paid maternity leave. Instead of the four and a half months maximum in 1997, it will rise from six months today to nine months, and we will set a goal of an entire year of paid maternity leave. I can also announce that where the maximum maternity pay and child benefits for mothers at home with their first baby in 1997 was just £2,610 for the first year, it will rise by 2007 to £8,300. Even after inflation that is £5,000 more—the most generous maternity support and support for young children ever in the history of our country.

A society is judged by its generosity to its children and the elderly, who have served the community all their lives. I can also announce that next year, at a cost of an additional £260 million, for those over 70 we will add to the winter fuel payment with an additional

£50 payment. Pensioners aged over 70 will receive a total of £250, and pensioners over 80 will receive a total of £350.

Stability is the foundation; more investment, not less; now and into the next Parliament; opportunity not just for some but for all and a progressive Britain we can be proud of. I commend this statement to the House.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) (Con): The Chancellor seems to have noticed that the Prime Minister's friend, Commissioner Mandelson, recently warned him against "exaggerated gloating", but he does not appear to have heeded the advice. He prefers to slide over inconvenient facts. He did not take much time discussing the figures for current borrowing, and he did not take much time discussing the golden rule either—and no wonder: it has been alchemy in reverse, and the golden rule has turned to dross in his hands. The golden rule was meant to be a guarantee that the Chancellor would borrow only to invest—all talk: he is borrowing to spend. His current borrowing for the first seven months is almost twice as high as his last prediction for the year as a whole, and he has just announced borrowing of £170 billion over six years. Why do the ITEM Club and the Institute for Fiscal Studies say that he has a black hole in his finances of £10 billion? Why do the International Monetary Fund and the National Institute of Economic and Social Research say that he has a £12 billion black hole? Why do the CBI, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, the British Chambers of Commerce and the all the rest say that, on his spending plans, he will have to raise taxes? Why do 20 of the 21 economists on the Treasury's own panel say the same? Does not the Chancellor feel a little isolated?

The fact is that the tide is going out on the Chancellor's credibility. The tragedy is that the Chancellor is spending, borrowing and taxing so much because he is not getting value for taxpayers' money. He says that he has a plan to cut waste. Whose waste? It is his waste. We have paid all the taxes. Where has all the money gone?

This is the Chancellor—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let the right hon. Gentleman speak.

Mr. Letwin: This is the Chancellor who paid for £1,000 chairs for Ministry of Defence civil servants, each of which would have paid for three flak jackets for soldiers serving in Iraq. That is not the holy grail of value for money. He is not Sir Lancelot, he is Sir Wastealot. The Chancellor's plans to save money are like his promise to borrow only for investment—all talk.

Last year, the Chancellor's plan for cutting bureaucracy increased civil service numbers by 12,000. This year, he is doing even better. In just five months, in just one newspaper, his bureaucracies advertised 4,000 new jobs. That is a salary cost of more than £150 million. Talking of advertising, is the right hon. Gentleman proud of having increased the Government's advertising budget by £100 million? That is 17,000 heart bypass operations. And that is not the only thing he has increased. He has increased the number of tax collectors twice as fast as the number of nurses; he has increased the number of bureaucrats and support staff in education twice as fast as the number of teachers; and he has increased the bill for management consultants by £1 billion a year.

The Chancellor says that Britain is working, but it is the bureaucrats, the administrators and the management consultants who are at work. Our public services are not working. After 66 stealth tax rises, why are there 1 million people on hospital waiting lists? Taxes have gone up by £5,000 per year per family in Britain, so why are 5,000 people a year dying from infections picked up in dirty hospital wards? These are fundamental failures of public service delivery. The Chancellor cannot mask them by making grand speeches about the long-term future of the economy, particularly when he himself is jeopardising that future with his taxes and regulations.

Our friend, Commissioner Mandelson, wants to know why our productivity is not better, and the commissioner is right to ask that question, because the Chancellor has presided over an economy whose productivity growth rate has dropped by a third, an economy that has slipped from fourth to eleventh in international competitiveness, and an economy that has grown more slowly than that of any other major English-speaking country. The Chancellor cannot make up for his failures of public service delivery by parading new schemes. His pledges to pensioners and council tax payers today will not make up for 70 per cent. increases—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for South Shields (Mr. Miliband) wants to carry on a conversation, he should go outside the Chamber. As a Minister, he should know better.

Mr. Letwin: I am grateful, Mr. Speaker, but I fear that the irritation of those on the Government Benches may grow. Labour Members do not want to hear it, but the plans announced today will not make up for the 70 per cent. increase in council tax that have driven many pensioners to despair. The Chancellor's plans for financial exclusion cannot make up for the fact that the savings ratio has dropped by a third.

The Chancellor's grand statements about science will not make up for the fact that 100 university science departments have closed. His scheme for child care will not make up for the lack of discipline in schools. The Chancellor's plans for training will not make up for the fact that one child in three leaves primary school without being able to write properly. The Chancellor's plans for academic research will not make up for the damage he caused when he created the rules that he is now abolishing.

The country faces great challenges in the years ahead, not least from the emerging economies of the sub-continent and the far east. We have the capacity as a country to meet those challenges, but we will not succeed if we are held back by failed schemes, fat government and excessive regulation. We will not succeed if economic growth is siphoned off to pay for bloated bureaucracy that fails to give value for money.

The long and the short of it is that the Chancellor's failure to give Britain's taxpayers value for money will be the terrible legacy of this Government.

Mr. Brown: Why did not the shadow Chancellor tell us the truth? He said on the radio this morning that his plans involve £35 billion of cuts in public spending. Why does he not tell us that the dividing line between his party and ours is that even if he sacked every civil servant in the land he would still have to find £20 billion in public spending cuts before there was even a hint of a tax cut for Opposition Members? Why does he not admit that his policies involve a £1.8 billion cut in transport, a £4.8 billion cut in local government, a £1.6 billion cut in the Home Office and an £800 million cut in international development?

Sooner or later, Opposition Members will have to face up to the statements being made by the shadow Chancellor, who, while he speaks in the House about waste, bureaucracy and administration, is committing his party in every constituency to sack nurses, teachers, child care workers and home helps.

We will not take lectures on bureaucracy and waste from the shadow Chancellor, the architect of the poll tax. That was the biggest single administrative cost to the country—£7 billion for poll tax registration officers, poll tax collection officers, poll tax repayment officers and poll tax compliance officers. The shadow Chancellor is still proud of the poll tax, which was an administrative nightmare.

As for the economy, does not the right hon. Gentleman accept that productivity is rising, not falling, and that we have closed the gap with Japan, and are closing the gap with Germany and France? Even his shadow Minister for deregulation, in a statement made to private businesses, praises this country and says:

"Places like . . . the UK . . . attract because their tax rates for business are low."

So why should we take lectures on the economy from a shadow Chancellor who was an adviser to a Government who had 15 per cent. interest rates, 10 per cent. inflation, 1.25 million people in negative equity, and who caused two of the worst recessions to hit our country?

When the shadow Chancellor speaks about nurses and doctors in the national health service and compares them with tax inspectors, does he not know that 70,000 people in total were employed in the Inland Revenue, and the increased number of nurses alone under this Government is 79,000, and that there are 20,000 more doctors in the NHS? Again, we will take no lectures from the shadow Chancellor about front-line public services and their improvement. He ought to tell us the truth—that the cuts that he proposes are not in administration, but go right to the heart of public services, and that he has always believed in privatising health and education. Conservative Members should go back to their constituencies and think again.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Last week, the Prime Minister gave us the politics of fear, and this week the Chancellor has given us the economics of complacency. I have always been happy to acknowledge the contribution that the Chancellor has made to economic stability and steady growth, although an awful lot of people who have been caught up in the boom-and-bust cycle in the housing market or in unrepayable debt and collapsing pension funds would be less charitable than I am. It is now clear, however, that there is an additional problem in relation to the Budget. All the independent forecasters say that there is a deficit; it might be a small deficit, but there is a consensus. The Chancellor says that there is not, so who are we to believe?

There is an issue of credibility and trust, and we cannot have a continuation of a situation in which the Chancellor sets his own tests and then marks them. What we need is the equivalent of a thorough Ofsted inspection of the Government's accounts. The Chancellor already agrees that the National Audit Office should examine some of his Budget assumptions. Why does he not agree to let all of them be examined and to see whether the golden rule has been met, and thereby re-establish some credibility? What has he got to hide?

It is clear that there are some serious loose ends in Government public spending. The Chancellor has confirmed that he is providing an extra £500 million for the war in Iraq. The total cost to the British taxpayer of the successful first Gulf war was £500 million—the same sum—and 80 per cent. of the costs were fully paid by grateful European and Arab allies. The current war has cost seven times as much—£3.5 billion—and is growing at £125 million a month, with no end in sight. If the forces are to stay in Iraq until the beginning of 2006, as the Prime Minister said, will the Chancellor confirm that that will cost an additional £1 billion, which he will have to find?

What about the identity card? Its cost was originally put at £3 billion. On Tuesday, the Home Office said that the card was going to cost £5.5 billion. Yesterday, the Prime Minister did not know. Can the Chancellor tell us how much it will cost and who will pay the cost overrun?

It is because the budget is tight that we simply cannot afford a reckless George Bush-style tax-cutting spree of the kind that the Conservatives have trailed in the Daily Express. I am told that the proposals were considered so implausible that more cerebral and moderate newspapers such as The Sun and the Daily Mail would not even publish them, but since the proposals are essentially about titillation rather than satisfaction, it is perhaps appropriate that they have found a home in Mr. Desmond's publications.

On taxation, what is required is simpler and fairer taxation. The Chancellor has endlessly tinkered, and has created a complete mess as a result. There is a very revealing table in the Adair Turner report on pensions showing that 40 per cent. of all pensioners are now paying a marginal tax rate of more than 50 per cent. Some 1.5 million hard-working families are now paying a marginal tax rate of more than 60 per cent. The Government criticise the Liberal Democrats because we propose that very rich people should pay a marginal tax rate of only 50 per cent. So why does the Chancellor think that this situation is tolerable for millions of pensioners and hard-working families?

While I am on the issue of unfair tax, let me conclude with this question. The Chancellor said today that he has found £500 million to cut the growth of council tax rates. Has he dropped his proposal from last year to compensate pensioners with a £100 payment towards their council tax? Will he also say where he got the £500 million from? Is it true, as is reported, that cuts are now having to be made in the education and health budget in order to fund that increase? Would it not be much more sensible to deal with this grossly unfair and regressive tax by getting rid of it altogether and replacing it with a tax based on ability to pay?

Mr. Brown: Let us be clear on where we agree. As the shadow Chancellor told the "Today" programme:

"The Government's introduced a very good system of independent management and monetary policy . . . They've also introduced some very sensible rules for taxation and which relating to d.bt and the deficit and they've largely stuck by them."

I hope that he will accept that, on debt and deficit, the credibility of this Government and the figures that he was contesting today are well established over many years.

As for the hon. Gentleman's next point about the costs that have to be met, he will know that there is a reserve, and it is the reserve from which we pay for Iraq. As far as identity cards are concerned, the Prime Minister announced the figures yesterday. On the pensioners winter allowance, I have announced the figures today; £250 will be the payment for over-70 households, and it will be £350 for over-80s.

What the shadow Chancellor does not seem to understand is that it is because we rejected the other policy proposals that he put forward that we now have a successful economy capable of creating growth and generating revenues. It is because we rejected his policy to abolish the new deal that we have cut unemployment, so the bills from unemployment are down by more than £3 billion a year. It is because we did not accept his proposals to raise the national debt in our early years that we have reduced it and the bills from interest payments are down £4 billion a year. It is because we are generating growth, not by following his policies, but by following our policies, that more people are in work, there is more growth in the economy, businesses are investing and we are therefore generating the revenues to pay for our public services. It is for that reason that we are both meeting our fiscal rules and able to sustain the public spending commitments that we made.

I suggest that the Liberals need to do some thinking at this stage as well. Yesterday, I pointed out that the hon. Gentleman said that he was going to fix the share of public spending in national income at 2003–04 levels—41 per cent. If he were to do that, he would have to cut public spending by £10 billion now. Yesterday, he conceded to go half way in that direction, and said that he would have to cut public spending by £5 billion. Will he be honest enough to tell every constituency in the country about the £5 billion of cuts that a Liberal party election manifesto should be making?

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the assurance that the Chancellor has given that the fiscal rules will be observed. No doubt, we will have further questioning on that in the Treasury Committee on 15 December. The child care and family policies that he has introduced are particularly welcome. Surely, as a result, no child in any of our constituencies will be left behind.

On financial exclusion, the £120 million is most welcome for families who are both socially and financially excluded. Will the Chancellor indicate how the banks and not-for-profit organisations such as credit unions are going about this business? Does it not make it even more essential that the consumer credit Bill is implemented in the next few months?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the Chairman of the Select Committee, who has taken a big interest in this issue. Of course, he has been meeting the banks and financial institutions to look at issues of financial inclusion. The £120 million is precisely to do what he wants done—provide better advice to people; help people escape the loan sharks and others who have been charging interest rates that are too high; and create a range of potential providers of low-interest loans and credit for people from low-income families. I hope that he will be able to work with citizens advice bureaux and other organisations, which I think will welcome this new package for financial inclusion. I thank the banks for co-operating in what is a joint effort to persuade more people to open bank accounts and get the benefits that come from having a bank account, and not to be dependent on private and sometimes unsavoury loan agencies. I shall write to him about his first point. The important point is that we welcome the work of the Select Committee on financial inclusion.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) (Con): The Chancellor introduced the institution of pre-Budget reports. Is it really sensible to turn it into this annual ritual whereby he comes along with a string of detailed policy announcements about education, health and other domestic areas that he would like to have more charge of and produces a great deal of political rhetoric about Conservative Governments of the 1980s and about what Conservatives might do if they came into power now in order to obscure discussion of the mounting problem of the public finances, which are his principal responsibility? Does he accept that, if his critics are right—there are now myriad critics—that public spending is rising at an unsustainable level, that tax revenues are failing to meet his forecasts year in, year out and that public borrowing figures are getting more and more worrying as the situation deteriorates, this not only challenges his ingenuity in trying to demonstrate how he is meeting his fiscal rules but poses a very real and growing threat to the future health of the British economy, which somebody will have to deal with if he continues to be in denial about it for very much longer?

Mr. Brown: I have a great deal of respect for the former Chancellor, but I remind him of what he said in The Mail on Sunday on 21 June 1998:

"Our gloomy Chancellor is going to bust our economy without any risk of a boom coming first. I have been forecasting doom and gloom for the British economy in my column in Financial Mail for most of the past year".

He has been predicting exactly what he said today for almost every year since 1997.

The former Chancellor is not the only one who has come to the House to make announcements on health, education and other matters. He said that he would not have frozen public spending for the first two years, but we did, and I hope that he agrees that we have been raising public expenditure and getting it to the vital public services. He should support our policies, against Conservative Front Benchers.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on today's statement. Does he agree that many so-called forecasters have been mis-selling pensions and other financial services for a long time, and that they are as bad at selling as they are at forecasting? Although it is worth while and important to look towards international challenges from India and China, we have serious industrial challenges at home. He has correctly identified that those industrial challenges are not having a dramatic impact on inflation; none the less they impact on a number of businesses that depend on energy. Now that the emissions trading scheme is coming into play, will he re-examine the climate change levy, in order to reduce the burden on energy-based industries in this country and to allow businesses that are alive, well and working at the moment to survive?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who chairs the Trade and Industry Committee. I know that his work is part of his determination to ensure the future strength of British manufacturing industry. As he knows, we have frozen the climate change levy and look forward to the successful working of the emissions trading scheme. At the same time, he must recognise that when we introduced the climate change levy, it was part of a package agreed with business and the Government following the Marshall review. We cut national insurance for employers at the same time as we introduced the climate change levy. If we are to secure changes in both energy efficiency and the reduction of emissions, we must move forward with measures such as the climate change levy. I hope that my hon. Friend will continue to support the climate change levy, which is essential for a balanced policy for both the environment and the economy.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): When the Chancellor was calculating the figures for his statement, did he remember that when he sold more than half of this country's gold reserves, I repeatedly warned him that he was selling at the bottom of the market? Now that the price of gold has risen by about $200 an ounce, will he apologise for costing the British taxpayer some £1.5 billion by not accepting my warnings?

Mr. Brown: I do not accept that point. The previous Government, who failed to balance our reserves by making the gold sales a lot earlier, should take responsibility. It is right to have a proper balance in our reserves, which we have now achieved. The hon. Gentleman will have noticed that every other major country, apart from America, has been involved in gold sales. That includes France, which has announced gold sales in the past few months. I have always been willing to listen to the hon. Gentleman's advice, but whether it is on the Bank of England or on public expenditure, his record shows that he invariably gets things wrong.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I congratulate the Chancellor on his long-term commitment to science and technology, on which this country's future prosperity and global competitiveness depends. Is he aware that York university now receives more research funding per academic than any other university in Britain? Will he tell us a little more about what York's designation as a science city will mean when it comes into force?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has taken a huge interest in York's future economy, and I have worked with him on a number of related issues. The northern regional development agencies, One NorthEast, the Northwest Development Agency and Yorkshire Forward, have formed a partnership. As part of their new investment in technology, they are announcing today that they want to designate as science cities those cities and towns that have a cluster of scientific research and business research expertise, and a major interest, through universities and colleges, in the knowledge economy, and to invest more in their future development. That is in tune with what has been happening in the United States of America.

The Kok report, which was published in the past few days for the European Union, recommends the creation of science and technology cities throughout the EU. The northern development agencies are leading the way. I hope that through working with them, the specific proposals for York will expand science and technology-related jobs and ensure the long-term future of my hon. Friend's local economy.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Will the Chancellor think about Scotland for a second? That would be a good idea, because burgeoning oil revenues are needed to pay for the Prime Minister's wars and the Home Secretary's identity cards. Will he explain why his boasts about the performance of the UK economy are not matched by the performance of the Scottish economy, where unemployment is significantly higher and growth is significantly lower? The Scottish economy even went into technical recession in 2001 and 2002. Who is responsible for that failure? Is it the Chancellor, or the hapless Scottish Executive?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has predicted doom and gloom for the Scottish economy at every point since 1997. He must face up to the fact that employment, growth and living standards in Scotland are up, that more people own their homes in Scotland, that more people in Scotland are getting skills, and that more are going to universities and colleges. That is the result not of Scottish National party policy, but of the Labour Administration in the Scottish Parliament and the Labour Administration in the UK.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I congratulate the Chancellor on his child care policies, which are affecting all our constituencies, and welcome their extension today. To afford those policies, it is critical to maximise our revenue income, so I ask the Chancellor to re-examine his proposal to cut 16,500 jobs within Customs and Excise and the Revenue. Individual customs officers now bring in £12.9 million per post. Surely this is not the time to cut those posts.

Mr. Brown: I respect the work of customs officers and Inland Revenue officials and pay tribute to their work securing our ports and, along with Inland Revenue inspectors and tax collectors, ensuring that revenue flows to the Exchequer. Partly because of new technology, however, David Varney's proposals to bring together the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise will cut the gross number of jobs by 16,000. By redeploying some of the people in the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise, the final figure will be 13,500. That decision is right, because it means that more resources will go to other front-line public services.

I hope that my hon. Friend understands that as we expand health, education and the other public services, it is necessary, where new technology gives us the opportunity to do so, to change employment patterns. Although the Gershon proposal of 84,000 jobs is a very big number, it is a necessary means by which we can build a modern set of public services and get the resources to the front line.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Will the extra money to support local government come from health and education? In order to resolve the debate on whether, as the Institute for Fiscal Studies and the International Monetary Fund claim, a structural black hole of up to £10 billion exists, is the Chancellor prepared to commission the National Audit Office to audit his assumptions?

Mr. Brown: First, I have just explained to the Liberal shadow Chancellor why our public finances can not only sustain the public expenditure to which we are committed, but meet our fiscal rules. That is because we have cut employment and debt interest payments are substantially below their 1997 level. Because growth and rising employment are generating revenues, we can meet our public expenditure commitments and our fiscal rules. The hon. Gentleman should be satisfied that the figures that I am giving him on the future development of the economy are accurate and right. On the NAO, this Government, more than any other Government, have opened up the management and scrutiny of economic policy. However, decisions on taxation and public spending are rightly decisions for Parliament. The Government make a recommendation and Parliament decides. As for the hon. Gentleman's question about local government, we have to ensure that social services, education and health departments get the money that is necessary at the front line. That is the reason for our decisions.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): As the representative of a famous science city, I warmly welcome the continuing and increased investment in science. I also welcome the Chancellor's announced intention to remove tax barriers to spin-offs, which is an important move. Has he made any assessment of what it would mean to have a £500 million cut to business support in the Department of Trade and Industry budget?

Mr. Brown: I have seen recommendations from the Conservative Opposition; one of the people on the James review said that it would not matter if research councils were abolished in their entirety. That type of thinking does huge damage not only to the future of our country but to the morale of the scientific community. I wish that we could achieve an all-party consensus on the development of science, support for the research councils and support for the innovation and technology changes for which the DTI is responsible, some of which were announced today.

As for university spin-off companies, I hope that my hon. Friend will find that our detailed proposals solve a problem for scientists with shares in companies that are created as a result of university spin-offs. We are determined that companies that spin off from universities are given the best support possible because they, like many other companies that are starting up, are important to the long-term economic health of my hon. Friend's city—Cambridge—and the economy as a whole.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): With regard to fuel, the Chancellor mentioned fraud involving rebated oils. As he will know, in Northern Ireland that fraud puts tens of millions of pounds a year into the hands of paramilitary organisations. Could not he make that fraud much more difficult by ending the rebates and instead allowing people such as farmers to reclaim the tax on the fuel? That would not eliminate the fraud but would make it much more difficult, which might be helpful.

Also in relation to Northern Ireland, the Chancellor will have noticed that the number of adults who are in employment there is significantly below the UK level. He said that 75 per cent. of adults were in employment, but the percentage is much lower—in the mid-60s—in Northern Ireland. Is not part of the reason for that differential the fact that several of the Chancellor's measures to encourage people into work are not being fully applied in Northern Ireland? Will he consider that, especially with regard to the new measures that he mentioned?

As for the right hon. Gentleman's very interesting ideas for children, particularly with regard to nursery schools, will he have a word with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to persuade him to follow the same policies there?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman, and I shall be happy to meet him to talk about customs duties in Northern Ireland. We have stepped up the activities of Customs in dealing with this pernicious fraud, which has lost substantial sums of money and in some cases, as he alleged, helped forces that support terrorism.

As for the right hon. Gentleman's point about employment, the new deal is designed to raise the level of employment, and I am happy to work with him and others to see what we can do to make it more effective in Northern Ireland. That could form part of the meeting that we have on these issues.

As for children's services, I hope that everyone now recognises the importance that is attached, not only by the Government but by people who have looked at all these issues, to the education, care and support of the under-fives in particular. That is why we are making today's proposals.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Chancellor's new announcements about additional support for science in the north, although I am disappointed that at this first stage Liverpool has not been designated as a science city. Can the Chancellor assure me that the high-level scientific research at Liverpool university will be supported, including its joint projects with the Daresbury laboratory?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who takes a huge interest in the economy of Liverpool and has been promoting several initiatives to make it stronger. I believe that Liverpool university is now the biggest single employer in Liverpool; that shows its importance to the city and its future. Liverpool is the culture city of the future and may over time become a science city as well. I am very happy to meet my hon. Friend and her colleagues to discuss what we can do to promote economic development in Liverpool in that way.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): As always, the figures that the Chancellor did not talk about tell the real story about the risks to the economy. Since he has persistently underestimated the size of Government borrowing, and since tax receipts this year are coming in very much lower than his estimates at the time of the Budget, can he tell whether that is because of forecasting errors by his Department, or political interference in those estimates? Either way, will he subject to independent audit the definition of his so-called golden rule, and the reasons for those very serious forecasting errors?

Mr. Brown: That is a bit rich, given that the right hon. Gentleman was a Minister in the Conservative Government. We have opened up the auditing of public spending and revenue assumptions far more widely than they were ever prepared to do, and called in the National Audit Office to help us, which the Conservatives never did. He tells us that we must do more in this regard, yet he was not prepared to do anything.

As for the position on revenues, the right hon. Gentleman will see in the published documents that, because of rising employment and growth in the economy, revenues from income tax and VAT have risen, and that in key areas revenues from corporation tax have risen according to forecast. We will have to consider other areas over the next few months. He will also find that, although the former shadow Chief Secretary said yesterday that the borrowing figures would be around £40 billion, if I remember him rightly, in fact they are below £35 billion, at £34 billion. The shadow Secretary of State for Work and Pensions said at the Dispatch Box yesterday that the borrowing figures would be deteriorating, but they are improving every year.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East) (Lab): I congratulate the Chancellor on his firm stewardship and enlightened redistributive policies. I also echo his comments about the Scottish National party's continuing pessimism on the Scottish economy, given that I am sure that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) shares with me the lowest unemployment in his constituency for 25 years.

One of the problems in business start-up and development is that there is still a lack of free risk capital available to small companies. In my constituency, £50,000 has been applied for to develop an e-commerce project, and some nanotechnology projects require £3 million or £4 million. The trouble is that more money is spent on advice and bureaucrats than on freeing up risk capital for such enterprises. What might the Chancellor do to free up some of that capital for ventures that are of long-term benefit to the economy?

Mr. Brown: As my hon. Friend knows, regional venture capital funds have been set up throughout the United Kingdom. They are designed to encourage the provision of capital for new and dynamic businesses that are being created. That is a start, but there is a great deal more to do, because venture capital was previously aimed at support for management buy-outs rather than new ventures. I shall be happy to meet my hon. Friend to talk about the development of such industry in Scotland—and as for SNP Members, I think that the unemployment they are most worried about is the loss of their seats at the general election.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): Will the Chancellor remind taxpayers that last time he talked about sustainable growth before the election, they were hit by an increase in national insurance contributions after the election? Will he come clean with the country and admit that all this borrowing and extra spending means that sooner or later taxes will have to go up?

Mr. Brown: Again, the hon. Gentleman, who sits on the Treasury Committee, has been predicting gloom and doom year in, year out since 1997. Does he not accept that cutting debt interest payments and unemployment, together with the high growth that has been sustained in the economy and high levels of employment, have enabled us to meet our fiscal rules and to provide the public finance necessary to deliver a high level of public services? The hon. Gentleman should be most worried about his shadow Chancellor's proposal to cut £35 billion from public spending.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend knows that the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions has a genuine problem because of the 60,000 people who lost out through the idiotic Pensions Act 1995, and that £400 million has been allocated over 20 years to deal with that. Will he confirm that he has the flexibility to act if more than 60,000 people have lost out through that poor legislation? If the average loss is greater than £3,000, does he have the scope to effect appropriate compensation for those people?

Mr. Brown: It is indeed a scandal that people who lost their jobs lost their pensions at the same time. We are the first Government to take action to deal with the problems of thousands of pensioners who, as my hon. Friend rightly said, were deprived of what they had saved, and lost both jobs and pensions. As he also said, the sum set aside is £400 million. He asked whether we would review the figure. We have committed ourselves to doing that: after two or three years, we will review the arrangements. I assure my hon. Friend that the review will take place.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): The Chancellor will be aware of the growing sense of insecurity in many families because they know that their endowment policies will not produce enough money to repay their mortgage, or that their money purchase pension will not give them the standard of living that they expected. The only announcement on long-term savings in the Chancellor's statement referred to individual savings accounts, which are not popular. Will he review the tax treatment of endowments and money purchase pensions to ascertain whether there is a way of leaving more of the investor's money in those funds, to work harder for the needs of those who want to save and thus meet their long-term objectives?

Mr. Brown: I would take the former Treasury Minister more seriously if he had not suggested that ISAs were a failure through unpopularity. More than 16 million people have an ISA. Surely all the protestations of doom and gloom that the Conservative party made when ISAs were introduced have been proved wrong. One in five people on low incomes, instead of one in seven, have ISAs. Twice as many young people under 25 have ISAs as had TESSAs and PEPs. The right hon. Gentleman should welcome, not belittle, the success of the ISA scheme. Of course I shall examine his comments on other matters, but he should know that the Turner commission is considering the future of pensions.

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): On behalf of my constituents, I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend on his investment in families, especially the extension in child care, the coming extension in paid maternity leave and, of course, the extra money for child care. I invite him to see for himself evidence of his investment in our future, and ask him to visit the brand-new children's centre in Elland in my constituency, which is due to open in January, and witness the best practice of the local Sure Start initiative. That has already made a considerable difference to local people.

Mr. Brown: I take that as an invitation to visit my hon. Friend's constituency, and I shall be happy to do that. By 2010 there will be 3,500 children's centres. I have visited many Sure Start centres. The more that is known about their success, the more people will want to support them. I believe that, over time, we might be able to persuade even our opponents that Sure Start is a good investment. Investment made before the age of five is crucial to determining a child's future, and it is important that the country begins to recognise the value of investments such as that in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Earlier, in answer to Conservative Front Benchers, the Chancellor rightly reminded the House about the disaster of the poll tax. Not only was it unfair, but it collapsed, partly because it involved an attempt to construct a register of the population, and where everyone lived, on a daily basis. Does the right hon. Gentleman recognise that many of our constituents, who are already suffering at the Government's hands through their handling of tax credits and the Child Support Agency computer system, will believe that the £5.5 billion that he is setting aside for identity cards would be better spent now on front-line security, to provide better security by having more police and better border controls?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman was giving a balanced account of events—before he started speaking about tax credits. Six million families have tax credits, and many millions more children benefit from them. Instead of opposing tax credits, why does the Liberal party not start supporting them? They are the main reason why millions of people are being taken out of poverty in this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. We must now move on.

Local Government Finance Settlement

1.54 pm

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement about local authority revenue finance for England in 2005–06.

The settlement that I am announcing for 2005–06 will be the eighth successive one in which we have provided local government with grant increases above inflation. That is a real terms increase of 33 per cent. over the past eight years, which contrasts with a 7 per cent. real terms cut in the last four years of the previous Government.

Total support from Government grant and business rates in 2005–06 will be £60.1 billion. That is £3.5 billion, or 6.2 per cent., more than in 2004–05. It contrasts with a total of just £35.9 billion in 1997–98, in the last settlement announced by the Conservative party. The total of £60.1 billion includes £26.7 billion of revenue support grant, £18 billion of business rates, £4.3 billion in police grant and £11.1 billion in specific grants. Of those totals, £49 billion will be distributed by formula to local authorities—an increase of £2.6 billion, or 5.6 per cent. I shall announce the detailed allocations today.

The figures include the extra provision to help local government meet pressures at reasonable council tax cost that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced earlier. They demonstrate the Government's continuing commitment to both local government and council tax payers.

I can confirm that we propose no changes in the grant distribution formulae for 2005–06. That is consistent with the formula freeze that we announced for three years from 2003–04. It provides councils with a measure of stability, which is essential for forward planning.

I have already referred to the totals available in specific grants. They perform a valuable role in, for example, targeting funds in a way that the main formula cannot. We are bringing forward the announcement of the allocation of many of those grants to help councils plan ahead with more confidence.

For several years, we have applied guaranteed minimum grant increases—floors—and upper limits on grant increases, known as ceilings, to help pay for floors. Floors are well accepted. Unlike the position when the Conservative party was in power, councils are no longer faced with losing grant from one year to the next. There is no wish to do away with the floor mechanism but there has been lively debate about how the cost of the floor is to be paid.

Let me be plain. The cost has to be found within the total of grant available, and it follows that if authorities that would otherwise receive less than the floor are to benefit from enhanced grants, the remaining authorities with larger grant increases must contribute.

Over recent years, we have operated a system of ceilings, putting a maximum limit on grant increases, thereby ensuring that those authorities due to receive the largest increases contributed most to the cost of the floors. However, I have been impressed by the arguments put by authorities, especially in areas with rapidly growing populations, that imposing a ceiling is especially hard on them as they are never likely to receive the additional grant that a rising population, and hence rising pressure on services, would otherwise provide for them. Having said that, exempting population growth areas from ceilings would not be the best approach, as it would be bedevilled by arguments about exactly where to draw the line.

I have therefore concluded that we should abolish the grant ceiling. Floors will be financed entirely by scaling back grant increase above the floor. All authorities above the floor will make a contribution, but none as great as the ceiling authorities used to make.

For 2005–06, the grant floors will be as follows: for authorities with education and social services responsibilities, 4 per cent.; for shire district councils, 2.5 per cent.; for fire authorities, 2.5 per cent.; and for police authorities, 3.75 per cent. For the third consecutive year, every authority in England will receive an above-inflation increase on a like for like basis.

As in previous years, we will adjust the floor scheme to provide support to authorities with increased levels of capital investment as a result of new capital allocations issued by the Government. We will also, this year, adjust the floor scheme to provide protection for councils that lose grant under the amending report for 2003–04.

We will, as we did last year, ensure that every authority with education responsibilities receives an increase in its formula grant at least as large as the increase in its schools formula spending share. Again, as last year, we will expect all authorities to pass their schools FSS increase on to their schools budget other than in wholly exceptional circumstances. We have adjusted the FSS totals within the planned total to reduce the pressure of passporting and to increase growth in the environmental, protective and cultural services block, in recognition of the importance of the local services covered by it.

We are rigorously applying the principle that, if Government policies impose new spending burdens on local government, Government will make provision to fund them.

The Government are more than doubling our contribution to the cost of local authorities' civil protection activities from 2005–06. That will significantly enhance the capacity of local authorities to respond to a wide range of emergencies, whether caused by natural disasters, accidents or terrorism.

We listen carefully to local authorities' views on the costs of implementing new initiatives and act on them where appropriate. In response to concerns expressed by local authorities on the fee levels of the new licensing scheme, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport has agreed a substantial increase in earlier estimates, and the latest proposals are now out to consultation. She has also given an undertaking that there will be an independent review 12 months after the new regime has become fully operational.

From April 2005, authorities will be given further opportunities to increase locally raised revenue through the local authority business growth incentives scheme. That allows authorities to retain a proportion of growth in business rate revenue, with total freedom to spend this on locally determined priorities. It comes on top of the substantial additional freedoms extended to local authorities, including the prudential borrowing regime.

[Mr. Nick Raynsford]

new freedoms to trade and to charge for discretionary services, and continued reduction in ring-fencing in 2005–06, which will see ring-fenced grants fall to below 9 per cent. as a proportion of overall Government grant, which is even better than I promised last year.

A number of councils have expressed concerns that they are facing a substantial increase in pension contributions. We have listened to their concerns, agreed to amend regulations to ease certain pressures and issued advice to enable them to manage the outcome of the 2004 actuarial revaluation in the most effective way over the next three years.

In common with the rest of the public sector, councils need to be remorseless in the pursuit of efficiency. Following the Gershon review, the Government have set a target across the whole of the public sector to deliver more than £20 billion of efficiency gains a year by 2007–08. Local government is expected to contribute significantly to that, delivering at least £6.45 billion of efficiency gains. However, we believe that higher gains are attainable by local authorities, and Departments will work in partnership with them to help to achieve maximum efficiencies. This is a win-win scenario, as efficiency gains will be retained locally and can be used for reinvestment in front-line services.

With substantial additional funding, real scope for efficiency gains and the additional flexibilities that I have outlined for councils, there is no excuse for authorities to set excessive increases in council tax. The average increase in council tax in 2004–05 was 5.9 per cent. Although that was less than half the previous year's increase, and the lowest in almost a decade, there is still considerable scope for authorities to do better. We expect to see substantially lower increases next year, with a national average increase of less than 5 per cent.

The Government used our reserve capping powers for the first time this year to deal with excessive increases. We will continue to use those powers to ensure that council tax payers do not face unacceptable increases. We are prepared to take even tougher action in 2005–06. That applies to all authorities, including police and fire authorities.

We will continue to support local authorities in promoting take-up of council tax benefit. We are including information about the benefit in this year's winter fuel payment letters, which go out to about 8 million households, and we are following that up with regional and national press advertising. We will also encourage local authorities to include clear information about council tax benefit with council tax bills and, where appropriate, a simple coupon to return indicating a wish to claim benefit. Looking ahead, my colleagues in the Department for Work and Pensions are developing proposals to streamline the claims process for pensioners when more than one benefit is claimed, so that they do not have to provide the same information twice.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced today, the Government will repeat next year our help for pensioners aged 70 or older, by giving them a £50 payment to help them with their council tax bills. The amount reflects the fact that we expect a substantially lower average increase in council tax next year.

The Government have demonstrated our continued commitment to local government. We have increased investment year on year: £24.2 billion since 1997–98, and a further £3.5 billion this year. We have ensured once again that every council has an above-average increase in formula grant. We have given councils more opportunity and flexibility to raise and deploy local resources to meet their priority needs. In return, we expect, and all taxpayers expect, that local government will continue to deliver improving services at an affordable cost. If they do not, we are prepared to take tougher capping action. I commend the settlement to the House.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I thank the right hon. Gentleman for early sight of his statement and the accompanying documents. Such release of information is entirely typical of him, and it makes for much better debate.

Over the past four weeks, I have been due to share a platform with the right hon. Gentleman or other Ministers on no less than three occasions. Each time, the relevant Minister has cried off at the last minute, because of some reversal of the Government's fortunes, much to the disappointment of the audience and myself. Given the nature of the Chancellor's financial allocation to local government, I am sure that the whole House will share my relief in finding the Minister in his customary place today. Who would have blamed him if he had decided to absent himself? Indeed, the Deputy Prime Minister has sought to create as much physical distance as possible between himself and today's statement by travelling to China. That seems a little excessive, but it is no doubt a comfort to the great man.

This statement is nothing more than a poor attempt to paper over the cracks of a crumbling council tax policy, a fiddled financial settlement and an abandoned balance of funding strategy. It is a dawn raid masquerading as a strategy. So ill thought-out are the measures that they have provoked a senior Government official, in the pages of today's Financial Times, to use a four-letter word to describe the measures, and pejoratively to invite the Government to depart. I am sure that that anonymous mandarin, in both his choice of words and his sentiment, speaks for the whole nation—in spades.

The record clearly shows that the Opposition have been more accurate in predicting levels of council tax than the Government. The Government's winter boasts are soon drowned out by April misery for the taxpayer. I have with me a full list of the Labour Government's predictions on the adequacy of the settlement, and the folly that they produced. I shall let just one speak for the many. Last year, on the settlement, the Minister said:

"We have provided a good settlement, on the basis of which local authorities can plan for future improvements in services without unreasonable increases in council tax." —[Official Report, House of Commons, 19 November 2003; Vol. 413, c. 789.]

That settlement did not even have to wait until the spring to be proved inadequate. In a few short weeks, the Chancellor had to bung in an extra £340 million. What is the status of that £340 million? Has it been carried forward to next year? If so, given that £350 million relates to ring-fencing, the Chancellor's £1 billion bung begins to look very small—it begins to look like about £250 million.

Last year, because of the Government's insistence on passing on increases to schools—which they are repeating this year—14 local authorities were left with no additional money for their other services. Will that be repeated next year, and how many councils will be affected? The Minister can talk all he likes about floors and ceilings, but he cannot hide the fact that under his Government council tax has gone through the roof. Further unbearable increases are in the pipeline as a direct result of this settlement.

In its small print, the July review predicted that the locally financed council tax element of local government would increase from £18.6 billion in 2004 to £19.8 billion. That represents an increase of 6.7 per cent., or three times the rate of inflation. Will the Minister confirm that on page 209 of the Chancellor's pre-Budget report, issued today, council tax receipts are projected to soar by £1.6 billion? Will he confirm that page 23 forecasts inflation at 1.75 per cent.? We are looking at an increase in council tax receipts over four times the rate of inflation.

The change in council tax receipts clearly mirrors the increase in council tax demand. Since 1997, receipts have risen by 80 per cent., and in England council tax has risen by 70 per cent. The figures clearly marry.

The settlement does not seem to recognise the unavoidable pressure on local authorities. The Local Government Association has measured it at about £1 billion. Let us examine three pressure areas. The Minister referred to certain pressures on pensions. His solution is to try and put it off for a couple of years, but how are local authorities to manage with pension costs due to rise next year by an extra £300 million and the year after by an extra £900 million? Pressure from the growth in waste levels, waste taxation and waste legislation will cause costs to escalate from £225 million this year to £480 million next year.

Do the Government really want Hampshire to raise council tax by £4 million, Devon by £4.4 million or Tandridge by 2.2 per cent.? Perhaps they do, as much of the money will go straight back to them.

There will also be more children receiving social care. The Children Act 2004 places additional burdens on authorities. Why are the Government not making adequate plans to meet the growth in children's services with an increase from £94 million next year to £587 million in 2007?

Local government leaders have long argued that the retail prices index is an inappropriate measure to gauge local costs. On 24 June, the Local Government Association met the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, who agreed to start work on a price index for local government. What progress has been made so far?

Then there is the question of the census. The amending revenue support grant report for 2003–04 was published on 18 November, but the issuing of the report for 2004–05 has been postponed until next year to ensure that all possible revisions of the data used in the 2004–05 settlement will be included.

The House will rejoice at the recognition of the disservice done to the Manchester and the restoration of its missing citizens. They will receive an extra £7.8 million. Other areas are less fortunate, however. Worcestershire will lose £1 million, and Norfolk nearly £500,000. The South Yorkshire police authority will lose nearly £1 million. Worst of all, Surrey will lose £2.3 million. On 25 November, the leader of its county council wrote this to the Minister:

> "Under your proposals, Surrey stands to lose £2.23 million in respect of 2003–04, a greater loss than any other council in the country . . . Why should the people of Surrey pay for a mistake made by central Government?"

The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) put it more robustly when he suggested earlier this year that the national statistician could not count up to 60 million.

What justification can there be for asking council tax payers to pick up the tab for central Government's own blunders? Every year Labour promises a generous funding settlement for local councils, yet every year under this Government council tax has soared by three times the rate of inflation. This year the average council tax bill in England is over £1,000, an increase of 70 per cent. or almost £500 since Labour came into office. That is equivalent to almost £100 a month from people's take-home pay or pensions.

The reason is simple: the Government have chosen to use the council tax for a purpose for which it was never intended. They have transferred burdens and duties to local authorities without resources. The council tax has become their stealth tax of choice.

The Minister knows that what he has announced today will store up massive council tax increases for the future. His strategy for the council tax is now in tatters; all that remains is for the electorate finally to bury it in May.

Mr. Raynsford: It was interesting that the hon. Gentleman managed to keep a straight face during some of his remarks. He remembers what life was like when his party was in government. He remembers the settlements that Conservative Members announced from this side of the Chamber. Those settlements did not give grant increases to local government; in some years they actually cut grant, and in no year did they match inflation. I do not know how he has the cheek to attack a Government who have provided huge increases.

Let me remind the hon. Gentleman of the figures. In the 1997–98 settlement, the last that his party presented to the House, £35.9 billion was given to local government. This year's total is £60.1 billion. That is thanks to a Government who have been increasing funding, supporting local government and listening to local government, and who are taking action to tackle the problem of authorities—and some Tory authorities have a poor reputation in this regard—that are charging too much council tax. We have made it very clear that we will use tough capping powers to deal with authorities that increase council tax unduly.

Last year, Labour authorities increased council tax by 4.7 per cent., Tory authorities by 5.4 per cent. and Liberal Democrat authorities—I concede to the hon. Gentleman that their record is the worst—by 6 per cent. If Tory and Liberal Democrat councils had matched the performance of Labour councils, council tax increases last year would not have been 5.9 per cent.: they would have been below 5 per cent., a target that I would expect most sensible people to endorse.

The hon. Gentleman did not have the gall to admit that his own county of Essex is looking forward to an extremely good settlement—a 6 per cent. increase in its grant in the coming year. I am sure that when he talks to Lord Hanningfield, he will be able to discuss all the things that Essex county council will now be able to do thanks to the generosity of a Labour Government. That is nothing like what the council experienced under a Conservative Government.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the status of last year's £340 million increase by the Chancellor. It should be seen in the context of our £3.5 billion increase in total spending in the current year: that is £3.5 billion, not £340 million.

The hon. Gentleman asked a very interesting question about the consequences that would appear in next year's settlement. I think that most Members expect a general election between now and then. It was interesting to note his tacit concession that his party did not have a prayer—that it did not have a chance of winning the election, and expected to remain in opposition with no influence on next year's settlement. I must tell him that his party, were it to come to office, would not offer a £3.5 billion increase. It has said quite openly, and the shadow Chancellor has said it repeatedly, that it would freeze local government expenditure. That would be a recipe first for cuts in services, and secondly for massive council tax increases. That is what the Conservative party stands for.

The 6.7 per cent. figure that the hon. Gentleman cited—probably not he but his researchers had delved into the more obscure aspects of the Red Book and other documents—fails to take account of the increase in council tax, so in any case it is not an accurate projection, but if he were to redo it on the basis of today's settlement, the figure would be 3.6 per cent. The Red Book is a reflection of historical patterns of council tax increases, and as further reductions in council tax levels occur as a result of this settlement, we will see a further reduction in the projection.

On pensions, we have already taken action to ease pressures in the coming year, and as the hon. Gentleman should surely be aware, we are already consulting on longer-term changes to enable local government to meet its responsibilities under the local government pension scheme, while at the same time not facing unreasonable costs.

On pressures on social care, the hon. Gentleman obviously has not looked at the details. Otherwise, he would know that the children's services that he claims we are underfunding will receive a 7.6 per cent. increase in resources in the coming year, which is well above the average.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that local government asked us to do an amending report if it turned out that the census figures had to be adjusted, and that Conservative authorities such as Westminster were in the forefront of asking for such a report. Local government knows that such a report does not put in additional money; it simply amends a previous settlement in the light of changed figures, so if authorities such as Manchester deserve an increase because former census projections underestimated their population levels, it is of course right and proper that there be an amending report, which means that there must be an adjustment for everyone. That is the inevitable consequence, and that is what local government as a whole asked us to do.

Finally, although the hon. Gentleman did the best job that he possibly could in the circumstances, he knows in his heart that this is a good settlement for local government, which provides the basis for local authorities to continue to deliver improved services with no need for large council tax increases.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. We have other business before the House later today, so may I ask Members to be brief in their questions and responses?

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): I thank the Minister for the statement, but I hope that his answers now will shed rather more light on what is actually planned. He suggested that there was new money for councils and for police and fire authorities, so that they can keep council tax down, but is it not true that, far from there being significant new money from the Treasury, most of this cash is coming from cuts elsewhere? Will he now list the cuts being made to fund this attempt to massage council tax downwards before the election?

Is it not true that Departments from education to environment are the losers? For example, is it not true that cash has been found by reducing recycling? Every year we see a last-minute attempt by Ministers to patch the council tax problem. Does that not show a Government in permanent crisis over the unfair council tax? When will they act for the long term, scrap council tax and stop resorting to short-term panic measures?

The Minister will doubtless claim that the extra money is not a pre-election fix. If so, can he confirm that it is permanent and not a repeat of last year's one-off grant? Does he accept that, even if Ministers succeed in manipulating council tax rises lower than last year's, such rises are likely to be higher than inflation? Can he confirm that an average council tax increase of 5 per cent. will be nearly four times the inflation rate used today by the Chancellor? If so, what will he say to pensioners on fixed incomes whose pensions go up only by the rate of inflation? Can he confirm that all pensioners' council tax bills will rise by £50 a year at the very least? Will he also admit that by forcing councils into one-off raids of reserves and into putting off resolving issues such as pension liabilities, Ministers are merely scheduling a massive council tax rise for after the election? Is this not the calm before the storm?

The Government know that the council tax system is in a mess; they wasted 15 months on the balance of funding review just to confirm that fact. Now, they have asked Sir Michael Lyons to sort out that mess, but by December next year—after the election. Why, then, will the Minister not admit that this statement and the Lyons review are simply stop-gap holding measures to get Ministers through the election before they tell us what they really think—if they win?

We have heard today that the Government plan to reform council tax benefit to increase take-up, but do they really expect the House to believe that an advertising campaign will make any significant difference? Some 40 per cent. of pensioners fail to claim the Government's pension credit, even though many millions have been spent on advertising it. Does the Minister really believe that council tax benefit take-up will be any better than that for the pension credit?

Will the Minister also explain why county councils in particular are being hit by this settlement? Why did he take the perverse decision to use 1991 census data for the 2005–06 grant? He knows that using 13-year-old data cost the counties more than £100 million, thereby adding 2 per cent. to their council tax bills. Why has he done that?

On the police settlement, of which we do not know the full details, does the Minister realise that pressure on police authorities from the rising pension bill is likely to make that settlement at best a standstill, and for authorities on the floor, a recipe for front-line cuts? Given the priority of law and order, can he not ensure that police authorities know his capping criteria in advance?

Can the Minister also explain why he continues to favour businesses over pensioners? He has given businesses certainty in respect of the revaluation of non-domestic rates by capping increases. Why has he made no such commitment to fairness in the forthcoming council tax revaluation? Is it not true that lurking behind this statement is the huge threat of council tax revaluation? Why do the Government refuse to say how such revaluation will work before the election? Does the Welsh experience not show that millions of taxpayers will experience massive rises in their council tax bills if revaluation goes ahead?

This is a pay now, pay more later settlement. Ministers have put off difficult decisions and are hoping for calm before a post-election storm, yet the council tax is so unfair that the storm is closing fast.

Mr. Raynsford: I have to laugh at the Liberal Democrats' efforts to present this as a bad settlement.

The hon. Gentleman asked a perfectly fair question about the extra money. Some £637 million of additional money has been secured through discussion with the relevant Departments, all of which have an interest in good local government delivering services, be they health or education services, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor rightly emphasised. There has been a cross-Government response to ensure that local government has the means to deliver the services that are needed, without an adverse impact on council tax. I would have expected him to welcome the additional money—totalling approximately £1 billion—and measures to ease pressures on local government.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of specific questions. He said that the council tax is unfair and asked why we are not scrapping it. The Liberal Democrats are extraordinary on council tax. Their proposal would inevitably produce a massive increase in bureaucracy. They want separate local income tax rates for each local authority in the country, which would entail not only a huge increase in bureaucracy but huge pressure on the Inland Revenue. The document in which they announced that proposal also states that in order to make savings,

"we will scale back the running costs of the Inland Revenue by . . . reducing the number of local tax offices."

Their own left hand does not know what the right is doing. That shows the attention that we should give to their entirely unconvincing approach to local income tax.

The hon. Gentleman clearly did not listen to what I said about measures to ensure that pensioners receive the help to which they are entitled. My colleagues in the Department for Work and Pensions are looking at specific ways of simplifying the process through which pensioners receive the benefit, in order to avoid the need for duplicate claims.

The hon. Gentleman says that the county councils will be hit, but he clearly has not looked at the figures. How is it, therefore, that Cambridgeshire is receiving an increase of more than 11 per cent., and Wiltshire a 9.4 per cent. increase? Such huge increases would have been unthinkable when the Conservatives were in government. Why does he not talk to his colleagues in Milton Keynes? Its Liberal Democrat-controlled authority is receiving a grant increase of more than 11 per cent. because of this Labour Government. He ought to give some credit where credit is due.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the settlement for police authorities. He will know that, as always on these occasions, it is announced separately by my colleagues in the Home Office.

On capping, we made it clear that we will apply capping principles across all groups of authorities and that there will be no exceptions.

The hon. Gentleman's final point was about revaluation and I must tell him that he should not draw any conclusions from the Welsh example, because it was decided in Wales to add an additional band at the top, but not at the bottom. Inevitably, that influenced the outcome in respect of the revaluation. There is no question of any commitment to a revaluation on that basis in England, so the hon. Gentleman should draw no conclusions whatever from what happened in Wales.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on securing a very good settlement indeed. I also congratulate him on the £50 for pensioners and on the take-up campaign that will be run. Will he recognise, however, that many pensioners had difficulty paying this year's bills, as they are cash-poor while being capital-rich? Is it not time that we put in place in this country an equity release scheme to enable pensioners, who in many cases have seen huge increases in the value of their properties, to free up some of that money to pay their council tax bills?

Mr. Raynsford: First, I thank my hon. Friend, the well known and experienced Chairman of the Select Committee who knows a great deal about these issues, for his kind comments on the settlement. He has better experience of what a good, as against a bad, settlement is. He will be pleased to know that his own authorities, Stockport and Tameside, are receiving grants increases of 5 and 4.9 per cent. respectively.

My hon. Friend asked about the position of pensioners who are capital-rich but asset-poor. He raises an important issue, which I know is being looked into carefully by the Lyons review. Sir Michael Lyons is an expert in this field and we believe that it is right for the complex issues of local government finance to be considered very carefully before decisions are taken. I have the utmost confidence in Sir Michael Lyons and his ability to produce sensible suggestions to tackle the real problem that my hon. Friend has identified.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Does the Minister realise that constituents will see the Government's further attempts to provide specific moneys to relieve council tax pressure at the expense of cuts in health and education as underpinned by a sense of guilt for the pressures they have placed on counties such as Bedfordshire? In recent years, that county council has suffered from extra costs, increased burdens from Government pressures, the transfer of moneys away from the shire counties to other places and problems stemming from the inability to use appropriate census data. Does the Minister not expect constituents to recognise cheats when they see them?

Mr. Raynsford: I would expect the hon. Gentleman to recognise that his own county of Bedfordshire has received a 6.5 per cent. increase—[Interruption.] I would also suggest that the hon. Gentleman moderates his language in future—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for North-East Bedfordshire (Alistair Burt) might want to rethink his statement.

Alistair Burt: I would not want to apply that statement to any Government Members, Madam Deputy Speaker. I was referring to the process by which this extra payment has been arrived at—through cuts in other budgets—and I stand by what I said earlier.

Mr. Raynsford: I regret, Madam Deputy Speaker, that the hon. Gentleman has not seen fit to withdraw an allegation that is wholly unfounded and does no justice to a settlement that has given his county a 6.5 per cent. grant increase. Most balanced Members of Parliament would acknowledge and recognise that. I tell the hon. Gentleman as I have told others that the Government have discussed the best ways to ensure that local government is properly financed in the years ahead and, more particularly, for the year 2005–06. We have done so on the basis of ensuring additional funding for local government, but without the threatened cuts that the hon. Gentleman talks about in other service areas. This is all about improving the delivery of services by local government, which impacts on all Government Departments—particularly the Department for Education and Skills and the Department of Health, because we hold education and social services very dear indeed.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his continuing support for local government. I would like to draw to his attention two sectors where pressures can be felt. The first is environmental protection and cultural services, for which the recycling of material and waste management are important and the second is health and social care. Local government is looking for additional support in those respects and I hope that my right hon. Friend will continue to give his support to those units. Will he also take note of police service demands for additional funding to meet their commitments?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend has taken a close and long-term interest in local government funding and particularly advocated the interests of the special interest group of municipal authorities. I am sure that he will be pleased to know that his own authority of Wakefield receives a 5.5 per cent. grant increase in this settlement. He asked about the EPCS settlement, which I know has been a matter of concern to many authorities. He will be pleased to know that, as a result of our work, we have increased the formula funding share provision for the EPCS block from £11.1 billion last year to £11.385 billion in the settlement for 2005–06—a 2.5 per cent. increase, which is much better than previously anticipated on the basis of the original spending review. We certainly recognise the importance of the EPCS block and the need for continuing investment in the matter of liveability.

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): One of the major concerns of the two district councils in my constituency is the burden placed on them by central Government when they have to deliver certain services, but the Government do not provide them with enough money. The Minister mentioned the Licensing Act 2003, in respect of which the fee income will probably lead to a major shortfall. East Dorset district council recently raised with me the access to information policy, whereby it can recover only 10 per cent. of the cost of the information that it provides. The disabled facilities grant is another problem. The Government office for the south-west has made a blanket 2 per cent. cut this year and the council might also lose more than £100,000 in respect of the planning delivery grant. Can the Minister reassure council tax payers in my constituency that they will not be burdened with yet more Government expenditure in the name of the local authority?

Mr. Raynsford: Yes, I can. The hon. Gentleman raised four issues. On freedom of information, the Local Government Association suggested in its initial submission that there would be an extra cost to local government of £125 million. When we analysed the figures with the association, it transpired that it was talking about the total cost to the whole public sector and the actual cost to local government is very much less. Following discussions between my colleagues in the Department for Constitutional Affairs and the LGA, the actual cost to local government was agreed at well below £20 million. That is the informed decision about the actual burden and it is provided for in the settlement that I have announced today.

I have already referred to the significant increase in licensing fees, which are currently the subject of consultation, and to the pledge by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport that there will be an independent review in any case, after the first year of the scheme. On disabled facilities grants, the hon. Gentleman will know that they have increased enormously during the past eight years. The level of grant has almost doubled over that time.

On planning delivery grants and planning fees, when the hon. Gentleman looks at the fine detail, he will realise that the Government are acting to make it easier for local authorities to deliver a good quality service and to receive support where they achieve the higher performance targets. The fees will also allow them to recover their costs, whereas there has been genuine concern in the past that that was not possible. On all the hon. Gentleman's points, there is a good news story and I hope that he will welcome his authority's 6.1 per cent. grant increase. Local government in Dorset will want to do its very best with the good settlement that it has received.

Mr. Tony Clarke (Northampton, South) (Lab): I listened carefully to my right hon. Friend's statement and he said that he had listened carefully and had been impressed by the arguments of authorities in areas with rapidly growing populations. Can he reconcile those comments with the fact that Northampton borough council, the largest district council in England and the town of his birth, has a settlement of 2.7 per cent.—just above the floor? Why then should I support his proposals? Why should I not object to his Department's proposals for an urban development corporation in that area, and why should not Northampton borough council withdraw its support on the same basis?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend will know that the settlement has given South Northamptonshire a significant increase of 8.3 per cent. as against the 2.7 per cent. increase for Northampton itself. That will reflect changes in demography and population, and it is right that those changes are taken into account. The position of all district councils is protected with a 2.5 per cent. floor so that all district councils have the means to deliver services with a settlement that is above the rate of inflation. My hon. Friend will no doubt want to welcome the fact that Northamptonshire county council has a 6.1 per cent. increase, which is a very good increase indeed.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): Is the Minister aware that in my constituency, which has one of the highest proportions of retired people, many pensioners are already finding the level of council tax unsustainable and many are forced to eat into their capital to pay it? What is contained in the announcement today that will result in a reduction in the council tax for the thousands of pensioners in Bognor Regis and Littlehampton who may not qualify for benefits but still cannot afford the tax even at its current rate and even with the promised £50 voucher?

Mr. Raynsford: I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman had heard when he was listening to the earlier exchanges that decisions on council tax are taken by local authorities. Conservative authorities do not have a universally good record on that. We have seen higher average council tax increases from Conservative authorities than Labour authorities. Only the profligate Liberal Democrats exceed Conservative authorities in a tendency to push up council tax.

The settlement gives a good increase to all local authorities. They all have an above-inflation increase. The hon. Gentleman will have heard my comments to the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter), who asked about action to tackle pressures on local government. This settlement involves not just increased funding for local government, but a series of measures designed to tackle the genuine pressures that local authorities face. In return, we expect authorities to budget prudently for low increases in council tax. We expect increases to be lower in the coming year than last year and to be below 5 per cent. in aggregate across the country.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I welcome the settlement that my right hon. Friend has announced, especially the £1 billion extra, which was precisely the figure that the now Conservative-led Local Government Association was asking for today. Will my right hon. Friend give me an assurance that if authorities such as mine in Sheffield can show in due course that they had substantial under-recording of the population on the census, as Manchester has proved, it will receive an increase in grant to reflect that fact?

Mr. Raynsford: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks about the impact of the settlement and the fact that it meets the concerns that have been voiced by local government about the adequacy of what was expected before it was announced. As for the census, we can make only one amending report for any year. There is no question of reopening the 2003–04 settlement. We are still looking at the position in respect of 2004–05. It has always been our position that if the Office for National Statistics makes adjustments to population figures we are prepared to reflect them in the settlement so that authorities who have had their population under-enumerated can receive compensation.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Why does this genial and generally affable Minister not deliver a statement that the council tax payers of South Staffordshire and every other district in the country can understand? Why do we have this jargon-led nonsense of "pressure of passporting", "prudential borrowing regime", "ring-fencing" and the ghastly "win-win scenario"? Why does the Minister not speak English so that the people of this country can understand what he is saying?

Mr. Raynsford: If I may say to the genial gentleman, for whom I have a great deal of respect, his councils are in a win-win situation. South Staffordshire, in which I know that he takes a close interest, has a 9.6 per cent. increase in grant and Staffordshire county council a 5.3 per cent. increase. That is surely a cause for congratulation. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman that the technicalities of local government finance are such that a number of concepts such as floors, ceilings and passports are now common currency. I think that the hon. Gentleman will find that most of his local authority officials are familiar with that language. I hope that he will forgive me for using language which is relatively familiar in local government circles.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): The Conservative Leader of Amber Valley borough council has urged me to lobby Ministers about what he predicted would be a mere 0.66 per cent increase in funding. As I do not have the figures yet, can my hon. Friend reassure me that the increases for Amber Valley and Erewash, of which I also represent part, are far higher than that and that they follow increases for the past four years for Amber Valley of 6.5 per cent., 5.8 per cent., 12.5 per cent. and 3.7 per cent.? That contrasts with the projected cash freeze for two years that the shadow Chancellor proposes.

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. I am happy to give her that assurance. I am pleased to say that the percentage increase for the coming year for the three authorities in which she has an interest are 4.4 per cent. for Amber Valley, 6.9 per cent. for Erewash and 5.8 per cent. for Derbyshire county council. All those authorities will receive good increases that build on the good settlements in previous years.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): May we take it that the legislative programme in the Queen's Speech means that the Government have no plans before the general election to change the method of collecting money in local government and that they continue to plan to go ahead with a revaluation of properties in England? What will the average effect on council tax bills be in Greater London and the south-east of England of that revaluation of property values?

Mr. Raynsford: I note that the hon. Gentleman wants to score points rather than show an interest in what the settlement means for his authority. Before I respond to his question, may I remind him of a point that he has chosen to ignore? Southwark council, with a Liberal Democrat leadership, receives a 7 per cent. increase in grant? I would have thought that he would at least acknowledge that the Government are doing well for his local authority. I am sure that the council tax payers in Southwark will be pleased to know that the Labour Government are supporting the area with a generous settlement.

The hon. Gentleman will know that local government finance is the subject of the Lyons inquiry. As I have made clear, we do not intend to make hasty decisions about complex issues. In the past, ill-thought-out and hasty decisions such as the introduction of the poll tax caused enormous difficulty. We will not make the mistake of rushing the implementation of ill-thought-out proposals such as local income tax, to which the hon. Gentleman's party is wedded and which would cause administrative chaos and have serious consequences for distribution. We will be careful to ensure that there is not the upheaval that would flow from the Liberal Democrats' proposals.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for his statement. I welcome it and thank him for what appears to be a generous settlement for my borough of Sandwell. As the former finance chief of Sandwell under a Conservative Government, I can tell my right hon. Friend that I would have preferred to have to deal with the problem of real-terms growth under a Labour Government than with the real-terms cut that I had to deal with under the Conservative Government. Sandwell has historically been under-funded, so I welcome the removal of the ceilings in the grant.

My right hon. Friend will also be aware that there is an issue with the police grant. While I accept that the announcement of that grant will be made by the Home Office, can he reassure us that the same constructive principles that have underpinned this settlement are being actively considered by the Home Office for the west midlands police? We have had a win in Sandwell; we would like a win for the police and a true win-win situation.

Mr. Raynsford: I am happy to confirm that it is a win-win situation. Sandwell council receives an increase of 6.3 per cent. in its grant, which will enable it to continue to do good work while keeping the council tax down. I congratulate Sandwell on a low increase in council tax last year of just 1.9 per cent. Many other Labour councils secured low increases. I hope that other local authorities of different political persuasions will follow the good example set by Sandwell last year.

The police general grant will increase by about 4.8 per cent. and, with specific grants added on top, the total increase will be 5.1 per cent. So there is good funding for the police and for Sandwell council.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): In recent weeks, Members on both sides of the House have told the Government that had they stuck with the indicative level of grant, council tax increases would have been unacceptable, and I welcome the fact that they have listened to those representations. Can the Minister shed some light on the third of a billion pounds for local government to which the Chancellor referred two hours ago? Can he confirm that that is not new money but simply the lifting of the ring fence from existing grants?

Mr. Raynsford: I can tell the right hon. Gentleman a little more about that and, as a former Minister who has carried these responsibilities, he will understand that, inevitably, there is a complex pattern of increased funding—some £637 million of increased funding has been provided—and measures to ease pressures. The areas in which pressures have been eased include pensions, which I have highlighted; the passporting obligation in relation to schools funding; the issue of waste management; and other similar issues. We have also introduced measures to enable local authorities to recover more of the costs of delivering certain services, such as planning fees, fees for the licensing function and the other points that the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) raised. It is a combination of those three elements that together ensure that the overall burden on local government has been eased by around £1 billion, which entirely meets the concerns expressed by local government that action should be taken to ease the pressures and enable authorities, in return, to make low council tax increases. I sincerely hope that they will keep their part of the bargain.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Earlier today the Chancellor said in his pre-Budget report that inflation was running at 1.25 per cent. Given that a floor of 4 per cent. has been established for unitary authorities such as the City of York, it is clear that the Government are giving substantially more than inflation to local authorities. Will my right hon. Friend confirm the precise amount that the City of York will receive as an increase and state that there can be no possible excuse this year for the council to put an inflation-busting 8.5 per cent. on the council tax? On the expenditure side, does my right hon. Friend accept that there are particular cost pressures in places such as York because of its boom economy, which brings high salaries and high house prices? In the period between now and the review of the formula, those pressures need to be examined very closely by his Department through the area cost adjustment.

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. His local authority will receive a good increase of 5.1 per cent. and I hope that it will budget prudently. He reminds the House of the authority's record last year, when it came close to falling within the capping regime with an increase of 8.5 per cent. I hope that it will do better in the coming year, because it behoves all authorities—especially Liberal Democrat-controlled ones, which have the worst record on high council tax increases—to be much more careful in the future and to budget prudently in the interest of council tax payers, who are not amused by the unreasonably large increases that they have had to meet in the past.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): What is the main reason for the fact that the four predominantly rural districts in Northumberland have increases at or only just above the floor level, as some of them have had for year after year?

Mr. Raynsford: The right hon. Gentleman raises a fair question, but as we have just published the figures today I will need to look further at them to give him a precise explanation. The three rural Northumberland districts that he represents have increases of 2.7, 2.5 and 2.9 per cent., which are all above inflation and are not bad settlements by comparison with those in the past. I will have to look in detail at the explanation, which may be connected to demographic factors, as is often the case. He will also know that Northumberland county council has a good increase of 5.7 per cent. and I am sure that it will be able to operate well with that and set a low council tax increase.

Business of the House

2.54 pm

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 6 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Railways Bill.

TUESDAY 7 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill.

WEDNESDAY 8 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill.

THURSDAY 9 DECEMBER—Estimates [1st Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on "management of information technology projects: making IT deliver for DWP customers", followed by a debate on secondary education: "Diversity of Provision and Secondary Education: School Admissions". Details will be given in the Official Report.

At 6pm the House will be asked to agree all outstanding estimates.

FRIDAY 10 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 13 DECEMBER—Opposition Day [1st Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced, followed by Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

TUESDAY 14 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the Mental Capacity Bill.

WEDNESDAY 15 DECEMBER—A debate on "European Affairs" on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 16 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the School Transport Bill.

FRIDAY 17 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The House may wish to be reminded that we will rise for the Christmas recess at the end of business on Tuesday 21 December and return on Monday 10 January.

I should like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall will be:

THURSDAY 9 DECEMBER—A debate on the report from the Treasury Committee on restoring confidence in long-term savings.

THURSDAY 16 DECEMBER—A debate on the twenty-sixth annual report from the House of Commons Commission.

Following are the details:

The 3rd report of Work and Pensions Committee, Session 2003–04 (HC311) and the Government's response to the 3rd report into Management of Information Technology Projects (2nd special report of Work and Pensions Committee, Session 2003–04) (HC1125)).

The 4th report of Education and Skills Committee, Session 2002–03 (HC94) and Government response to Secondary Education: Diversity of Provision (4th special report of the Education and Skills Committee, Session 2002–03 (HC1096)); and Secondary Education: School Admissions (4th report of Education and Skills Committee, Session 2003–04) (HC58)

[Mr. Peter Hain]

The list of estimates to be agreed are as follows:

Vote on account for House of Commons 2005–06 (HC1236); Vote on account for National Audit Office 2005–06 (HC1237); Vote on account for Electoral Commission 2005–06 (HC1238); Vote on account 2005–06 (HC16); Winter supplementary estimates and new estimates 2004–05 (HC1234)

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Although I thank the Leader of the House for the debate on European affairs, he will know that I have asked for a general foreign affairs debate to allow us to discuss the situation in Africa and the middle east. When may we have such a debate?

We all hope that an agreement will be reached in Northern Ireland. If so, can the Leader of the House assure us that there will be a full oral statement made to the House at the first available opportunity?

Turning to the accountability of Ministers, the Committee on Standards in Public Life recommended that the Opposition should be consulted about those conducting investigations into ministerial conduct. Why have the Government refused to consult the Opposition on that issue? May we have a debate about ministerial accountability and the independence of such inquiries? Do not the Government realise that by ignoring the advice of the Committee that they set up, they are giving those inquiries a bad name?

May we also have a statement about the granting of indefinite leave to remain to people working in this country? Andrew Walmsley, the former director of the nationality unit, with 37 years' experience in the Home Office, is quoted today as saying that he has "never come across ... a case ... where somebody has been granted Indefinite Leave to Remain in the UK on the basis of them working here, but not having worked here for four years."

Given the implication of that for the inquiry into the Home Secretary's conduct, is not it vital that the position is clarified?

Will the Leader of the House widen out the subject of Thursday's estimates day? We all know about the failures of the Passport and Records Agency computer, the Child Support Agency computer, the national insurance computer and last week's disaster with the Department for Work and Pensions computers. Today it is reported that the national fingerprint computer system has suffered a huge crash, crippling many police investigations. Perhaps it is not by chance that the system is known as NAF, but does not it just sum up the incompetence of this Government? We have all these systems, but none of them works. How can the Leader of the House claim that we are safer under Labour—as he often does—if the police cannot even check a suspect's fingerprints?

Finally, how about having a debate on British retailing? It is bad enough that Christmas starts in October in many stores, but has the Leader of the House noticed that the January sales are now starting in the first week in December? Does not that show deep concern among retailers and is not the reason for it that the Chancellor's 66 tax rises are now biting hard into the earnings of ordinary people?

Mr. Hain: The last point comes from a supporter of a party that, in its last period in office, increased taxes repeatedly on all sectors of the population. We have brought taxes down for the lowest income families, with a 10p tax rate that has particularly benefited them, working tax credit and child tax credits, and a series of other measures, including the national minimum wage, to assist hard-working families. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced further measures today, many—if not all—of which would be cut under the extravagant £35 billion cuts programme announced by the shadow Chancellor earlier.

I apologise to Conservative Front Benchers, as I have been making the point that their cuts amount to £20 billion, whereas, according to the shadow Chancellor, they amount to £35 billion, and that does not include the extra spending of £15 billion to which he committed himself as a result of his shadow Cabinet colleagues' badgering, which suggests that there is a £50 billion black hole in Conservative finances.

The shadow Leader of the House requested a general foreign affairs debate on Africa and the middle east. As he will recall, only on Monday the Foreign Secretary made a statement on the middle east, which was well attended. Obviously, I would be as keen as anybody to have a debate on Africa, especially as it will be a priority measure for our presidency of the G8 next year, and we shall have a look to see what opportunity there is for that.

The hon. Gentleman requested an oral statement, should there be a settlement in Northern Ireland. Yes, of course we would want to do that and I shall ensure that arrangements are put in place.

In response to the request of the Committee on Standards in Public Life that the Opposition be consulted, the Government have made it clear that it must first be for the Prime Minister to decide whether an investigation is needed into a Minister whom the Prime Minister appointed. If the hon. Gentleman were ever in government again, he would acknowledge that that is a sensible approach. In addition, it is important to choose an independent person to conduct such an inquiry, and I think that has been done in absolutely the right way. On indefinite leave to remain, the hon. Gentleman will know that the inquiry established under Sir Alan Budd will look at all those matters and at the wider issues that might arise.

On extending—"widening out", as the hon. Gentleman put it—the estimates debate on Thursday, the subjects to be debated are chosen by the Liaison Committee. We cannot pre-empt that, so if the hon. Gentleman wants other subjects to be included, he should talk to the Chairman of the Committee.

On the fingerprints computer, this is the first service delivery problem of its kind that the national automated identification service has experienced in its six-year history. The issue has not affected forces' ability to arrest and charge criminals and our first priority has been to restore forces' access to the national database. There will then be a full lessons learned exercise to identify procedural and technical changes that will prevent that from happening again, but, as I said, this is the first time such a thing has happened in six years, so I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is entitled to make a meal of it.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Over the past hour it has become apparent that Members on both sides of the House are concerned about the police grant and the precept, and the gearing effect on council tax. We have not yet had a statement on that from the Home Office. When shall we have that statement and will the Leader of the House give us an absolute undertaking that there will be an opportunity for a separate vote on that extremely important issue?

In the Queen's Speech last week, the Government said:

"A Bill will be introduced to give effect to the Constitutional Treaty for the European Union, subject to a referendum."

When will the House get an opportunity to debate the Second Reading of that Bill? In the programme that he has just announced, a whole afternoon is devoted to European affairs, so why cannot we have that Second Reading debate then? Is he aware that the Chief Whip has apparently already announced that Second Reading will not be debated before Christmas? I have the greatest respect for the Chief Whip, whose powers of persuasion are famous—or infamous; indeed, last night, she managed to persuade Conservative Front Benchers to go into the Lobby with the Government to defend the Prime Minister and to say that he did not need to be more accountable to Parliament. That requires great powers of persuasion, but surely it is for the Leader of the House to decide and to announce to the House when business is to come before us, not the Chief Whip.

Will the Leader of the House confirm that if the Bill makes no progress in this place before Christmas, and if the Session is interrupted—perhaps next April—there is no way in which the Bill will reach the statute book in this Parliament? Will he give us an absolute undertaking about when he expects the Bill to progress through the two Houses? Does he accept that there is a suspicion that the Government want some other EU member state to kick it into touch before we even get it on to the field in the House and in this country?

Mr. Hain: We have made it clear—the Prime Minister has been crystal clear—that we will stage the referendum before the end of 2006, if we win the next general election. That is the deadline for ratification, and we are committed to it.

On the hon. Gentleman's question about announcements on the progress of the Bill, I announce to the House, as he properly says, what the business of the House is, and once I am ready to tell the House when the European Union Bill will come before us, I shall do so. I would treat with a large dose of salt anything coming out of the women's lobby, which is when that conversation apparently took place. I attended the women's lobby some time ago—delightful company and brilliant journalism, but attempting to get a story out of nothing is really the object of the exercise. I gather that the reporting of that issue came from the women's lobby. As I said, when I am ready to inform the House and the hon. Gentleman about the progress of the European Union Bill, I shall do so. He cannot make assumptions about the timing of the next general election. We want to get the Bill through when we can, and we will do so.

I shall certainly look into the hon. Gentleman's point about the police grant. I know that there is much concern about the police grant, which, as he knows, is always dealt with separately from the local government announcement. We shall look into the precise arrangements for that.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend organise an early debate on the proposed improvements to the baby bond for seven-year-olds that the Chancellor mentioned in his statement today? I should certainly want to make the point that, as at the beginning of this year, more than 1,400 children in my constituency will benefit from the bond. It would also offer Members who do not support the bond and want to scrap the scheme an opportunity to explain whether it would be scrapped only for children at a future date, thus meaning that only a handful of children would benefit from it for only a small number of years, or whether they intend to take back from children's piggybanks the bonds that have already been given—snatching money back from children to pay for the expensive introduction of a unneeded local income tax.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a telling and interesting point. Members who advocate the abolition of the child trust fund, especially those on the Liberal Democrat Benches, will have to answer a very important question for all the youngsters and the parents of children who will already have received the average bond of £250—£500 in the case of low-income families. The money will already be in those children's piggybanks. Will the Liberal Democrats raid them and send in robbers to take the money back, and will they deny youngsters the opportunity, when they reach the age of seven, to receive up to £500 in addition? There will be £1,000 sitting in the piggybanks of children in low-income families. That would be daylight robbery—or perhaps night-time robbery in the case of the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): As I understand it, the statement that we have just heard on local government finance marks the beginning of a consultation process. Given the growing importance and sensitivity attached to local government finance and council tax, will the Leader of the House arrange a debate, ahead of the final debate when we endorse the orders for the local government finance settlement, to enable the House to be consulted about the progress of local government finance settlement consultation? There is a ridiculous situation in Worcestershire, where there is a growing gap between us and our neighbours: the capping of the fire authority, the unreasonable settlement for West Mercia police authority, the unreasonable refusal to give us area cost adjustment and, this week, the announcement that we are to lose another £1 million just because the Government got their figures wrong and are taking the money back. We are beginning to ask what we have done to upset the Deputy Prime Minister or the Minister for Local and Regional Government. Could we be told, please?

Mr. Hain: I find it very difficult to follow the hon. Gentleman's point. The Chancellor has just announced an extra £1 billion of available funding to help local government ensure that council tax rises are low and that local government gets a decent deal.

Today's statement is the beginning of a process of engagement with local authorities on the final outturn of their provision. There will obviously be an opportunity to consult on that, and I shall consider the point that he made in respect of any follow-up.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): The Leader of the House will realise that one of the most widely welcomed measures in the Queen's Speech, by all parties in the House, is the consumer credit Bill. It is nothing to do with credit cards; it is to do with stopping lenders levying extortionate rates of interest on individuals. One of my constituents borrowed £8,000 and has had to repay £120,000. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the good will towards that measure that exists in all parties is not turned sour by the fact that the Bill is timetabled at a point at which it cannot be realised? Will he also acknowledge that he has received a letter today from more than 100 Members of Parliament from all parties, requesting that time be given for an early Second Reading of the Bill? This is a matter of concern to everyone. Will he ensure that it does not turn sour?

Mr. Hain: First, I am indeed aware of the letter that my hon. Friend and his colleagues have sent me, asking for progress on that Bill to be made as early as possible, and I understand the reasons. The Government are fulfilling a manifesto commitment to introduce a Bill to tackle the problem of rogue traders and loan sharks to bring to an end the appalling experience that his constituent and many of our constituents have endured. There is cross-party support for that principle, and I hope that the Bill will have cross-party support and that it will receive Royal Assent as early as possible. I cannot give him the date for Royal Assent, but I will certainly look at the Bill's likely timetabling to see what we can do.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House look at the report of today's Education and Skills questions and arrange for the Secretary of State to make a statement to the House some time next week about his rather stupid comments? When I simply asked him why a primary school child in Derbyshire received less than a primary school child in Nottinghamshire, the Secretary of State said that that was because Nottinghamshire had better representation. Is that not an outrageous attack on the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, putting a new meaning on Cabinet collective responsibility, and on the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and the other six Labour MPs who represent Derbyshire constituencies?

Mr. Hain: I was going to say that, after the next general election, that would involve seven Labour Members of Parliament. I would have thought that the last thing to do was to call my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Skills stupid and to criticise him for making a stupid statement. He has presided over increasing school standards, the recruitment of more teachers and classroom assistants, more modern schools, the refurbishment of schools, the opening of new schools and more IT equipment, including in Derbyshire. He can be proud of that, and the hon. Gentleman should withdraw his outrageous accusation.

Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend arrange an early debate on private companies and their social responsibilities? Is he aware that Western Power Distribution has written to members of the public in my constituency about stopping access to the Llanishen reservoir from 1 January 2005? In a meeting that I had with Western Power Distribution's representatives, they said that that is for pipe maintenance, but they also said that they will give no commitment to reopen Llanishen reservoir to the public. The area has been used for decades by the public for walking and enjoying the natural surroundings. The public in Llanishen are absolutely furious about Western Power Distribution's decision. Does he not agree that its decision is outrageous? Will he arrange for us to have a debate in which such subjects can be aired?

Mr. Hain: I am indeed aware of the value to local residents of Llanishen reservoir. They have had rights of access for a very long time, and I would want them to continue. I undertake to write to Western Power Distribution and take that point up, wearing my other hat as Secretary of State for Wales. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that Western Power Distribution has served Wales extremely well and does a very good job on behalf of Wales. Perhaps it can look again at that issue, given the points that she has made.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Given the result in the English High Court this morning, may we have a debate entitled "Fake documents and who might be forging them", so that we can consider not just the documents that cost The Daily Telegraph so dear this morning but documents such as the forgery of the uranium imports from Niger, which cost us all dear in the sense that they informed the Government's disastrous policy in Iraq? Given that I seem to remember that, in his old campaigning days, the Leader of the House once emerged from a court vindicated, can he find it in his heart to congratulate the hon. Member for Glasgow, Kelvin (Mr. Galloway) on his victory today?

Mr. Hain: The court verdict is obviously a great boost for the hon. Member for Glasgow, Kelvin (Mr. Galloway).

The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) took a different view on the war in Iraq. He did not think that we should intervene at all and that Saddam Hussein should stay in power. Saddam would be in power today if the hon. Gentleman's policy and that of the Liberal Democrats had been followed. It was a perfectly honourable policy, but its consequences would have been that the world's most brutal tyrant would be continuing to exercise his tyranny even today. Of course, he is now in jail, and the people of Iraq are a great deal better as a result.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): The Leader of the House will well know that there are only some 37 or 38 legislating days between now and the Easter recess. Given the complete control that the Government now have over Commons business, will he give us his assessment of how many Bills in the Queen's Speech and outside it will complete all their Commons stages between now and Easter and of how many Bills will receive Royal Assent before Easter?

Mr. Hain: We may or may not exercise complete control over the House of Commons, as the right hon. Gentleman charitably puts it, but we certainly do not exercise complete control over the House of Lords.

Mr. Forth: Thank goodness.

Mr. Hain: "Thank goodness", he says, but Labour has less than 30 per cent. of the votes in the House of Lords. It is a Conservative—with a big C and a small c—dominated second Chamber, and any speedy progress that we may make on excellent measures such as the Identity Cards Bill, the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill, the drugs Bill, or, indeed, the consumer credit Bill, the charities Bill and so on could be wrecked by obstructionism in the House of Lords.

Mr. Forth: Good.

Mr. Hain: "Good", he says, so the right hon. Gentleman thinks that the charities Bill, the Disabilities Discrimination Bill and the consumer credit Bill should all be obstructed in the House of Lords, does he? Well, now we know where he stands. Perhaps those on the Conservative Front Bench could either denounce him or agree with him, and then we would know where they stand, too.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): In his statement, unless I misheard, the Chancellor made a welcome announcement that about £2 billion had been saved, including in the health service drugs treatment budget. May we have a statement from the Secretary of State for Health on whether the money will be retained in the health budget to buy the new drugs that people are crying out for in the treatment of Alzheimer's, multiple sclerosis and other diseases, or on whether the money has been subsumed into some other budget?

Mr. Hain: I understand that the results of negotiations with the drug companies and others have released extra funding for front-line services. I am sure that the Secretary of State for Health will note the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, and, to the extent that I understood the point, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree with what my right hon. Friend has done.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May I put in a word of support for the important campaign that the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) is waging to try to limit the activities of loan sharks?

May we have a statement from the Minister for the Cabinet Office about reports of accelerated destruction of departmental files in many Departments in the run-up of the coming into force of the Freedom of Information Act 2000 on 1 January? That appears to be an extremely worrying development, but I am happy on this occasion to exonerate entirely the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster because, as he is spending so much of his time on non-departmental work on Labour's election campaign, I cannot imagine that he has developed any file worthy of being shredded.

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman's constituents will applaud him for being a one-question man. Whatever he asks, he manages to get in a spurious point about the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

I am glad that the hon. Gentleman supports the Government's policies on loan sharks. May I therefore assume that he will encourage his Whip to ensure that the consumer credit Bill is given a free run through the House of Commons and the House of Lords—[Interruption.] It is, of course, the right of the House of Commons to scrutinise it.

The hon. Gentleman is an expert conspiracy theorist. He is eloquent and diligent in his chasing of those theories, but this one takes the biscuit. Of course, a Labour Government introduced the Freedom of Information Act, and there are consequences as a result of that, including his ability to ask spurious questions.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Bradshaw.]

3.20 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): It gives me great pleasure to open our traditional annual fisheries debate. I am grateful both to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to the business managers for enabling us to adhere to the recent convention that the debate is held before the important December Fisheries Council. It allows hon. Members to make specific points that are of particular interest to their constituents and enables me to take those on board before entering the negotiating chambers in Brussels. That is an opportunity for which hon. Members and I are extremely grateful.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): The Minister will be aware that the Commission's proposals are not due to be published until 8 December. Will he give an undertaking to those of us who represent fishing communities that, either formally or informally, there will be opportunities after the publication of the proposals and before the Council meeting for him to hear the concerns of our constituents?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am always prepared to take representations from hon. Members, especially at this time of year, in the run-up to the December Fisheries Council.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): Great benefits are had by all if there is prior consultation and if advice is taken from the various fishermen's organisations. That has not happened in Northern Ireland. Is it a matter of policy not to consult the Northern Ireland fishermen's organisations at this stage, or has that been remedied? I understand that they were refused an audience.

Mr. Bradshaw: That is not my understanding. The Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, South (Mr. Pearson) leads on fisheries issues for Northern Ireland, and he has been assiduous in keeping in touch with industry representatives in Northern Ireland. He was with me at the last November Council, and I believe that he met industry representatives from Northern Ireland at that time. We will continue to keep in close contact between now and the Council itself.

Landings by the fishing industry are worth about £520 million to the UK economy. Landings at most ports are steady or up. The pelagic sector, which relies mainly on herring and mackerel, is doing very well, as is the shellfish sector. The importance of nephrops—or prawns, as most people know them—continues to increase as a proportion of the UK's total catch. Haddock stocks are higher than they have been for 30 years. However, some other species are still in decline or their stocks remain at dangerously low levels—most notably, cod.

The fish processing industry continues to go from strength to strength. In all, it is worth about £1.5 billion to the UK economy. I am pleased to report—not least because of the benefits to our nation's health—that fish consumption in the UK continues to grow by about 1.3 per cent. a year.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): The Minister mentions that certain stocks are in a healthy condition. Is it not remarkable that one of the failings of the common fisheries policy is that it cannot take account of that properly? Certainly, prawn quotas are far too low given what we know about the robust nature of the stocks. He says that haddock stocks are at a 30-year high, but according to the Norwegian talks, the quotas are to decline in the coming year.

On monkfish, the Commission has acknowledged for the first time that the previous scientific assessment was at best tenuous. There is huge evidence of plentiful supplies, yet the monkfish fishery is closed, so that high-value species, at the most valuable time of the year, is not accessible to hard-pressed fishermen. What will the Minister do to avoid a repeat of the situation in which fisheries with plentiful stocks—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman wants to catch my eye a little later. I am sure he will want to save some remarks for then.

Mr. Bradshaw: Perhaps it will help if I inform hon. Members that a good chunk at the end of my speech is devoted to the details of the various stock levels and the recommendations in the run-up to the Council. Hon. Members may prefer to leave their interventions until then, when I shall address the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman.

This year has also reminded us of the dangers faced by those involved in the harvesting of the sea's natural resources. Nine have died during the course of the year in incidents involving seven fishing vessels, and 21 Chinese cockle pickers were drowned in Morecambe Bay in February. Most recently, two brothers, Rob Temple and Brian Allinson, from North Shields, have been lost, and only a few days before that, a Northern Ireland fisherman, Colin Donnelly, died off the Isle of Man. I am sure that the sympathy of the whole House goes out to the families and friends of those who have died working the seas.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend join me in thanking the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen for its work in the circumstances that he has mentioned?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am pleased to endorse my hon. Friend's comments. It gave me great pleasure during the past year to attend the RNMDSF annual reception, at which it gave out awards. The organisation plays an important role in many parts of the country, including in many constituencies represented by Members who are in the Chamber.

The past year has also seen an unprecedented level of interest and activity in fisheries policy. We have had a major report from the Prime Minister's strategy unit called "Net Benefits". It was the first time a Government had commissioned such an in-depth study of the state and future of the fishing industry. It has sparked immense interest both here and abroad, and is likely to help inform policy decisions for many years to come.

We have also seen an important report by the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and await the publication next week of a major report by the Royal Commission on Environmental Pollution. The Government intend to respond to the strategy unit report next spring. The reports are all slightly different, but what they share is a belief that the sustainable exploitation of our marine resources is a major challenge, and one that must be taken up at global level. They also agree that there can be a long-term profitable future for our commercial fishing industry only if catch levels are brought into line with the state of fish stocks, and kept there. They have something else in common as well. They all oppose the only policy that the Conservative party has on fisheries, which is to try to withdraw unilaterally from the common fisheries policy.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): On subject of the reports, there is considerable concern in the industry in Northern Ireland about the resources of the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development. Although it has committed itself to carry out a review of cod recovery in the Irish sea, the industry in Kilkeel believes that it does not have the resources to do that. Is the national Department prepared to go into discussions with DARD to find out whether a more fundamental review of cod stocks in the Irish sea is needed?

Mr. Bradshaw: I will certainly undertake to look into the hon. Gentleman's point. From the interaction that I have had with the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland and his officials, I have not gained the impression that they do not represent Northern Irish interests strongly. However, I shall certainly consider the point about capacity that the hon. Gentleman raised and ensure that we are engaged in this important work. It is important that the Administrations throughout the United Kingdom engage on the process, and that we move forward together on fisheries policy.

It is against the background that I have described, as well as wider concerns about our marine environment that the Prime Minister announced earlier this autumn his support for a new marine Bill.

One more important review that reported during the last year would help to inform future policy—the Bradley review of marine fisheries and environmental enforcement. It is important that all those reports and reviews have come together, because they provide policy makers with a once-in-a-generation chance to get the way we run our fisheries right. I wish to take this opportunity to thank all those who have played a role in producing all this important material. The challenge that we, the fishing industry and other stakeholders now face is to turn it all into policy.

I should mention one or two other important developments this year before I turn to the details and our priorities for the December Council. Last month, I attended, in Edinburgh, the launch of the first of the regional advisory councils set up under the important reforms of the common fisheries policy agreed two years ago. The North sea RAC involves all those with an interest in the North sea, and it is already at work drafting recommendations on the management of the North sea area.

In the European Union, the UK has been at the forefront of pushing for a decentralisation of the common fisheries policy and for a greater say at local and regional level for fishermen and other interested groups. We intend to make progress on the remaining RACs a priority for the UK presidency of the EU in the second half of next year. If the RACs prove themselves by coming up with realistic and responsible solutions to the management challenges that we face, I see no reason why they should not develop into real bodies for regional management.

In the south-west of England, where I hail from, we are already seeing the benefits of the fishermen, processors, retailers, restaurateurs, anglers, environmentalists and scientists all working together to manage our fisheries in a sustainable way. Invest in Fish South West, launched by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in April with funding from my Department, is leading to an unprecedented level of co-operation among groups that in the past—let us be frank—have not always seen eye to eye. The commercial fishermen, recreational sea anglers and environmentalists who, in the past, have had competing or conflicting agendas have come together in the realisation that we all have a shared interest in managing our marine resources in a responsible and sustainable way. The benefits of this co-operation go far wider than the fishing industry alone. Tourism and our regional food renaissance are already benefiting from the work of Invest in Fish South West. I hope that it can become a model for the rest of the UK.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): I know that the Minister is doing his very best, and many of us realise that he is not quite King Canute—we know what happened to him; was he not washed away?

The problem in the south-west is that more fish are thrown back dead than are landed in the ports. The Minister must agree that that is immoral and obscene. Does he agree that the best way of dealing with that problem is to renegotiate the common fisheries policy, which he has failed to do? If that is the case, what is the alternative to our policy of withdrawing from the common fisheries policy, unless we are to go on throwing more dead fish overboard than we actually land?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was agreeing with his party's policy of withdrawing from the common fisheries policy or advocating renegotiation. Of course, renegotiation goes on all the time. The reforms that we achieved two years ago were a renegotiation of the common fisheries policy. Indeed, the policy addresses the very problem of discards that he has just outlined. It is not right to suggest that more fish are thrown overboard in the south-west than are landed. However, the hon. Gentleman is right to say that discards are a problem. There is not a fisheries system in the world that has managed to avoid the problem of discards completely. It is a serious problem, particularly in the mixed fisheries, and we are actively addressing it.

Mr. Salmond: A few seconds ago, the Minister said that he saw no reason why regional advisory councils could not adopt management responsibilities. Why then does the proposed European constitution maintain exclusive competence over the conservation of marine biological resources? The maintenance of that competence was described last week by the European Parliament's own Committee on Fisheries as unjustified. Does the Minister not see a contradiction between his statement and the European constitution?

Mr. Bradshaw: No, I do not. Because of the many conversations and exchanges of letters that we have had on this subject, the hon. Gentleman knows that we will have to agree to disagree on it. There is no change in the European constitution on the competence on marine resources, as he knows very well.

The Government's concern to manage our marine environment sustainably can be illustrated by a number of other actions we have taken this year. We secured permanent protection for the cold water coral reefs off the north-west coast of Scotland known as the Darwin mounds. This followed the emergency protection that we secured in the previous year, which was the first time the EU used powers under the reformed common fisheries policy to give special protection to a valuable marine environment.

The UK also led the way in persuading the EU to adopt, for the first time, measures to address the problem of cetacean by-catch—the catching and drowning of dolphins and porpoises in nets. These measures did not go as far as would have liked and the UK will continue to push for more action more quickly, but they are an important start.

Mr. Steen: It is a real treat to be allowed to ask two questions, and I am most grateful to the Minister. As he knows, along the length of the south Devon coastline dolphins are washed up dead on the beaches. One was washed up in my constituency only this week. Although he has taken a lead in trying to limit bass fishing, the French in particular are notorious for carrying it out along our coastline. Has the Minister not banned the French from breaching the 12-mile limit, so are they breaking the law? As for Europe, he has failed—although I accept that he has tried—to do something more. When is his next battle, and will he lose it?

Mr. Bradshaw: The hon. Gentleman makes the argument about the common fisheries policy for me. If we did not belong to the CFP we would have no influence whatever over what the French did in their own waters or halfway across the channel, where most of the bass pair trawl fishery takes place.

The first experimental marine closed area in Britain, around Lundy island off the north coast of Devon, has been a resounding success. The number and size of crab and lobster both inside and, more importantly, outside the closed area has grown significantly. My view has always been that closed areas, if supported by the scientific evidence, are likely to play an important part in our future management of marine resources. That is another subject that the UK intends to prioritise during our presidency of the EU next year, and my officials are already exploring the benefits of a network of such areas as part of the follow-up to the strategy unit report.

This annual debate has traditionally concentrated on the commercial marine fishing sector in advance of the all-important December Council. However, as its title is "Fisheries", it would be remiss of me not to acknowledge the important and growing role played by recreational angling, both at sea and in our lakes and rivers. Britain's most popular recreational pastime goes from strength to strength. The importance of angling, and sea angling in particular, has not always been recognised in the past, and I want to give anglers a greater say in how we manage our fisheries.

The UK has remained at the forefront of international efforts to protect the whale. At this year's international whaling conference, we helped to resist attempts by Japan and others to lift the moratorium on commercial whaling. We will continue to work with like-minded countries and world opinion to stop the small handful of whaling nations and their allies trying to weaken the protection that those magnificent mammals enjoy.

Turning to our priorities for the annual Council of Ministers meeting just before Christmas, as always, the UK's priority is to maximise opportunities for our fishermen while ensuring that fish stocks are not over-exploited. The latest scientific advice should mean that the Council can agree an increased total allowable catch for some stocks, including western monkfish and megrim, as well as west of Scotland nephrops. However, tough decisions are likely on stocks that are not doing so well, including plaice and sole in the south-west, cod in the North sea, the west of Scotland and the Irish sea, and sand eels.

This year, my officials and I have gone to extra lengths to include industry representatives in discussions in the run-up to the Council. We will continue to keep in close touch with them until and during the meeting. That unprecedented co-operation helped to achieve a satisfactory outcome to the potentially difficult EU-Norway negotiations last week. It is unlikely that the industry will get everything that it would like out of the December Council, but I believe that the way in which we have worked together over the past year will make it easier for the UK to make a more robust and coherent case.

Finally, during last month's Council meeting, I, along with my Scottish colleague, Ross Finnie, had the opportunity to meet the new Fisheries Commissioner, Joe Borg, on his first day in his new office. We had a wide-ranging and friendly conversation in which Mr. Finnie and I outlined to Mr. Borg and his officials our main concerns and priorities. I am pleased to tell the House that Mr. Borg accepted our invitation to visit the UK early in the new year.

3.39 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): I begin by paying tribute to fishermen who lost their lives or were injured last year. My figures show that 27 vessels were reported lost and 11 men died. In his statement, the Minister mentioned several more recent deaths. I extend our deepest sympathies to the families and friends of those brave men who put their lives at risk in order to supply us with a healthy and popular food. We owe them more than we are offering them today—a mere three-hour Adjournment debate jammed in at the end of the week, after two lengthy and important statements.

The annual fishing debate used to take a full day, and it was intended to give the Minister a mandate before he set off for Brussels and the annual Fisheries Council. We are in no position to do that today. The only document available is a transcript of oral evidence taken by a Sub-Committee of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, chaired in his inimitable, colourful manner by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). We have not seen the Commission proposals and we have no basis for a serious discussion. All we can do is wish the Minister the best of luck on 21 and 22 December.

The Minister will be presented with a huge amount of material, much of it inaccurate and most of it out of date, and decisions of great complexity will be taken at very short notice. I urge him to keep the representatives of the industry in the loop. At last year's Council they were left alone and ignored in their hotels, and a settlement for the North sea was agreed without their advice. The details turned out to be totally impractical. I am not suggesting that they have a veto, as the Minister said in questions two weeks ago, just that they be consulted on the practical consequences of any proposals that he may be about to agree to. Those men represent an industry that has been forced to accept huge reductions in capacity and opportunity in recent years, and with enlargement it looks as though the opportunities may be further reduced.

Since last year's debate I have visited numerous fishing communities around our coast—Aberdeen, Peterhead, Fraserburgh, Shetlands, Whalsay, Ullapool, Stornoway, Plymouth, Brixham, Hastings, Folkestone, Scarborough, Whitby, and, most poignantly, Fleetwood, twice. Fleetwood has seen the number of vessels fall from 64 to 25. I met the manager of an engineering company who only 20 years ago employed 120 people. He now employs one fitter.

I was told on my first visit about the high level of discards in the Irish sea and I simply did not believe it, so I returned two weeks later to see for myself. I spent the night of the 14–15 October on the trawler Kiroan. In order to fish 22 days per month, 80 mm mesh must be used for plaice. If 110 mm mesh is used, Phil Dell, the skipper, told me, his days at sea are reduced by five and his business is no longer viable. We set off and I instructed him to set one trawl of his twin rig with 80 mm mesh and the other with 110 mm mesh.

Mr. Carmichael: You instructed him?

Mr. Paterson: I instructed him because what he was doing was against the regulations. We took out the first haul at about 5.30 am. The 80 mm mesh was extremely full. It showed thousands and thousands of tiny juvenile plaice peeping through the mesh. Probably 90 per cent. had to be discarded. In contrast, the 110 mm mesh was about two thirds full and contained 80 per cent. saleable adult fish. This was in the night, when the tides were adverse, and there was still that catch and by-catch. We repeated the exercise, and at 9.15 am the result was even worse.

It is hard to understand how sane human beings can insist that such a system is enforced when it clearly causes so much damage. The appalling scandal of discards is a direct result of the system whereby the common fisheries policy imposes its quota system. The CFP is a biological, environmental, economic and social disaster. It is our clearly stated policy to leave the CFP and establish national and local control.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): That is indeed what the hon. Gentleman told the fishermen of Hastings. What he did not tell them is how he would do that. Would he negotiate with anyone to leave the CFP, and if so, with whom—I know of no one—or would he just break the treaty?

Mr. Paterson: That is a helpful intervention, as it leads on to a letter that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), the hon. Gentleman's near neighbour, wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale). My right hon. and learned Friend wrote on 9 June:

> "We are determined that the next Conservative government will establish national and local control over fishing. We intend to raise this in the Council of Ministers at the first opportunity and I believe we can achieve this by negotiation. However, should negotiation not succeed, it remains the case, as I said in Plymouth, that the British Parliament is supreme and we would introduce the necessary legislation to bring about full national and local control."

Mr. Blizzard: What would the hon. Gentleman do to solve the problem of discards? Even if we withdrew from the CFP, what would his solution be to that problem?

Mr. Steen: Days at sea.

Mr. Paterson: If the hon. Gentleman will give me a little more time, I shall come to that issue. The answer, as my hon. Friend just said, is days at sea. The Minister is wrong to say that no fishery has found a solution to the problem. The Faroes have found a solution, as has New England. If one goes for days at sea, one sees that much of the discard problem has been eliminated.

Mr. Bradshaw: On the Conservative policy of withdrawal from the CFP, the hon. Gentleman has explained that, if a future Conservative Government acting alone failed to persuade every single other member of the European Union to allow them to leave the CFP but stay in the EU, his party would introduce a Bill in Parliament. What would the Bill say, and how would the Conservatives achieve a treaty breach—as he knows, such a breach has never happened before—and still expect the UK to stay in the EU?

Mr. Paterson: The Minister and I had an interesting debate on this issue in the regional press. It is very simple: membership of the CFP is not a criterion for membership of the European Union. On a global issue, with the fall in the dollar, the status of the euro is fundamental, and yet two of the largest contributors to the euro, France and Germany, have unilaterally broken their obligations in respect of it. He mentioned the new commissioner, Mr. Borg, who comes from Malta. The CFP does not apply to the Mediterranean countries in the same way as to the UK. There are also the land-locked countries, including famous buccaneering, swashbuckling countries such as Slovakia, Hungary, Luxembourg and Austria, which are also active of members the European Union but not of the CFP.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): I thank the hon. Gentleman for the courtesy of advising me that he was going to visit Scarborough and Whitby. I hope that he enjoyed his fish and chips in the restaurant of the vice-chairman of the Tory party in Scarborough. Has he embarked on any discussions with the land-locked or Mediterranean nations that he has just listed about applying the Conservative party's policy should it win the next general election?

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's comments about my visit to his constituency. It was a good visit and I thoroughly enjoyed it. We have a very fine candidate in Mr. Robert Goodwill, as the hon. Gentleman will find out when the election comes, and the fish and chips were indeed excellent.

The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is no; I have concentrated my efforts on going to fishing countries, as I am about to explain. I have been to places such as the Faroes, Iceland, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New England, where successful fisheries are run because there is national and local control.

David Burnside: On national interest, is the hon. Gentleman aware that there is a system called the Hague preference whereby Northern Ireland fishermen have their quotas transferred to our neighbours in the Irish Republic, which has a Government who are financing modernisation of their fishing fleet and an increase in its size, while we in the United Kingdom are decommissioning our fleet?

Mr. Paterson: That is a very good point. Subsidies are one of the most damnable and dangerous elements in fishing, because they break the commercial rules. The nightmare that arose in Newfoundland was caused mainly by subsidised activity, first in the Soviet Union and then in Canada itself. I entirely endorse the hon. Gentleman's comments: subsidised fishing capacity is very damaging, and we would like to see it dramatically reduced. We would not tolerate any subsidised activity if we had national and local control.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): With regard to the Conservatives' proposal to negotiate withdrawal from the CFP—I am sure that all of us, including the hon. Gentleman, agree that it is extremely unlikely and probably impossible that they could negotiate a way out—and their fallback position of committing a breach of the treaty, what estimate has he made of the cost to the UK taxpayer? Without doubt, the consequences of such a withdrawal would be significant. Fines would be imposed by the European Court of Justice, and there would be litigation from other member states and possibly boycotts and other tariffs. What estimate has he made of the cost to the UK taxpayer of his pursuing that policy?

Mr. Paterson: I refute the hon. Gentleman's premise—this is not a nil sum game. If he examines the history of the Falklands, general mayhem occurred before 1986. There was a lot of fishing activity, stocks were not controlled and the Spanish were among the worst culprits. The Spanish were brought under control once national control was established in the Falklands. They are now the most constructive participant in the fisheries: they are the largest investors and Vigo bay is the largest market for Falklands squid.

Our partners will not see our action as totally negative, because they are currently being offered a bleak future. As the Minister has explained, stocks are declining, and our partners will be offered a share in a declining resource. If they work with us, however, and we copy successful methods, which I have seen with my own eyes in the Faroes, Iceland, Nova Scotia and New England, the resource will expand and they can participate.

Mr. Bradshaw: A moment or two ago, the hon. Gentleman said that some existing members of the European Union are not members of the CFP and that the CFP does not apply to some EU members. Will he clarify those comments?

Mr. Paterson: Yes; the full rules of the CFP do not apply to the Mediterranean states and the land-locked states. The Minister keeps trying to make the point that it is essential to be part of the CFP to be part of the European Union, but that is not the case. The EU is in a constant state of flux and the issue is a matter of political will. Our party has a firm, clearly stated view that the CFP cannot be reformed. The CFP has done grotesque damage to our marine communities and marine environment. We want to establish national and local control to 200 miles or the median line. I cannot put it more clearly than that.

Mr. Bradshaw: I am grateful for the helpful clarification that the CFP applies to all member states. Management regimes within the CFP can vary according to regional conditions. For example, different regimes apply in the North sea, the Baltic and the Mediterranean.

Mr. Paterson: I am glad that the Minister is pleased with my explanation.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that the European constitution entrenches and centralises the CFP, making it even worse than it is now? When we reject the European constitution, as we certainly will, it will be the perfect opportunity to withdraw from the CFP. Renegotiation would put us in charge, because any replacement constitution can be agreed only with our agreement and in spite of our veto. Withdrawal from the CFP, and indeed any other powers with which we disagree, will follow naturally from the people's rejection of the European constitution.

Mr. Paterson: My right hon. Friend has made a good point. I pay tribute to his attempt to bring fisheries into the negotiation in the Convention last year. The Government missed a great opportunity to raise fishing at that time. He is, of course, right that this country will vote no to the constitution, because it wants to remain an independent sovereign nation. At that point, we will be in a strong bargaining position to debate our fishermen and our marine resource.

Mr. Steen: I pay tribute to the masterly way in which my hon. Friend has captured his brief, although his constituency is land-locked. If the CFP did not result in more dead fish being thrown overboard than are landed—the Minister doubts the figures, but he has not got a clue because he does not know how many fish are thrown overboard—the Conservative party would not be so adamant about withdrawing from the CFP. The fact that successive Labour Ministers have failed to adjust the CFP is the reason why the only way forward that we can see is withdrawal.

Mr. Paterson: That is essentially it—the CFP is not amendable. Discards will not be eliminated and biomass will not grow until the whole system is changed.

Mr. Salmond: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that national control provides a more focused fisheries policy because it confers ownership. However, a few moments ago he congratulated Professor Neil McCormick, who, in the Convention that negotiated the constitution, was the first and most doggedly persistent person to point out the dangers of exclusive competencies. Did I hear the hon. Gentleman right when he said that he is against the Hague preferences? Those are extremely helpful to Scottish fishermen, and I would not like the Conservative party to revert to its policy of regarding Scottish fishermen as—I quote—"expendable", as it did when it took us into the common fisheries policy.

Mr. Paterson: I repeat my tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), who mounted a brave campaign in the Convention on the issue. I have no idea what Scottish National party did; all I know is that it is tagging along behind us. This has been our policy under the past three leaders.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: For the illumination of the House, I can confirm that Professor McCormick tabled an amendment to take the common fisheries policy out of the constitution as an exclusive competence of the Union, but I tabled further amendments to remove it altogether and to repatriate these vital powers back to member states. Sadly, I was not supported by the Scottish National party, as I should have been.

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful for that clarification.

Lawrie Quinn: I want to bring the hon. Gentleman back to the issue of withdrawal from the common fisheries policy—

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): Boring.

Lawrie Quinn: It is not boring—it is very important to my constituents, and to those of my hon. Friend.

I repeat the question that the hon. Gentleman was politely asked by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George): what will be the cost to the nation of withdrawal? If he cannot tell us now, when will the Conservatives be able to advise my constituents, and the nation, of that cost?

Mr. Paterson: I do not go along with the contention that it will be an immensely acrimonious negotiation.

Lawrie Quinn: What will be the cost?

Mr. Paterson: I have not worked out the cost. I think that there will be gains for those countries that participate in our waters. As I said, at present they are being offered a declining proportion of a declining resource. I know that we can grow our biomass, grow the resource and grow our catches again if we follow modern, intelligent techniques, as employed in the Faroes, Iceland, and Norway, where I was on Monday and Tuesday this week. They have successful fisheries because they have national and local control. We would welcome foreign participation on the basis of historic rights; there will therefore be a gain for those fisheries. I refer again to the Falklands, where the Spanish are major players—they are the largest investors and have the largest market in Vigo bay for Falklands squid. It has worked extremely well for them, but only since they established national control in 1986.

I am aware that we have only three hours, and I must push on. The optimism in those other fisheries is striking compared with the gloom that I encounter here. That is because the decisions of the CFP are basically political. In Reykjavik, I met the head of one of the largest banks in the world investing in worldwide fishing businesses. He has made it company policy not to invest in any European Union or Russian fishing business because of the interference and political risk of the arbitrary decisions made under those regimes. .

The failure of the CFP is also confirmed by an interesting report that was published in August by the RIVO-Netherlands Institute for Fisheries Research. It says:

> "With the possible exception of pelagic stocks targeted by specific fisheries with relatively small by-catches of other species, the CFP toolbox of catch quota, capacity control and technical measures has not been effective in meeting the long-term strategic objectives of sustainable fisheries in EU waters without challenging the quality of the marine environment. The main problem relates to mixed fisheries that can continue fishing until the quota for the last species exploited has been exhausted as long as catches of others are discarded. Therefore, quota regulations effectively don't limit exploitation rates of demersal species and other regulatory measures seem required. However, the CFP reform process showed that the political will to change the management system is severely limited."

Mr. Steen: Is my hon. Friend aware that, in the towns of Brixham, Dartmouth and Salcombe, the seagull population has increased sixfold, causing havoc to the people who live there and all their equipment, which is covered in seagull mess? Their dustbins are also raided. Does he know that that has been caused solely by the number of fish thrown overboard dead under the common fisheries policy? The enormous resultant growth of the seagull population causes mayhem for my constituents.

Mr. Paterson: That is a good point. I actually picked that up when I went to Brixham. The lesson from Brixham is the extraordinarily complex nature of the fishery. We must have seen 20 to 25 species in the fish market in the morning. That is why the quota system is unsuited to exploiting that resource. We should learn from other, more successful fisheries.

We should set a broad national framework on the basis that we believe that the seas around Britain belong to the people of Britain and need to be managed in the interests of all the people. Aristotle said that that which nobody owns, nobody cares for. We would like national Government to set a broad framework, as the Magnuson-Stevens Fishery Conservation and Management Act does in the United States of America. However, detailed management should be devolved to local councils. Rather than abolishing existing fishery committees, as the Government threaten to do, we would like them to be built on, expanded and extended.

The Minister rightly paid tribute to the recreational sector. There are 1.5 million recreational anglers, with a turnover of £1 billion per annum. They should have the right to be consulted and have a real input in determining fishing management plans where there is significant recreational activity.

The regional advisory councils, which the Minister mentioned and the Commission proposed, will be only advisory. He confirmed that to me in parliamentary answers. We would prefer genuine local control, establishing local management plans with teeth.

We would scrap the rigid quota system and learn from the Faroes and New England, where days at sea limitation of effort has led to a striking increase in fish catches and biomass. In contrast to Britain, fishermen there trust and work closely with scientists, leading to better assessment of stocks. As my hon. Friend the Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen) said, the CFP does not take account of what is really happening. We have no idea of the amount of discards. By scrapping quotas, the incentive to discard and land black fish is eliminated.

In Norway and Iceland, discards are banned. We would go further and make landing of all commercial species mandatory, as happens in the Faroes. The CFP cannot succeed, because discards and black fish mean that there are no accurate data. Much of the existing data are out of date. Accurate data must be the basis for more rational management decisions. We would follow the lead of the Faroes, Iceland, the USA and Norway and establish substantial permanent and temporary closed areas. The closed areas of New England alone are as large as the state of Massachusetts.

We would insist on the use of selective gear. It is criminal that we allow haddock stocks that are at a 30-year high to go to waste in the North sea to protect cod. The centre for conservation sciences at Manomet in Massachusetts has achieved 81 per cent. separation of cod from haddock, and 90 per cent. separation of cod and haddock from flat fish. By raising the foot rope in the whiting fishery, it has achieved 100 per cent. separation of cod from flat fish. Only yesterday, I spoke to a senior executive at Marks and Spencer, which has a line of haddock. In trials, a cod by-catch of only 5 per cent. has been achieved by using intelligent, scientific gear.

The Minister was recently humiliated by the Commission's refusal to listen to him about the slaughter of dolphins through pair trawling in the south-west. He was right to try to raise the matter but he was sent packing because we do not have national and local control. If we had such control, we would ban pair trawling out to 200 miles and we would work with Manomet and other excellent institutions such as the brilliant Sea Fish flume tank in Hull, where I spent a happy day on a trawling course, and devise a solution for separating dolphins from bass.

To monitor days at sea, we would make vessel monitoring systems—VMS—tracking mandatory on all vessels. As in the Falklands and Iceland, we would expect instant radio reporting of untoward events such as unexpected numbers of juveniles or by-catch. In Iceland, a fishery can be closed in a couple of hours by radio broadcasts if a vessel has rung in to announce an excess number of juveniles. Let us compare that kind of reaction with the way in which the common fisheries policy is run: we have one meeting a year, whereas the Falklands and Iceland are running their fisheries in real time, on real information.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Obviously, when the Select Committee considered the matter, we had quite a debate about putting people on ships to inspect what was being caught. Would he go as far, particularly in relation to foreign vessels, after the agreement that he would have to negotiate, as to say that there should be people put on ships, at least on a random basis, to see exactly what they are catching?

Mr. Paterson: Absolutely. The problem with putting observers on ships is that it is expensive, but it has worked extremely well. In Bergen, Norway, I was told on Tuesday that in the Barents sea, one observer will be on one boat, among, say, eight or nine Russian boats in the joint zone. He will keep a close track of what is happening on the one boat that he is on, and then make a comparison with the landings recorded by the other Russian ships. Earlier in the week, talking to John Barton, who runs the fishery in Stanley in the Falklands, I found out that it has a similar system with the hake fishery. It will have one observer on one of the Korean boats, who will watch closely what the surrounding ones are doing. The hon. Gentleman's suggestion is therefore good, but the problem is that it is expensive.

One last case that shows the ludicrous state to which regulations have brought some people is that of Paul Joy in Hastings, whom I met three weeks ago. He runs a small vessel under 10 m. Neither he nor his vessel have a quota for cod. He takes his cod as part of the inshore fleet allocation. Although that was not fully taken up last year, DEFRA is prosecuting him for going over quota—which he does not have—on the basis of an arbitrary decision to break the quota down into monthly allocations. The whole case is utterly absurd and an outrageous waste of public money. We would make fishing regulations subject to civil, not criminal law, and would therefore decriminalise fishing. It is wrong that those who risk their lives at sea should also risk being turned into criminals by petty regulations.

I shall describe those ideas in greater detail soon when we publish our Green Paper, which will set out our proposals for running a successful fishery under national control. I look forward to receiving comments from all parties.

David Burnside: On the hon. Gentleman's point about a Green Paper in which a national policy for fisheries will be outlined, will the Conservative party, should it become the national Government on 5 May next year, try to make the reform of fisheries policy coincide with the anniversary of our greatest ever naval victory, the battle of Trafalgar, on 21 October?

Mr. Paterson: That is a splendid idea. We said that we would raise the issue at the first Council, but whichever is earlier, perhaps we can celebrate our success in October next year, on the next anniversary.

I must conclude, as other Members wish to speak. I look forward to receiving comments on our paper, which we will produce soon. I repeat that we believe that the CFP cannot be reformed. Only the Conservative party can return Britain's coastal communities to prosperity, and its marine environment to health, by establishing national and local control, to 200 miles or the median line.

4.8 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): I woke with a shock last Friday morning to find how near to Christmas we are. It must be near Christmas, as we are having a fishing debate. I want to express the concern of fishing Members that we have only this short debate, crammed in—in this hole-in-the-corner fashion—at the end of a day of very serious and heavy business. Fishing deserves better. It is interesting that fellow Members, enthusiastic as so many of them are about Europe, have spent so much time trying to tease the Conservative spokesman on the policy of withdrawal, which I think is an eminently sensible policy. Without wasting any more time on the issue, it might be sensible for my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, who I know is an enthusiastic pro-European, to use the opportunity presented by the Conservative party committing itself to withdrawing from the common fisheries policy to go to the negotiations in Brussels quaking with terror, saying, "This firebrand spokesman for the Opposition is going round the port rousing the fishermen to a policy of withdrawal. You must give us further concessions so that we can beat off this threat." That would be a sensible negotiating approach

Mr. Bradshaw: First, let me reassure my hon. Friend: I think that I would be correctly described as a pragmatic rather than an enthusiastic European. Secondly, let me tell him that I do not need to point out to the Commission that the United Kingdom is unique in having a main Opposition party—and, indeed, one or two other parties—with a policy favouring withdrawal from the common fisheries policy.

Mr. Mitchell: Nevertheless, it is sensible to publicise the anger of fishermen who feel, rightly in my view, that this country has not had and is not getting a fair deal from the CFP.

I have another reason for deploring the shortness and lateness of the debate. We are, I hope, at a turning point in Europe. We have certainly reached a conservation crunch, but I think we may also see an end to the panic measures that have dominated up until now. The Government's strategy unit's investigation will be important to the industry: it will, I think, constitute a prelude to change and will point us in new directions, although the Government have not yet accepted responsibility for investment in the industry. It is an important new beginning, in any event. At this time of change we deserve more time for discussion, perhaps both before and after the negotiations. We need a major fishing debate.

Will the coming discussions in Brussels mark a new beginning there? We have a new Commissioner, Joe Borg, who does not have a second job and who I hope will bring a more relaxed approach to the common fisheries policy. It must be said that during his last couple of years in office Commissioner Fischler, accustomed as he was to devoting most of his time to negotiating on the common agricultural policy and to bullying, bashing and acting tough, tended to apply the same tactics to fishing—which, being a much more complex industry, needs nurturing and support rather than bullying.

To an extent, that attitude continued as fishing moved into a conservation crisis caused, essentially, by the CFP itself. The CFP presents itself as a conservation policy, but it is not. It is a political policy whose purpose is to dole out catches and satisfy as many people as it can, which leads to overfishing. When overfishing generated a conservation crisis, the European Union resorted to panic measures—draconian and ill-considered panic measures that all too regularly had to be chopped and changed. That required new legislation, and months spent tinkering with it to bring it up to scratch. We have seen 60 per cent. reductions in total allowable catches, and an increase in mesh size to 120 mm. Huge areas have been closed for cod conservation. I hope the Minister will accept that it is possible to relax some of those measures.

Mr. Drew: My hon. Friend clearly shares my scepticism. Does he agree that one of the biggest problems of the CFP is that it has done nothing about industrial fishing? We have all these wonderful quotas and controls, and the system is supposedly there to deal with conservation, but outside it nations are ripping the heart out of our marine environment. I know that my hon. Friend feels strongly about that, but I thought he might want to comment on it.

Mr. Mitchell: I am glad that my hon. Friend has made that point. There is still a substantial by-catch in industrial fishing. Danish industrial fishermen have been found to be catching white fish on a considerable and damaging scale, and the practice continues despite all the efforts of most other fishing nations and continuous condemnation that is echoed in every fisheries debate in the House. It is a scar on the face of the common fisheries policy, and it should be stopped.

On the need to relax some of the draconian measures, the calculations of the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea are based on fairly old science, dating from 2003, and make no allowance for the huge reduction in our fishing effort, particularly in Scotland but also in England. Nor does it allow for the improvement, as has been pointed out, in the availability of haddock and monkfish. Yet instead of looking forward to a relaxation of such measures, the first indications are that policy is going to be tightened.

The Commission is talking of designating closed boxes in areas in which 60 per cent. of cod is taken, including a spawning ground just off the Yorkshire coast. I should make it clear that the industry supports such closures, but not ill-considered, ill-defined ones that are imposed as a panic measure. Closures need to be made in consultation with the industry, which has practical experience of what is happening in such grounds. The industry certainly deserves to be consulted, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will oppose this substantial use of closed boxes. I hope, too, that he will ensure that cod conservation areas will be policed by way of licences to go in and take cod, rather than licences to go outside and take something else. The latter approach seems a very strange and anomalous one.

I also hope that there could be some relaxation of the time-at-sea limitations. I remind the Minister that if the Government are not going to support the industry financially, they need to allow it to be as profitable as it can be in the current straitened circumstances. In other words, it needs more time at sea to make itself more profitable. But above all, we owe it to the industry to ensure more stable management routines. As the fishing organisations pointed out to us this morning, the indication in the summer was that a more consultative approach would be taken, and that the Commission would be more flexible and would produce an outline agreement in October, so that everybody could be involved in the process.

Here we are in December and it is just like old times: we do not know what is going to happen or what the proposals are, and the figures have not been pencilled in. How can an industry that needs to move towards a sustainable future, and which needs investment and a sustainable employment pattern, plan ahead in these circumstances? It seems that a hard core of officials in the Commission want to carry on ruling by diktat and control. They do not trust fishermen, so they want a tightly regulated industry. Hence the talk of designating closed boxes, of effort limitation in the western channel in respect of sole—unnecessary, according to the fishing organisations—and of further restrictions in the Irish sea.

We want a sustainable industry that can think ahead and invest ahead, and which can provide steady employment prospects, rather than being subject to sudden changes in policy. In the past couple of years, it has borne the brunt of cuts—made necessary by the conservation crisis—that the common fisheries policy itself imposed. Yet other countries—France, Ireland and Spain in particular—are still building their fleets. That building process is supposed to stop at the end of this year, but it is still going on. While we are drastically cutting our fleet, others are still building theirs in order to inherit the future. The industry needs a level playing pattern of enforcement and the confidence that enforcement is as vigorous and effective there as it is here.

We have been told that we face a further run-down by the strategy unit, but it is unreasonable to expect the run-down of the industry to happen unless it is managed and financed by the Government. Part of the original plan proposed by the World Wildlife Fund stressed the importance of investment in getting the industry from position A to an improved position B. It was about investing in the future. The strategy unit did not opt for that, but it should have.

We face a real problem now and the threat to the English industry, particularly on the east coast, is serious. It looks as though one whitefish port is going to have to close. The threat is there and, if it is going to be carried through with confidence, there must be proper management decision-making and compensation arrangements. If licences and entitlements are flowing out of the area to other areas that are doing better, we should try to keep them in order to maintain the essential critical mass that the industry needs to be viable. There must be some financial support for keeping the licences in the area.

I understand that the Minister is strongly concerned about stability and we all agree on the need for it, so I am sure that he welcomes, as I do, the establishment of the regional advisory council. In passing, I want to say that I am still not reassured about how regional management conflicts with exclusive competence. We need to look into that matter very seriously.

We all welcome the working group on demersal stocks, that the regional advisory council has set up. It produced an excellent report, that points the way forward. For too long, fishing in this country has been ignored by the Government, only to be restructured by liquidation when the British Government avoided responsibility. Under the Fontainebleau agreement, they would have had to make a major contribution, but they did not want to finance it. The Government did not draw on European funds in the way that applies to some other European countries, but they did not provide an alternative either. As far as the industry was concerned, it was a double whammy. That was the position in this country, and it was subsequently replaced by a system of draconian decisions from a panic-stricken Commission, desperately trying to clear up the mess that it had created.

I have every confidence in the Minister's commitment to stability, stable management and moving towards a sustainable future. I hope that, in the forthcoming discussions, he will begin the process towards achieving that. We want an industry that works and the Minister is trying to develop that—all credit to him and all power to his elbow—in consultation with the scientists. It is important to exchange points of view so that the two sides can understand each other. The gap between them has often been a crying shame. The industry should be brought into the regional management structures.

The fishing industry must be listened to by the Commission and the Government. We must have co-operative management of fishing. For too long, it has been a hunting industry and it is crucial to bring it into a process of co-operation and consultation if we are to can work towards that goal at the forthcoming talks in Brussels, we may be able to stave off the worst of the threats of more draconian management from the Commission. We may then be able to start the turn-around towards the sustainable future that we all want.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): May I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I have in writing to Mr. Speaker, for the overlap in my diary, as a result of which I was detained for the first few minutes of the Minister's speech? I mentioned it in person to the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) and I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to others for their forbearance.

I join other hon. Members in saying that it is traditional and appropriate in the annual fisheries debate that we acknowledge the hundreds and thousands of fishermen who risk their lives to put fish on our dinner tables and pay respect to the men who have lost their lives in recent times.

The debate has ranged wide. It is appropriate that, before he attends the Council meeting just before Christmas, the Minister should understand the strength of feeling in fishing constituencies about the issues with which he and other Ministers will grapple. It is frustrating that we have had some indication of what the proposals will be—I understand that they will be published on 8 December—but that we do not know for sure. We are, in a sense, arguing in the dark.

There were two sides to the speech made by the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson). One side, which was helpful and constructive, dealt mainly with technical measures, the absurdity of the mesh sizes for some fisheries and the need to adapt measures to take account of those absurdities. He referred to the way in which decisions have been made in the past about mesh sizes, especially in mixed commercial fisheries. I commend him for the comments that he made, and I hope that the Minister was listening.

In the other side of his speech, the hon. Gentleman put a little more flesh on the bones of the Conservative party's fantasy policy of withdrawing from the common fisheries policy. He said that it would be the intention of a Conservative Government to negotiate their way out of the CFP. It is extremely unlikely that they could do so. I wonder whether he would ask fishermen around the coast to bet their boats on the Conservatives' succeeding if they were given the opportunity to attempt to negotiate their way out.

The only other alternative would be to breach the accession treaty of 1972 or to seek a derogation. We could not obtain a derogation because the decisions were, as the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) rightly said, made by the Conservatives and at that stage they felt that the fishing industry was largely expendable in the wider context. However, I came to politics and to this issue in 1997, and I have to deal with the world as I find it. I would not necessarily have started from here, but we have to be pragmatic and ensure that we do not commit a cruel hoax on the fishing industry by offering a policy that is clearly unachieveable.

Mr. Paterson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Andrew George: I will gladly give way in a moment. Perhaps when I do so the hon. Gentleman would like to address the question. Although he said that the régime would be better and that the outcome for other EU nations would be beneficial if the UK withdrew from the CFP, the fact is that it may not happen. As the Conservative Government found with the Merchant Shipping Act 1988, Factortame came along, and it was an extremely expensive process for the UK. Tens of millions of pounds were expended on pursuing what was largely an ill-thought-out policy. If we were to do what the Conservatives propose, the potential cost to the UK taxpayer would be manifold compared with the cost in respect of the Merchant Shipping Act.

I hope that if the Conservatives introduce the policy and a White Paper they will have done the costings, because it is important that we fully understand the implications.

Mr. Paterson: I repeat that this is an issue of political will. We have decided that this activity is unsuited for direction at continental level. We have followed the policy since 1972—the final details were, of course, endorsed by the Wilson Government, who renegotiated the deal—but it has not worked. We have looked at other areas where successful fisheries thrive, because the measures that the hon. Gentleman admires—closed areas, mesh size and others—can be imposed only with national overall control. That is not a hoax: it is deadly serious. We believe that the European Union is in a constant state of flux and, when one exercises political will, as the French and the Germans have done on the stability pact, one can get results. It is not a zero sum game; the other fishing nations would benefit because we would manage our stocks far better than the CFP does at present.

Andrew George: The hon. Gentleman takes a brave and optimistic view, but I do not think that anybody who is seriously concerned about the future of the fishing industry is engaged in that way.

Mr. Salmond: It is certainly true that we would not have to repatriate fishing if the Conservative party had not expatriated it in the first place. I served on the Committee that considered the Merchant Shipping Act 1988 and tabled a series of amendments warning the Government of the day of the consequence of their policy. If they had based their policy on the residence of the crew, as opposed to the ownership of the vessel, it would have had an excellent chance of coming to fruition. It was an obsession with ownership, as opposed to any interest in where the crew of fishing vessels might come from, that undid that policy and resulted in the many tens of millions of pounds of damages that were eventually paid to Spanish fishing vessels.

Andrew George: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. With the benefit of hindsight, those who want to go into that issue may be able to learn lessons from that intervention. I have not had the benefit of the experience of the hon. Gentleman, but I am not sure that his interpretation of what would have followed is necessarily right.

The hon. Member for North Shropshire said that the issue was a matter of political will, but the Major Government made it a matter of political will to take on Europe over the beef ban. Of course, we all know what happened on that occasion. One can have all the political will and optimistic outlook in the world, but it does not necessarily mean that one will win—or achieve a better outcome for the UK fishing industry.

The Minister said that he was likely to disagree with the Commission's proposals on several stocks—for example, on sole in western area VII. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) also mentioned that. I hope that the Minister will argue strongly for a review of the proposals from the Commission, as we understand them. Both the UK and French Governments, as well as the UK and French industries, are coalescing around an agreement that I hope will win the day on 21 December, because that would be helpful. I hope that within that we will have an agreement to increase mesh sizes for that stock, because of concern about the impact on the year classes.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned—I am sure that others will also do so—the potential severe impact of the Commission's proposals on North sea cod. I am sure that the Minister will know that the UK, through the decommissioning scheme and other efforts, has substantially met the target of 65 per cent. effort reduction. I hope that in the negotiations the UK will therefore be in a strong position to argue for a beneficial outcome for UK fishermen in the North sea.

The Minister also knows that the science on monkfish has never been accurate. The margin for error in the scientific advice is very wide, and the Minister recognised the need to revise the science and increase the quota for monkfish in area VII during a catch year. I hope that he will bear that in mind when he is negotiating the outcome for monkfish in area VII.

I am delighted that the North Sea regional advisory council has met and I hope that the Irish Sea and the Western Approaches councils do so soon. Having spoken to some of the people involved in that meeting, I know that they want those advisory committees to take a proactive rather than a reactive role in their relationship with the Commission—to set the agenda for policy and enforcement in those regions, rather than merely to respond to the Commission's proposals. Some people suggest that the regional advisory councils should be de facto management councils. I strongly endorse that and hope that the Minister will do all he can to ensure that they operate in that way, as many of us want.

There is significant disquiet about the precipitate way in which closed areas have been defined. As the Minister knows, for many years there has been agreement in the industry about a closed area in the Trevose head region of the Bristol channel, but that has taken a lot of scientific work and discussion with the industry. There is concern that the co-ordinates for the closed areas of the North sea have been somewhat snatched at rather than carefully considered and subjected to consultation. Although we want to pursue a closed areas policy, and to put a greater emphasis on that type of approach, it is important that proposals are soundly based.

On UK matters, the Minister has largely endorsed the proposals in the Bradley report for a significant change in the role of sea fisheries committees in England and Wales and their amalgamation. Will he clarify his views on that point? Sea fisheries committees are a classic case of "If it ain't broke, don't fix it", certainly in my constituency area. There are separate committees for Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly, which work extremely well and are appropriately intertwined with the industry. There is good partnership in the area and the byelaws that the committees draw up can be closely and carefully inspected, due to the local nature of the committees' operation. I hope that the Minister will consider those issues carefully rather than rushing headlong—I hope he will not—to endorse and implement some of the proposals in the Bradley report.

I was disappointed that the Queen's Speech did not mention a marine Bill. Although such a measure would deal with many aspects apart from fisheries, many people in the industry, as well as those concerned about the marine environment, would like some consolidating legislation. That includes the sea fisheries committees, which largely operate under laws passed in the Victorian era. Such legislation needs both updating and consolidation, so I hope that the Minister will take that point on board and that there will be proposals for a marine Bill to bring all those aspects together in the not-too-distant future.

I congratulate the Minister on bringing in the welcome ban on pair trawling in the 12-mile zone from the beginning of November. I encourage him to continue his negotiations with his European counterparts, especially the French, over pair trawling in the western waters and the channel. I know that the French deny that their industry has a significant dolphin and cetacean by-catch, but I have spoken to several academics working with Brest university who are confident that there is sufficient evidence to show a connection between the French pair trawling industry and strandings on the west Breton coast. I hope that the Minister will look carefully into that matter and press it home very hard indeed.

The Minister will also be aware that, around some coasts, there is a strong argument for the establishment of voluntary codes with regard to gill nets and cetacean by-catches, particularly of the harbour porpoise. I am pleased to say that, for example, in the Cornish fishery, significant progress has been made in Mounts bay and St. Austell bay, where the voluntary code that has been established between the wildlife trust and the industry is working well.

Some important issues have been raised in the debate today. Obviously, we are concerned as Members of Parliament that we have been given an opportunity to debate these issues before we have seen the Commission's proposals. I hope that the Minister will consider allowing us a further opportunity, either later this month or early in the new year, to review the decisions made, so that we can make further progress. I hope that the Minister will take those issues on board.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): I wish to associate myself with the Minister's remarks regarding the tragedy of Colin Donnelly, who was one of my constituents, as well as the other fishermen throughout the UK who have lost their lives. Indeed, slightly earlier, three generations—grandfather, father and son—were lost in one incident in my constituency. It was one of the greatest tragedies that I have ever known, and it highlights the horror that can result from the unpredictability of earning one's livelihood at sea.

I shall resist the temptation to enter into the international debate about the CFP and various other things. I simply wish to concentrate very briefly on a couple of matters that directly affect the negotiations that are about to take place and that will impinge on the fishermen of my constituency and the North Down constituency from January next—just a few weeks away.

First, I should like to deal briefly with the total allowable catches and the quotas. It seems from the information that I have received that the jury is still out on what is happening to Irish sea cod, whiting and haddock, but we would like to be assured that improvements will result from the negotiations. However, for plaice and, to a lesser extent, Irish sea sole, the scientific evidence has reversed. Whereas last year the evidence indicated a serious decline in the number of plaice, the same scientists now say that it is on the increase. Therefore, I should like the Minister to take that on board when he negotiates the TACs and quotas for that catch.

The most important catch on the County Down coast that I represent is nephrops. That catch has reduced in real terms over the past four years by 24 per cent.—almost a quarter—because of the quota system. It has been reduced from 23,000 tonnes to 17,500 tonnes. The reduction was introduced not because of a scarcity of nephrops, or prawns, but because of the allegation that there was a considerable by-catch of Irish cod. I wish to say two things about that.

First, fisheries scientists now estimate that the prawn stock in the Irish sea is three times the size that they had previously estimated. Secondly, as a result of the DEFRA-sponsored fishery science partnership, observers on local vessels have indicated and proven that the by-catch, particularly of cod, from the nephrops fishery is, in their terms, minimal. In view of those two factors, will the Minister ensure not only that there is no further reduction in the TAC or quotas for nephrops in the Irish sea, but that there is an increase?

The hon. Member for South Antrim (David Burnside) mentioned The Hague preference, which continually works to the disadvantage of Northern Irish fishermen. There has been a regime over the years whereby the Ministers in the north and south or in London and Dublin exercise a swapping process. Swapping quotas with the Irish fishing industry south of the border has proved to be beneficial. Those two fishing industries for the island of Ireland can see one another fishing. The border between them is in my constituency. Carlingford loch, which is probably the only water border, is not even a mile wide. To have one regime on one side of it and another on the other is nonsense. The Hague preference greatly militates against Northern Ireland fishermen in that respect.

At last December's round of talks, the Council introduced effort control at sea. Northern Irish fishermen were given additional days at sea to compensate for the closures. It is our understanding from the European Community that they will not get those additional days if there is a closure this year. We are also getting indications from our spies at the EC that if the Minister presses strongly enough and negotiates hard enough, we will get those additional days if the closure restrictions are introduced. I leave him with that thought, to gird his loins for that negotiation.

The Irish sea cod closures are now into their fifth year. There have been all sorts of effort controls, including additional technical conservation measures, fishing vessel decommissioning and a plethora of presumably laudable and necessary restrictions on catch. However, there is no evidence of those having any meaningful effect in restoring stocks. Local fishermen are wondering whether over-fishing is causing the problem or whether environmental change is a primary factor in the decreasing stocks of particular species in particular areas, which has been discovered in fishing areas outside the UK. Perhaps the Minister will take that on board in his review.

I like to think that the Minister will, in the remaining time before he sits down at the negotiating table, consult more intimately—if that is the right word to use—the Northern Ireland fishing organisations. There is an opinion that they were excluded from the higher echelons of consultation for the first time, in 2004. They have always had a close relationship with the Fishing Minister in the north and the Fishing Minister in Westminster.

David Burnside: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that our representative, Mr. Alan McCulla, will be at Westminster next Tuesday, giving evidence to the fishery Sub-Committee of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee, representing our interests. We hope that that evidence will be passed on to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. McGrady: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that information. It would be a great thing if the Minister, who will be the key person at the negotiating table, takes the opportunity of the Irish fisherman's presence here to give him an interview and discuss matters with him. That would be most laudable.

I end with words of exhortation on behalf of the fishing fleet in Northern Ireland. Communities such as Kilkeel and Ardglass, the primary ports in South Down, and Portavogie in North Down depend on the fleet. Not only is the fishing industry dependent on the catches and the markets, but whole communities are built almost exclusively on the fishing industry and fish processing. The fleet is vital to the economy of my constituency and the industry as a whole in Northern Ireland.

4.49 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for North Down—[Interruption.] I am sorry. It would have been a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for either Down, but it is certainly a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady). I will follow his example by spending the latter part of my speech on specific practical matters. The Minister said that he was a pragmatic Fisheries Minister; I am a pragmatic Opposition Member, and my uppermost concern in these debates is the immediate issues that face my constituents and the industry that depends on the catching of fish. I shall devote some time to the politics, but I will want answers to my specific points.

I do not agree with Members who have suggested that this is the wrong time for the debate. We have a very good idea of the proposals that will come forward. We know what the Norwegian talks have thrown up and we know, roughly at least, what the Commission's proposals might be. In so far as the Minister chooses these things, he has chosen the right time for the debate. I hope that he will keep us informed as the talks go on. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) made an excellent point, and perhaps the Minister will even prevail on the Leader of the House for a statement as the talks progress. Would it not be interesting if the subject of fisheries was considered important enough to have a statement on the Floor of the House? The Minister could inform us of progress, and we could have a debate.

I am sure that the Minister will want to provoke a debate on the outcome of the negotiations. This year I provoked a debate in Westminster Hall to examine the unintended consequences of last year's fisheries discussion. I hope that we will not have the same unintended consequences this year, but it is important that the Minister, having chosen the right time for this debate, keeps us informed on the progress of the negotiations—I know that he will be anxious to do that—and comes back in January for a debate on their outcome. It is time that we accorded the subject the importance that it deserves.

Lawrie Quinn: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that, probably two years ago, we had a very useful and encouraging debate in a European Standing Committee? Members representing fishing communities were better able to scrutinise the outcome of European talks. Is not that format, which allows for debate and a vote on a motion, the best for allowing us to discuss the meat of the decisions that will probably be made?

Mr. Salmond: Like the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), I have been at every fisheries debate on every occasion, stretching back for many years, and I remember that debate—precisely because I noted that the Minister disparaged the common fisheries policy and said how much he disagreed with it. I think he will find that on the record; I do not see him demurring. It was a useful debate, and of course, he opposed the policy only in a pragmatic sense in that Committee. None the less, he was right to do so. I shall remind the House what is wrong with a policy that has served us so badly over the past 30 years or so.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): My hon. Friend mentioned the unintended consequences of last year's deal. Does he realise that they still have repercussions for our fishing communities? For example, it was discovered halfway through the period that the port of Arbroath was not a designated port for haddock landing. The Scottish Executive then said that it was designated, but it turned out that it had not been properly designated. That has caused utter confusion in the fishing industry, and the same applies to small ports throughout Scotland.

Mr. Salmond: I remember going with my hon. Friend to see the Fisheries Minister, and I know that he was keen to see the designation of a number of ports. I am unhappy to hear that Arbroath was not properly designated; it should have been. It is a vital port, and the industry that flows from the fresh haddock catch there is also important.

The unintended consequences illustrate the nature of the common fisheries policy. If the Minister goes to negotiations, as he did last year, and is suddenly confronted with a range of maps and devices—some of which had not been seen before and had certainly not been consulted on with the fishermen themselves—the negotiations are bound to produce unintended consequences, which is the euphemism for their effects on people trying make their living. For the communities that depend on the catches, they are a disaster.

That is no way to run a fisheries policy. The CFP is inherently flawed, because it does not confer a sense of ownership. Any resource policy needs a direct form of ownership, without which there is only a loose incentive for conservation. Any fleet under pressure will decide that if it does not catch the resource, another fleet will do so, and deplete the resource. The result is competition between fishermen in an essentially competitive industry, and competition between fleets. Without a common thread of ownership, fisheries policy is deeply flawed.

The CFP is the only attempt at common resource ownership in the European Union. I noted that, in the Chancellor's statement today, oil revenues came to the rescue, enabling him partly to fill the black hole in his calculations. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister is busy spending that largesse on wars, and the Home Secretary wants to spend it on identity cards. None the less, oil has come to the rescue. Can hon. Members imagine what would happen to the Chancellor's already furrowed brow if the EU declared that oil was to be an exclusive competence of the European Commission? Instead of the revenues coming to the aid of the Chancellor, they would go to the aid of the Commission. There would be explosions at the Dispatch Box if such a suggestion were made about the oil resource, but that is what was given away in the resource of marine fisheries 30 years ago.

Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): That was disgraceful.

Mr. Salmond: Indeed. It was disgraceful that the Conservative party permitted it.

The modern Conservative party says that that was in the Heathite years of the past. Things are entirely different now, apparently, and fishing would merit a much higher priority. However, the Benches behind the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) are empty, so I wonder about that priority. I commend the hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) for coming to the Chamber to hear me speak, but he should have been here to hear the hon. Member for North Shropshire, who gave an interesting speech.

I have been doing my sums, and the leader of the Conservative party has had just over 200 opportunities to ask about fisheries policy at Prime Minister's questions, but he has not managed to ask any questions to date—not one. He will probably ask one next Wednesday, but it is remarkable that he has not yet done so. However, I do not doubt the honesty and integrity of hon. Member for North Shropshire, partly because the Deputy Speaker would not allow me to do so, but also because he has visited more fisheries ports and fisheries regimes than I have had fish suppers. However, the good intentions of many Opposition spokesmen and Fisheries Ministers have been laid to ruin, because when push comes to shove, they realise that fisheries policy in the United Kingdom does not have any priority—and never has had under successive Governments, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby and I have realised in the fisheries debates that we have sat through. I can see that the hon. Gentleman is nodding freely.

David Burnside: Given the auld alliance between Scotland and France, can the hon. Gentleman extend that comparison? Presidents and Prime Ministers intervene on behalf of the French or Spanish interest in those discussions in December every year. That happened last year, but when was the last time a British Prime Minister intervened to back up his negotiating Minister?

Mr. Salmond: President Chirac, of course, threatened to go to the negotiations if the French did not get their way, but concessions were made. The Prime Minister made a phone call to Herr Fischler. I thought that I could recruit Rory Bremner to make half a dozen calls and make fisheries a much greater priority. However, there is a serious point to be made—no British Prime Minister or Government have made fisheries a priority. One remembers the chilling words of the civil service memo released under the 30-year rule:

"In light of Britain's wider European interests they"— the Scottish fishermen—

"are expendable".

Incidentally, that was not a civil servant saying that Scottish fishermen should be expendable. It was a civil servant in the then Scottish Office commenting on the negotiations and bitterly assessing the attitude being adopted by the Prime Minister of the day, the negotiators and the Foreign Office. I believe that that remains the situation.

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Prime Minister has set up the strategy unit on fishing, which has now reported? This is the first time, perhaps for decades, that the fishing industry has had such a targeted approach from No. 10.

Mr. Salmond: Of course I am aware of that. I welcome the hon. Gentleman to a fisheries debate. If he came to more of them, he would know what I am aware of. The Prime Minister's strategy unit was somewhat flawed by its inability to count the vessels in the Scottish fishing fleet. We would have had more confidence in the strategy unit if it had been able to count the number of boats that we have, never mind forecast the decline, which it then projected forward. That caused huge irritation in Scotland.

I was interested in the debate in the European Fisheries Committee, which by 24 votes to nil, with four abstentions, attacked the exclusive competence of the fisheries policy in the proposed European constitution as "anomalous and unjustified". Two of the Portuguese members of the Committee wanted to go further in their amendments. The impression given by the Government—that everybody else throughout the European Union is comfortable with the fisheries policy, and it would be an impossible negotiation to try to get something fundamental done about it—is misleading. There is deep dissatisfaction in many member states with that policy of despair for many, many fishing communities across Europe.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): Does my hon. Friend agree that one part of the debate that is often missed is the fact that the draft European constitution, with the exclusive competence on marine and biological resources under the CFP, could act as a disincentive for fishing nations now outside the EU to join? Does he believe that countries such as Norway and Iceland will ever join the EU if a constitution with such a provision is passed?

Mr. Salmond: The point is well made. I do not think there is any chance of Norway, Iceland or the Faroes joining the European Union if the Union tries to maintain exclusive competence over fisheries. If we look at the European constitution, we can see just how ridiculous the position is. There are four exclusive competences in the EU, in addition to the competition laws necessary for the single market to which Lady Thatcher signed us up. The first three are the customs union, which was the very foundation of the Common Market; common commercial policy, without which there could not be a European Union; and monetary policy, for member states whose currency is in it. The Government, who criticise others for wanting to opt out of the common fisheries policy, are happy to continue almost indefinitely opting out of monetary policy, which seems to me slightly more fundamental to the future of the EU than the fisheries policy. Lastly, there is the conservation of marine biological resources under the common fisheries policy.

That is ridiculous. It is an anomaly from the past, dating from when the competence was signed away in 1971. There is massive dissatisfaction, and if there had been an ounce of political muscle in the negotiations, making fishing a priority, it could have been removed from the list of exclusive competences. The great benefit of that would be that when the Minister spoke about regional advisory committees becoming management committees he would have some basis for the argument, because even the doctrine of subsidiarity does not apply to the exclusive competences of the European Union under the constitution. We would be in a much better position.

I shall have many chances to argue those points further in connection with my Fisheries Jurisdiction Bill, which I intend to reintroduce. I am grateful to the many hon. Members who supported it, and I understand that more Conservative Members would have supported it if I had not argued for national control for the nations of the UK. I hope, however, that they will overlook that aspect and that there will be even more support for the Bill when I reintroduce it.

[Mr. Salmond]

I want to ask the Minister some pragmatic questions that are important to my constituents and those of other fisheries Members. We have heard from a number of hon. Members about the prawn fishery. The obvious conclusion that we must draw from the new scientific examination of the prawn stocks—in some ways, it is the first proper such examination—is that they are massively greater than has hitherto been suspected. The quota increases suggested could be called niggardly in comparison, and a fundamental re-evaluation is needed.

Of course, one of the reasons why prawn stocks are so healthy is that the cod are not eating the prawns. In a complex marine fishery, the interaction between fish and other marine species is of fundamental importance. The Minister kindly lent me a book on the history of cod—I have yet to return it, but I have read it and I shall give it back to him shortly. It is relevant in this context. We have a fisheries policy that Herr Fischler, at least, was trying to run as a cod policy in which it seemed that virtually every other species in the sea had to be subservient to cod; it was a case of the ultimate one-club golfer. Unfortunately, the results are disastrous. Instead of giving people other fishing opportunities to take the pressure off cod, they were denied such opportunities and efforts were relocated elsewhere, doing damage to other species.

The North sea is a mixed fishery, and the effort level applied in respect of the white fish fleet is a similar issue. If over-fishing explains the state of cod stocks, how can it be that we have low cod stocks in some areas, but record 30-year-high haddock stocks? There is a mixed fishery, with fish swimming in the same sea, pursued by many of the same boats, yet one stock is at a record high, while the other is low in certain areas. That tells us that there is another explanation—a deep environmental explanation—while the commissioner has refused to consider the matter seriously in any significant way.

Haddock are at a 30-year high. If the Faroese were running haddock policy in the North sea, the quota would be 150,000 tonnes. After the Norwegian talks, we are talking about a possible reduction of the quota.

Mr. Paterson: There is another point, which the hon. Gentleman has missed. The policy is self-defeating in some ways. The lesson with the Faroes is that leaving an enormous haddock stock means that haddock are eating young cod. He made a similar point when he said that prawns were not being eaten.

Mr. Salmond: I am aware of that argument. The Faroes would go for about a third of biomass as a quota. Whether we go for a third or somewhat less—a third would be 160,000 or 170,000 tonnes or so, as opposed to the 66,000 tonne level—there is leeway, which should be accompanied by a huge marketing policy. A fish processor in my constituency said that new filleting machinery technology would enable him to fulfil a contract in mid-Europe, Germany and eastern Europe involving 10,000 tonnes of haddock. Of course, he must have access to the stock. That would be fundamental in giving us a larger stock and catch, and a sustainable price, although a bit of certainty is required that such a contract can be fulfilled in the medium term. Will the Minister think about the opportunity in respect of haddock as he goes into the talks?

I asked the Minister a question about monkfish, to which he was going to reply. Now the Commission, or at least its scientists, have admitted that their monkfish data are nonsensical. We know that monkfish are in plentiful supply and that they are a high-value stock. We are also approaching Christmas, and yet the hard-pressed boats have not been able to access that stock in the past week, nor will they be able to do so in coming weeks. It is tragic in such a fishery that North sea boats will now be diverted to other species, as they desperately try to stay in business. Yet we know that the monkfish are in substantially good condition. All the research supports that view, but the quotas have been allocated at a precautionary level, which means that they have no scientific basis. I know that the Minister is sympathetic to that argument, so will he now press to get back to the 1999 reference period levels and have a sensible allocation of effort on monkfish to allow that fishing opportunity to boats when so many other opportunities will not be available?

I hope that in this contribution, I have managed to combine my politics, which the Minister knows, with my anxiety to see fishing treated differently. My approach is pragmatic, because I want to see improvements and gains. I have made it clear where I would like fisheries policy to go. I do not think that the Tories will win the next election, but in 2007 we will have a fishing-friendly Government in Scotland, led by the Scottish National party. In the meantime, I want to do as much as possible to protect this vital industry, which so many hon. Members love dearly and want to see thrive. It should get the sort of commitment from all politicians to which it has not been accustomed, but to which it is certainly entitled.

5.10 pm

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): I want to say a few words about long-lining, which is an environmentally friendly and sustainable fishing method. I do not believe that long-lining is responsible for the devastation of fish stocks. When my hon. Friend the Minister goes into bat for us in Brussels, whatever further restrictions may be necessary on species such as cod, will he ensure that long-liners are excluded from them, because I cannot see the harm that they do to fish stocks? Long-lining is a labour-intensive form of fishing and supports more jobs per fish caught than many other methods.

The main reason why I wanted to catch your eye this evening, Mr. Deputy Speaker, is to follow through on a point that I made at Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions only a couple of weeks ago. The problem concerns pay levels at the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science. CEFAS employs the scientists on whom we rely in order to hold today's debate. The Minister has kindly undertaken to look into the matter, and so that he can do so with an understanding of the scientists' point of view, I want to apprise him and the House of the current situation at CEFAS, which is highly unsatisfactory.

CEFAS is an Executive agency of DEFRA. Its headquarters is in Lowestoft, the largest of its three sites, and it has two other sites at Weymouth and Burnham—my hon. Friend the Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight) supports my remarks. CEFAS employs 530 people, about 300 of whom are based at Lowestoft. Although the scientists do more than concentrate on fishing, we rely on them for accurate information on fish stocks, various species, factors affecting breeding, fish health and the whole marine environment. Every year in this debate, someone says, "Our policies must be based on sound science." Without those scientists, we could not formulate a fisheries policy. Without the help and advice of our scientists, my hon. Friend would, in effect, go into bat in the Fisheries Council wearing a blindfold. If we respect what those people say about fish stocks, we should respect what they say about pay, which is a problem. Until a few years ago, all the scientists worked for the old Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and although CEFAS is an agency, its staff still work closely in partnership with DEFRA. If hon. Members table a question, and in particular a detailed question, on fisheries, it will be sent to CEFAS—probably to Lowestoft in my constituency—for the answer. CEFAS is part of the machinery of Government. It is not privatised and is not a contractor that is paid special rates for specific jobs. CEFAS staff receive different levels of pay from core DEFRA staff. For example, the difference between the minimum points on the pay scales is between £2,750 and £7,000 a year. At the maximum end of the scale, the difference is typically about £3,000 a year.

Worse still, although core DEFRA staff can progress through those scales to the maximum of the pay band over a period of, say, eight to 15 years, there is no progression system for CEFAS staff apart from leaving the entry range after one or two years. Those scientists tread water with no hope of reaching the maximum. The pay at CEFAS is quite low. Graduates start on £15,000, while those on exactly the same grade in core DEFRA start on £21,451. Nothing highlights the problem more than that.

When I took this matter up before, I received a reply from the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality, who said in a letter dated 27 October that the agency arrangements

"enable more 'freedoms' to create the necessary degree of flexibility to allow operational accountability for the organisations delivering the service" and give them flexibility in their pay arrangements to align them appropriately to the services that they exist to provide.

It is said that the agency has the opportunity to go out and win extra non-Government work in the private sector to enhance its income. CEFAS knows that, and does so, but the fact remains that 82 per cent. of its income still comes from DEFRA. If one includes the other Departments that it works for, 91 per cent. of its income comes from the Government.

CEFAS is not paid in any competitive, contractual way—it simply gets a block payment from DEFRA each year to do whatever DEFRA wants. In effect, CEFAS is part of DEFRA and has to respond as part of the civil service, so if something needs doing, it has to do it—it expects and accepts that. It does not have the freedom to pay the rates that it would like. If, in a good year, it earns more income from other sources, it is not free to distribute that in a pay rise because there is a Treasury cap that means that it can do so only if the Treasury agrees to it—rather a hard thing to get it to do. It cannot even plough those extra earnings back into the business in any form because any surplus has to be paid back to DEFRA.

CEFAS is in a trap, and it is not surprising that its staff are unhappy. That is showing up in retention problems. About 70 staff have left in each of the past four years. There is a move towards a transient work force rather than the stable community of committed scientists that we need to do the job. Management recognise that they have a problem and currently pay what they call recruitment and retention allowance to 33 people, amounting to £67,000 a year in total. Of course, that creates disparities within the organisation and is not a particularly transparent method of solving the problem. That creates tensions and ill feeling, which are not good for team building.

Staff surveys at CEFAS have shown that pay is the main problem. I am told that a review just carried out by a Mr. Ken Crossland found that pay is the most significant source of staff discontent and that the laboratory is finding recruitment and retention a growing problem. Last September, the staff held a ballot on whether to accept a pay offer. It was rejected by 91 per cent. of members of Prospect and 97 per cent. of members of the Public and Commercial Services Union. Ballots on strike action or action short of a strike came out two to one in favour of strike action. One union came out eight to one in favour of action short of striking, with the other union four to one in favour of such action. These are moderate scientists with no history of militancy; the fact that they are voting for strike action and action short of striking shows how they feel.

I mentioned that a review of the DEFRA agencies is taking place. Will my hon. Friend the Minister use that to examine the problem of these scientists' pay and try to sort it out? CEFAS deals with intellectual property, and its success depends on the quality of people's minds. I put it to the House that troubled, unhappy minds do not make for a successful organisation.

Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): It is clear to us all that the common fisheries policy has failed. It has failed to conserve key fish stocks—most obviously cod—and it has failed the remote communities where fishing has long been a mainstay of the local economy. That has happened because the policy is over-centralised and run from Brussels. Decisions are made in a secretive forum that is far too remote from those who are affected by them.

It is clear that the CFP must be reformed, and reform is the only viable option: although withdrawal might be tempting, it is not a serious option. The CFP is part of the original 1972 treaty of accession. To renegotiate that, Britain would need the agreement of all the other 24 members of the European Union. There is clearly no prospect of that. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) claimed that it was a matter of political will. He may personally have that will, but the empty Benches behind him—he is accompanied only by a Whip—show that the Tory party does not regard withdrawal as a top priority. There is therefore no demonstration of such political will.

[Mr. Alan Reid]

Negotiation and achieving unanimity among EU members for Britain's withdrawal from the CFP will not happen. If Britain wished to leave the CFP, it would have to leave the EU. Perhaps there is substantial political will on the part of some members of the Conservative party for that, but it would have major and damaging consequences for the country. It would adversely affect our exports to the EU and the impact would be felt in industrial and fishing communities alike. Many of the prawns that are caught and landed in my constituency are exported to other EU countries. Leaving the EU would also have an impact on the investment that many of our remote communities receive from European structural funds.

In addition, there is the problem that fish swim across national boundaries. British fishermen traditionally fish in other countries' waters, so withdrawal would have to be followed by negotiations with the EU, acting on behalf of those member states with which we had shared fisheries. We would also have to negotiate with other countries outside the EU, such as Norway, Iceland and the Faroe Islands. That would mean ending up where we started, with annual horse-trading with the EU and other countries to reach a decision. That is exactly what happens now and what is wrong with the current system.

The reform that is required is giving genuine power to regional management committees instead of regional advisory councils.

Mr. Paterson: The hon. Gentleman raises the old canard about fish swimming over boundaries. The EU creates artificial boxes, for example, cod boxes and Irish boxes. I visited Norway this week, and it has vast areas, not only off its 200-mile exclusion zone. It has Jan Mayen island and Spitsbergen. It catches 80 per cent. of its fish in shared zones because it has borders with the EU, the Faroes, Greenland, Iceland and Russia, and that works satisfactorily. However, Norway has control. That is not the horse-trading that the hon. Gentleman described.

Mr. Reid: I simply do not follow the hon. Gentleman's argument. On the one hand, he says that Norway has control, and on the other he talks about shared zones and the need to negotiate. The hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) put the point well when he said that, if Britain left the CFP, Carlingford lough would be split between two jurisdictions and there would have to be further negotiations. Withdrawal from the CFP would not result in Britain's having control. We would have to negotiate with many other countries. That is what we do now. The Conservative party is arguing from a false perspective when it claims that leaving the EU would give us sole control.

Mr. Salmond: There is one difference that the hon. Gentleman might like to think about. Under that perspective, we would negotiate only with countries with fishing resources. In the current context, many countries with no fishing resources whatever technically have an equal say in the Council of Ministers over fisheries negotiations.

Mr. Reid: Were the hon. Gentleman leading the negotiations for an independent Scotland, which he continually fantasises will happen, he would be in a very weak negotiating position trying to negotiate with all the other countries around the North sea.

Mr. Paterson: It is a perfectly sensible point. The land-locked countries that I named—Slovakia, Hungary and so on—will horse-trade their interest in fish to get benefits on agricultural matters in the Council. Norway is working closely with other maritime nations. To take the most dramatic example, the Falklands and Argentina were at war 20 years ago, but this year they worked closely together and closed down the fishery early, because the illex dropped off. That is what happens when maritime nations work together out of common interest.

Mr. Reid: But the hon. Gentleman has conceded that Britain would not have sole control and would still have to negotiate. Trying to sell the idea that Britain has sole control is just nonsense.

Mr. Bradshaw: I hesitate to reopen this debate, but the hon. Gentleman is making some important points. The UK would be negotiating not only from a position of isolation but from a position of having narked every other country with whom we were hoping to renegotiate, while at the same time not having any say whatever in the common fisheries policy that will govern many of the seas in which our fishermen have an interest.

Mr. Reid: The Minister makes a very important point.

I want to make some important points about my local fishery in the west of Scotland. The prawn fishery is now the most valuable fishery available to the Scottish fleet. There is universal scientific agreement that prawn stocks are healthy. It is true that, in certain areas, at certain times, there is a cod by-catch that is more than negligible. That cod by-catch should be avoided by area access restrictions at certain times of the year, rather than by quota restrictions, but as long as prawn fishing vessels avoid certain designated areas at certain times, the cod by-catch when fishing for prawns is only negligible.

The published scientific data show that the nephrops total allowable catch for the west of Scotland could be increased by 30 per cent. without any risk to stocks. The EU's Scientific, Technical and Economic Committee for Fisheries has taken a cautious approach and advised that an 11 per cent. increase in TAC would have no adverse effect on either prawn or cod stocks. I urge the Minister, in the negotiations, to ensure that the Commission heeds the scientific advice and increases the west of Scotland nephrops TAC by at least the cautious 11 per cent. recommended by the committee.

Another problem that is being caused to fishermen in the west of Scotland relates to the annexe V restrictions, which apply to nephrops fishermen. The Clyde Fishermen's Association has pointed out to me that those regulations cause them a great deal of problems and inconvenience, yet the benefit of the regulations to cod stocks is miniscule. I urge the Minister to try to persuade the Commission that the west of Scotland's nephrops fishery should be exempted from the annexe V regulations, which achieve nothing and cause a great deal of problems.

In the long run, we need to move away from the annual negotiations and horse-trading in Brussels towards regional management committees, but for this year at least, we are struck with the horse-trading. The Clyde Fishermen's Association has asked me to pass on its appreciation of the interest that the Minister has taken in his consultations with the fishing community, and I hope that he will achieve in negotiations the nephrops quota increase and the lifting of the annexe V regulations. If those gains can be achieved, it will be a welcome relief to struggling fishing communities in the west of Scotland.

5.29 pm

Mr. Michael Jabez Foster (Hastings and Rye) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak briefly in what I realise is a truncated debate.

First, I want to say a big thank you to my hon. Friend the Minister, who like his predecessor has become in all respects the fisherman's friend. Only this week, my constituents in Rye were pleased to note that some £4.7 million had been invested in a new fishing quay. The work starts this week, and bulldozers are on the site. The quay will provide a secure and improved facility for the next 50 years or so.

Also, in both Hastings and Rye, my constituents who are employed in the under 10 m fleet in Hastings, the largest beach-launched fleet in Europe, are celebrating my hon. Friend's good sense in suspending the licensing conditions for the remainder of the year. That means that my hard-pressed constituents will have a rather happier Christmas than they might otherwise have had.

The sensitivity shown by my hon. Friend is commendable, although I must add that concern remains about the viability of the under 10 m fleet if the current limits are retained. The limitations imposed by the quota system within the CFP are understandable, but whatever the outcome for Britain in the quota negotiations, my constituents could benefit from a different approach to how these little boats are dealt with.

Mr. Salmond: Is there anything I can do to have such things bestowed on me by Santa Bradshaw? Is there any way in which I can persuade the Minister to provide such largesse for my hard-pressed constituency?

Mr. Foster: I can only suggest that the hon. Gentleman should carry on voting Labour.

Even within the context of the under 10 m sector, I can offer a third thank you to the Minister. I thank him for setting up the process whereby following the report of the Prime Minister's strategy unit—as I have said, that constitutes the first involvement of No. 10 for many years—meetings have been arranged between representatives of the under 10 m fleet and DEFRA, in my area at least. Such dialogue will undoubtedly lead to better understanding, at the very least.

The strategy unit report recognised the need to protect small fishing communities, not—I acknowledge—because they were of massive economic importance in themselves, but because in many such areas the wider community depends on their survival. That applies very much to my constituency. Why would one want to visit the town of Rye and its harbour if the harbour were not kept open for fishing? Why would one want to go to Hastings old town, but for the net huts and the charm of the boats on the beach? While small fishing communities are important for historic and cultural reasons, they have a wider economic value in their wider community.

What can be done? As the Minister will know, for cod fishing purposes the eastern channel is bizarrely treated as part of the North sea. The idea of Hastings and Rye being on the North sea is certainly bizarre. Perhaps my first request should be for a more realistic attitude to the way in which the European areas are zoned: there is a particular reason for that in the eastern channel.

My fisherman constituents firmly believe that the eastern channel is overstocked with cod. As has been said, area VIId is treated as part of the North sea for cod stock assessment purposes, and TAC cuts in the North sea apply to that area as well. However, the validity of that grouping was based on work done by the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science back in 1964—under another Labour Government, true, but many decades ago. My constituents say that that historic calculation is no longer valid. They believe that the cod are of a different stock from those in the North sea, and that the eastern channel cod are particularly plentiful. Indeed, it is impossible not to catch them.

Therefore, a fourth thank you is due to the Minister for his agreement to look again at the science relating to the eastern channel. He has now approved a new research project which CEFAS will undertake to identify and quantify the stock. I do not know how long that survey is likely to take, but I welcome the Minister's initiative and hope that the outcomes will be known very soon. If they justify my constituents' belief that area VIId should be separated, my constituents should be allowed to fish in a way that is more appropriate to the available stock. In the meantime, while the issues are under review, alternative arrangements will be necessary. It is simply impossible for my constituents to survive on the small cod catches that their current licences permit.

For the past two years, the small boats in the eastern channel have not even caught the quota permitted for their sector, due to the over-restrictiveness of the licensing conditions imposed on their individual catches. Of course, my hon. Friend the Minister has sorted things out for this year, but we need to do something for the years to come. Incidentally, this procedure is not necessarily covered by European law. Other member states, which need only to estimate the under 10 m catch, do just that. There is no regulation requiring small limits and licensing conditions for such fleets. The Minister has therefore made a wise decision in suspending the licence conditions for this year-end period, thereby perhaps enabling the catching of something nearer the permitted quota. But does he agree that next year, it would be helpful to come up with a different scheme from the very beginning?

As I have pointed out, a monthly limit of 750 kg for a boat with a crew of one equates to a weekly wage of £66. If the boat is unable to take its monthly quota because of the existing conditions, even that income is lost. My constituents therefore propose that the monthly allocations be scrapped altogether. The cod fishery could be left open and unrestricted until all the channel quota has been caught. It also seems reasonable that the eastern channel share of the cod quota be separately determined, given that 67 per cent. of fishermen who target channel cod are based in that area. I think that the Minister can rely on the good sense of my fishermen constituents to make the quota last through to the year's end. I certainly hope that he takes that point on board in respect of next year's arrangements. Indeed, is it really necessary to have a licensed quota at all for these very small boats?

It is believed that the French do not rely on cod to the same extent as fishermen in the eastern channel. Although this is never an easy task, could the Minister, in this, the year of the entente cordiale, speak to his French counterparts and persuade them to surrender just a little of their unused quota?

Finally, I should point out that my fishermen constituents have been cruelly deceived, in that they have been told that it is somehow possible to abandon the common fisheries policy, which they wish to do, without leaving the European Union. They are indeed happy to leave the EU, but I wonder whether the Minister knows of any other nation among the 25 EU nations that could negotiate abandoning the CFP without leaving the EU altogether.

5.37 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): Other Members have remarked on the fact that this is merely a three-hour debate. That is undoubtedly true, but for my constituents and for the fishing industry in my constituency, it is probably the most important three hours in the parliamentary year. I am therefore very grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to take part yet again in such a debate.

Unfortunately, unlike the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)—he is not in his place—I cannot boast a long pedigree of participation in such debates. In fact, this is my fourth such debate, and I do detect a slight improvement in tone this year, and perhaps a feeling of cautious optimism among Members representing fishing constituencies. I wrote down the phrase "cautious optimism" while making notes during the debate, but on mature reflection it was perhaps a gross overstatement. For my part, it might be more accurate to say that I do not feel quite as pessimistic as in recent years; hopefully, that is an indication of movement in the right direction.

Of course, such feelings might simply reflect the fact that this debate is being held at an earlier point. Come 8 December, when we know the full extent of the Commission's proposals for the industry, we might feel very differently. However, I thank the Minister for responding to my earlier intervention by saying that those of us who represent fishing constituencies and the associated industries will have further opportunities for dialogue with him and his officials.

The Minister must be aware of the need to involve fishing industry representatives throughout the whole Council process—a point discussed at the last DEFRA questions, which I want to re-emphasise today. As proposals and counter-proposals emerge, the industry's views must be sought and listened to. It is not a question of giving anyone—either fishermen or conservationists—a veto, but the fishermen must be heard in the course of the process. If that had happened last year, I remain convinced that we would not have been left with a system that, for white fishing in the North sea, verged on the unworkable. We spoke last year about unintended consequences, and we found ourselves in June unpicking some of the unintended consequences of things that could have been done better in December. I certainly hope that that lesson will have been learned.

The Minister referred in his speech, and it was echoed by others, to the establishment of the North Sea regional advisory council. Given that it was part of the Fisheries Council from 2001, if not 2002, it is fair to say that its establishment was long overdue. The Minister will accept that it also remains the subject of a fair degree of scepticism among the fishing industry. Having said that, I am pleased to see that it is now up and running and I take the view that the council has made a good start. In particular, its working party on demersal stocks has produced an excellent provisional opinion, to which both industry representatives and conservationists have been able to sign up. The important point is that the Commission and the member states must listen to the views expressed. If not, the fishing industry's scepticism will be felt to be justified. Frankly, I could not dispute that analysis.

There has been concern for some time about the science and I hope that the regional advisory councils will be able to make some progress in that regard. It seems incredible that, at the end of 2004, we are still using figures that are more than 12 months out of date. The data on which next year's decisions are being made, taking us to the end of 2005, will be almost two years out of date by the time they are finished with.

Mr. Salmond: I was just about to agree with the hon. Gentleman that his own optimism might be exaggerated. What does he believe would be the consequences, intended or otherwise, if the Commission were to persist with a closed area map anything like the one that we were given earlier today? What would be the consequences for his fishermen, my fishermen and fishermen round the coast? What would happen to their opportunities and what about the dislocation of effort elsewhere?

Mr. Carmichael: The hon. Gentleman refers to a map provided to us by members of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation at a briefing earlier today. As Hamish Morrison described it, closed areas would be the "worst-case scenario". Fishermen in my constituency have been disproportionately affected merely because of the geography of where they are based and the size and compass of the closed areas or permit areas that they have had to work with this year. I have no crystal ball, but I know that very few positives would emerge from that particular scenario. I cannot see that it would be workable and I hope that the Minister will hear that. He certainly got that message loud and clear when he visited Shetland during the course of the summer. I shall say more about it later, but it is not just a matter of the lines drawn on the map last year, as the byzantine regulations introduced to accompany them were also significant.

Andrew George: My hon. Friend would surely acknowledge that the industry nevertheless accepts the principle of establishing closed areas. It was the speed with which the decision was taken, the co-ordinates of the North sea areas and the lack of sufficient consultation that caused the problems. Does not my hon. Friend agree?

Mr. Carmichael: It is easy to accept things in principle. However, the experience has been that closed areas, because they come as part of an overall package, have been difficult for fishermen to operate. I have argued for the principle of closed areas. I think that just about everyone who has a fishing interest has done so in some way at some stage, but if closed areas come tied up with such—I have used the word already—byzantine regulations, they become a nonsense. We have had the nonsense of the haddock permit system that has my fishermen in Orkney and Shetland steaming in and out of port, changing gear, and having to notify fisheries protection officers in order to get the permit. Frankly, closed areas are dangerous.

Mr. Weir: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that in small ports it is a particular problem because there are no fisheries protection officers and fishermen have to give notice for officers to come from other ports, which makes it even more difficult for them to change nets and go out again to catch available stocks?

Mr. Carmichael: The nonsense of that situation is self-evident. It brings me to one of the specific concerns that I wish to raise on behalf of my constituents today—the operation of the haddock permit system. The Minister has heard me before on this. Probably most hon. Members have heard more from me on this than they would ever want. I hope that this is the last occasion on which I have to speak about it.

I simply do not understand how one starts with the proposition of a cod protection zone and ends up with a system that requires fishermen to obtain permits to fish outside that zone for haddock. How one dreams up a scheme like that, even with the assistance of mind-altering substances, is beyond me. It has led to severe operational hardship for fishermen in my constituency. It is bureaucratic and unworkable. We have been able to cope with it only because the system was lacking in detail when it was created in December last year and it was into 2004 that it became a working proposition. Simply to roll the system over into next year would be a disaster for the industry in the northern isles.

The problem is that every time we come up with a system that is unworkable, we force fishermen into breaching it. That should be to no one's benefit. Any management system needs to be understandable and workable. Surely we should start out with a system whereby incentives can be given, for those who are able, not to catch cod. Surely that would be a much more sensible starting point.

On the question of days at sea, I will not get into the game of guessing how many there should be, but I want to discuss the general parameters within which the Minister should operate. The number of days obviously has to be sufficient to keep ports viable; it has to be sufficient to allow boats to catch the quota and it has to take account of the extra steaming days that will be a necessity especially for boats in the northern isles, if the Minister has regard to the map that we had to work with last year, because boats are displaced from their normal grounds.

I come back to the point raised by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond). Closed areas within the current framework of the CFP will be problematic because the policy operates on a year-to-year basis and does not have the flexibility that is required to make closed areas work. It may be necessary to open and close areas from month to month if not week to week. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) spoke about the Conservatives closing some areas permanently. I would be very interested to hear exactly what areas would be closed permanently—

Mr. Salmond: Scotland.

Mr. Carmichael: That might be seen as vengeance, as Scotland nearly closed the Tory party permanently. I shall read the Conservatives' green paper with some care to see what the hon. Gentleman thinks would be achieved by such closures.

Mr. Paterson: I said that we advocate having permanent closed areas and temporary closed areas. For example, off New England, there is one central closed area on St. George's bank, which has had huge success in rebuilding the yellow flounder stock, and there is also an area that is changed throughout the season as the cod move north. That has been enormously successful and the western gulf of Maine now yields some cod as large as 100 lb. We would leave it to local councils, exactly as the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) suggested. It would not be me making the decisions, but the local councils.

Mr. Carmichael: We have had many fishermen pushed out of Orkney and Shetland, but I do not think that any of them have got as far as New England yet. I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's thinking on the issue. It is just the question of permanency that causes me some concern. I appreciate that some areas would be closed permanently and some temporarily and I do not dismiss the suggestion out of hand. I am pleased to hear that the hon. Gentleman has at last come round to the idea of greater local involvement, something that the Conservatives in government were notable for resisting.

I wish now to revisit the hardy annual of the monkfish quota. We seem at last to have reached a stage where the Commission accepts that the science was not as robust as it might have been—a euphemism almost as big as speaking of unintended consequences. I hope that we have the opportunity to get back to the 1999 level of quota for the UK. Given that it is unlikely that any further effort will take place, because of the reductions in the size of the fleet and the quota restrictions, this is a real opportunity for the viability of the fleet to be improved. I enjoin the Minister to resist any suggestion that any permit arrangements should be attached to any quota. I suggest that there will be a need to leave the area to the west outside the cod recovery zone and to open an area in the north North sea, as was done in 2003, to enable vessels to catch the improved quota.

I also ask the Minister to strive for an improved quota for haddock in areas VIa and VIb, west of Scotland and Rockall. With regard to Rockall, it is essential that the European Union—perhaps the Minister could take a lead on this—meet the Russians and agree a quota that reflects the proper level of UK interest in that fishery. Otherwise, I very much fear that we will be squeezed out in that area as we were squeezed out of deep water fisheries a few years ago.

As other hon. Members have mentioned, there is also the unfinished business of the nephrops quota, for which so much was promised and so little unfortunately delivered last year. The Minister goes to the Council with the good wishes of all of us on both sides of the House. The departure of Franz Fischler as the Commissioner presents an opportunity to improve our fisheries management and how we are dealt with. I hope that the Minister is able to seize that opportunity with both hands.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): It is an honour to follow the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael). Normally in these debates I resist the temptation to take up the full time allowed to me and I often give up one or two minutes to him, so I am pleased that he has been able to make a full contribution today. We are continuing in a good tradition, as the penultimate and ultimate speakers before the ministerial response.

The hon. Gentleman is a great champion of his fishing community. I respect him for that, as do many people in my part of the fishing community. I associate myself wholly with his closing remarks and his best wishes to the Minister.

I shall outline briefly three issues that I should like the Minister to consider in his work at the forthcoming ministerial Council, but first I want to associate myself with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) about fishermen's missions. I am sure that everyone in the House would want to pay tribute, too, to the work of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution, which is a solid part of the fishing community, many of whom belong to the RNLI and go out to help members of not only their local community but the wider maritime community. They do tremendous work on a voluntary basis.

I want to single out my hon. Friend from down the coast, the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), for his chairmanship of the all-party fisheries group, which is persuaded to do many things. Recently, we heard the Canadian Fisheries Minister and only this morning we received extremely good briefings from fishermen's organisations. Regrettably, however, we have never had the opportunity to listen to the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson), so I hope that when the Conservative party publishes its green paper—with costs, we hope—the group can have a friendly, comradely dialogue with him, to follow the good work done by my hon. Friend the Minister and, in the past, by my hon. Friend the Member for Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley), now the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment, to engage not only with us in a parliamentary sense but also with the key stakeholders who represent the community.

Over the past year, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby has had a marked effect on the all-party group and has persuaded us to do many things to promote fish and the fishing industry. I do not know whether to say that I am glad or sad that a few months ago we were invited to enter a competition to display our culinary skills as part of a wonderful week for the promotion of sea fish. Regrettably, we came last, although my hon. Friend produced a remarkable concoction as a celebration of our right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Coley à la Prescott.

Lawrie Quinn: Exactly. Unfortunately, the dish failed to attract anybody's attention.

I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister on the work that he has done for the Yorkshire and Humber region through the establishment of regional development agencies. I know that they do not find favour with the hon. Member for North Shropshire, but the RDA has undertaken some excellent work in my area to engage with the future of our Yorkshire coastal communities. If time allows, I might be able to inform the House and the Minister about that important work.

If the Minister does not know about such work, perhaps he will undertake a review of the work that RDAs are doing on the coast of England to promote partnership and opportunities for fishing communities in terms of investment and improvements in training and marketing. That relates to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster), who told us of the £4.5 million investment in a new fish quay in his constituency. Such work is taking place slowly but surely around England to bring investment for important parts of the fishing community. For example, in respect of shellfish, in Whitby in my constituency, we were able to go ahead with marketing the velvet crab. Mortality rates for the species are better and it is now a viable product, with a new market in that important part of the fishing community.

My hon. Friend the Minister will be well aware that, in July, the EU was able to propose a new European fisheries fund, the EFF, which from 2007 will replace the current financial instrument for fisheries guidance, which runs until the end of 2006. I understand that the proposal will go before the Council of Ministers, which must adopt it for it to come into effect, following consultation with the European Parliament. I assume that that measure must be considered by the House, given the national parliamentary obligations. I hope that that will be the springboard by which the Minister, along with my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, might consider formulating a debate that would allow all hon. Members a better attempt at scrutinising the decisions made at that European Council.

It is my belief that the parliamentary scrutiny format represents a far better way for the representatives of fisheries communities from around the coast to achieve closer scrutiny. I am glad that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) also remembered an occasion that may have been the first outing—if that is not the wrong term to use—for the Fisheries Minister in the context of our debate. I hope that the Minister will consider bringing the outcomes for the EFF to the relevant Committee so that we can all engage in the debate and consider in detail the wider consequences of the work that he will do in Brussels in the very near future.

I should like to return to a subject that is almost a tradition in such debates, and I am somewhat surprised that it does not seem to have had the type of airing that we would normally hear in the annual fisheries debate. I refer, of course, to industrial fisheries. As all hon. Members will know, the simple fact is that the Danish fleet dominates the sand eel fishery. I understand that, because of the poor state of the stock in 2003–04, the Danish fleet massively undershot its quota for this year and last year. In 2004, Denmark's quota for the North sea was 727,472 tonnes out of a TAC for EU member states, Norway and the Faroes of just over 800,000 tonnes—a massive slice of the allowed quota. I understand that Denmark was able to catch only about 300,000 tonnes of that 700,000-plus tonne quota. Surely, given the debate that my hon. Friend will endeavour to have with his colleagues at the ministerial Council meeting, now is the time for us to deal with that issue and to ensure that the Danish quota is managed to an appropriate amount.

Mr. Carmichael: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the subject of industrial fishing—something that is having an impact on more than fish stocks. The seabird stocks around Shetland have been decimated this year, and there is no doubt in my mind at all that the blame lies at the door of the industrial fishery.

Lawrie Quinn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that contribution. Once again, he illustrates his knowledge of these issues. The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan referred to the fact that the marine environment is complex. I was coming to that issue, which links with the points made by the Minister in his opening remarks and, indeed, by my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye about the importance of tourism and other aspects of seaside life to the wider economy.

Just down the coast from Scarborough and Whitby, there is an excellent puffin colony at Bempton cliffs. If we have a third season at Bempton that is as bad as the last two, the breeding productivity of kittiwakes will prompt strong demands, not only from naturalists and environmentalists, but from the fishing communities, for a closure, probably from somewhere off the east coast of Scotland down to Northumberland. It is a serious problem, which has an impact on the complicated marine environment and ecology.

Mr. Paterson: An interesting Royal Society for the Protection of Birds study was recently published on the impact of such activity on sea bird populations. In addition, we need to recall that sand eels are a key food source for cod. Without getting too excited about our upcoming green paper, we will advocate drastic reductions in the practice of industrial fishing, even if not its elimination.

Lawrie Quinn: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for confirming that the Conservatives are seeing good sense on some issues.

In the short term, however, I want to take the opportunity to wish my hon. Friend the Minister well from all fishing communities in Yorkshire and Humber. He has an important job to do. I am sure that he goes to the Council with the support of Labour Members and the bulk of the support of hon. Members in the Chamber.

6.6 pm

Mr. Bradshaw: With the leave of the House, I shall respond to the debate.

One or two hon. Members asked whether it would be possible to meet me between the publication of the formal advice from the Commission next week and the Fisheries Council. I am happy to do that. Perhaps we will make informal arrangements, either after the debate or in ensuing days, to discuss the issues that they want to raise.

I am glad that the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) is beginning to flesh out the Opposition's policy on fisheries. The Conservative party's green paper on fisheries will be one of its most hotly awaited policy documents for a long time. I look forward to seeing it.

I do not want to dwell any longer than is necessary on the central plank of the Opposition's policy of withdrawal from the common fisheries policy, but I noted the recent comments by a former Conservative party chairman, Chris Patten, who in October said:

"If you decide to repatriate fish policy, are you going to depend on our fish being taught to swim only in our territorial waters? Is this the real world?"

I also noted an excellent article, which I commend to all hon. Members who have an interest in fisheries, by the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), who, as I am sure hon. Members will remember, was the Fisheries Minister for four years under the previous Conservative Government. He speaks with great authority on the subject and recently wrote in the Yorkshire Post that he believes that the Tory policy is "unwise and undeliverable." He went on to address, as the hon. Member for North Shropshire did not, some of the concerns raised by the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) and others about the possible cost of unilateral withdrawal. He asked the intriguing question of how much of the Royal Navy we are "willing to deploy fighting a fisheries protection war against our European NATO allies".

Those are good, important and interesting questions, which I am sure the hon. Member for North Shropshire will address in his much anticipated green paper.

The hon. Gentleman raised a detailed problem, which he has mentioned to me before, about the situation in Fleetwood. My hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, North and Fleetwood (Mrs. Humble) very much wanted to participate in the debate. It is the first time she has missed a fisheries debate, but she is hosting a Select Committee visit to her constituency today. She passed her concerns on to me.

There has been some misunderstanding. There is always a problem in finding technical solutions to mixed fisheries. The vessel cited in The Daily Telegraph article and by the hon. Member for North Shropshire has, of 16 November, used 128 days this year, which is well within the 17 days a month allowed for vessels that use meshes of more than 100 mm. There is no reason why that vessel should not use 110 mm mesh rather than the 80 mm that it used when he was with it.

The other aspect of the hon. Gentleman's contribution—I also look forward to reading about this in more detail—is that he is moving towards an effort control system as the best way of managing our fisheries, which is the Faroese system rather than the Icelandic system. I am particularly interested to know how a complete effort control system would work in the North sea, for example, and what impact it would have. I am sure that he and other Members realise that if we adopted the Faroese system in the North sea, it would mean a dramatic cut in effort and have pretty catastrophic impacts on fishing industries and boats in the constituencies of most of the Members present.

As usual, my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) spoke with great authority and experience on this issue. I know that we disagree on some aspects of it, but I was pleased to hear that he described the publication of the Prime Minister's strategy unit report as a turning point. That is right; it shows a real commitment from the highest level to the future of the fishing industry.

While my hon. Friend was speaking, I could not help thinking that, a few years back—I think at a Labour party conference—he changed his name by deed poll to Mr. Haddock. It is about since that date that we have seen a miraculous recovery in the haddock stocks. Perhaps I might suggest that he considers changing his name at the next Labour party conference to Mr. Cod. We will see what happens to the cod stocks. However, I take the points that he made seriously.

My hon. Friend and a number of other Members were slightly unfair about Franz Fischler as a commissioner. He had a certain robust style, but it is not an easy business to chair an annual Fisheries Council meeting. His heart was certainly in the right place on the need for reform. He saw through reforms of the common fisheries policy against pretty fierce resistance from some member states. He shared our vision of a sustainable and profitable fisheries policy for the future. The new commissioner will have a different style, and we will work closely with him and, I hope, to the benefit of the UK industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby asked whether we could relax this year. Compared with some of the very difficult Councils that we have had in recent years, the background to this one is a little easier. I do not think that we can open the floodgates at this stage, but, as I said in my opening remarks, I think that we will be able to make progress on some stocks and that the fishing industry will welcome that. Although there are signs of cod recovery, it is from a very low base. However, I am determined to do what I can in those areas where the science justifies our taking action. I take on board my hon. Friend's concerns about the proposals for a cod protected area, the details of which I have not yet seen. The issue was also raised by several other Members.

My hon. Friend requested greater certainty for the industry. We are trying to move towards that with the multi-annual approach that was adopted in the reform of the common fisheries policy. We certainly want to embed that, and it will be one of our priorities when we take over the presidency of the EU in the second half of next year.

As usual, the hon. Member for St. Ives spoke with great authority, representing, as he does, Cornwall, which is one of the main fishing areas in England. He expressed frustration with the annual timetable of the whole process, and I share that frustration. I discussed the issue with Commissioner Borg at our meeting, and I think that it is a frustration he shares. If parties here and the industry would like to push for changes to the timetable, I think that we are pushing at an open door with the new commissioner. I shall certainly take that issue on board.

I acknowledge that we disagree with some of the recommendations that we expect to be made by the Commission. They include the recommendations on western channel sole. The hon. Gentleman is right to suggest that the United Kingdom has been working very closely not just at official level but through representatives of the industry to come up with an alternative plan for western channel sole. We hope to make further progress on regional advisory councils during our EU presidency and will continue to push for that.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Bradley report. There has been a certain amount of misreporting and Chinese whispers in what I may or may not have said about how we intend to implement the recommendations in the Bradley report. I reassure the hon. Gentleman that we have not made any decisions yet. I recognise the important work that sea fisheries committees do, and everyone agrees that we need to modernise the way in which we manage and enforce our inland fisheries. Whatever system we adopt, I want to try to retain the local expertise and democratic accountability that the sea fisheries committees bring with them.

The hon. Gentleman should not be too disappointed that a marine Bill was not in the Queen's Speech. There was never any realistic prospect that it would be in this Queen's Speech, but the fact that the Prime Minister is explicitly committed to a Bill as soon as the legislative programme allows is a good sign. I and my colleagues in DEFRA will work to make sure that it happens as quickly as possible.

The hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) has apologised for the fact that he cannot be here because he has to take a plane back to his constituency, but he made a number of points that I promise to take up and bear in mind. He gave me some good advice about negotiating tactics that might benefit his fishermen in Northern Ireland. He made an interesting point about climate change, as did others, and the role that it might play in changing the habits of fish stocks.

There is certainly evidence that, with global warming and changing sea temperatures, stocks are moving around. Stocks that were formerly further south in UK waters are moving up, and cod seems to be moving north. However, we must be careful about using climate change as an excuse to avoid addressing the problem of over-fishing. We must take all the factors that affect fish stocks into account if we are to have a successful and sustainable fisheries policy.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond), as this is the first time that we have faced each other in the Chamber since he resumed the leadership of his party. I shall, of course, keep him informed. In fact, for the first time this year, we have allocated a senior DEFRA official to keep the fishermen informed during the Council. It is difficult for me as the Minister to do so or, indeed, for Mr. Finnie, because we are trapped in the building. We never know when the commissioner is going to burst into the room and ask for a bilateral, or when a Minister representing another country will want to hold one. We cannot leave the building, and the fishermen cannot come to see us, but we shall certainly keep in as close contact as possible. Personally, I intend to meet industry representatives during the Council if possible.

It was slightly unfair of the hon. Gentleman to say that Governments have not given priority to the fishing industry. I hope that he acknowledges that the strategy unit report was a major sign that the Prime Minister was worried about what was happening two years ago at the Council, and wanted to get to grips with the problem for the medium and long-term future. I agree that there is a case for fighting for an increased TAC on prawns, and I agree with the hon. Gentleman about haddock. On monkfish, he will probably be aware that a joint industry-science project has helped to secure improved data, and we will argue for a substantial increase in the Council negotiations in December.

Mr. Salmond: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am terribly sorry. I have four minutes left, and if I do not rattle on I will not be able to respond to all the comments made by hon. Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) made a good point about long-lining, which I shall certainly take on board, as there is enormous potential for a more sustainable fishery. I shall also look into his comments about CEFAS, which does a terrific job. Talks to try to resolve the problems that he raised are imminent, and I shall shortly meet the new director of CEFAS, when I shall certainly reiterate the points that he made. The hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. Reid) made some good points about the cost of leaving the CFP, and I agree with him about west of Scotland prawns. The issue has been raised with me a number of times by my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. MacDonald), and we certainly intend to pursue it as a priority in the Council negotiations. I also accept the point made by the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute about annexe V and the difficulties that it has caused his fishermen.

I consulted the Shetland fisheries representative, Hansen Black, at the Council meeting in Brussels last month. I accept what the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) said about haddock permit problems, and am pleased that he welcomes the progress on regional advisory councils. As I have said, we will make further progress on that. I made clear to the new Commissioner the importance of listening to the RACs, as it would be politically fatal not to do so just as they are becoming established. I believe that that is a good argument to use in the negotiations.

I accept the point about the new funding system made by my hon. Friend the Member for Scarborough and Whitby (Lawrie Quinn). I am always keen to have debates on fisheries, but the decision is not just up to me; other people, such as business managers, are involved. My hon. Friend is right about industrial fisheries, and he will be pleased that, given their condition, there are likely to be recommendations for severe cuts. It has always been the UK position to support such a proposal.

Finally, my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster) said that I had brought him some pre-Christmas cheer. It is always good to be able to do so, but I do not think that I have ever been described as a fishermen's friend before. However, I will accept compliments wherever they come from. I am rather disappointed that he did not invite me to open his new quay, but perhaps there is still time. As for what he may want in his Christmas stocking next year, I understand that my officials are talking to his fishermen tomorrow about that very issue.

Mr. Tom Watson (West Bromwich, East) (Lab): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

WESTMINSTER HALL

Ordered,

That, on Tuesday 21st December, there shall be no sitting in Westminster Hall.—[Mr. Watson.]

ADJOURNMENT (CHRISTMAS)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 25, (Periodic adjournments),

That this House, at its rising on Tuesday 21st December, do adjourn till Monday 10th January 2005.—[Mr. Watson.]

Question agreed to.

Health Services (Maidstone)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

6.20 pm

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone and The Weald) (Con): I am grateful for securing the Adjournment debate tonight. It concerns a matter of vital importance to my constituents. I am delighted to see in the Chamber my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Hugh Robertson), whose constituents will also be profoundly adversely affected by the proposed changes to hospital services in Maidstone.

Let me set the scene. Maidstone is a large general hospital that was built under the Conservative Administration in 1983. It was modern and covered a wide range of services. Since that time, the oncology services have been vastly expanded and the hospital is now recognised as a centre of excellence for oncology in the south-east. Until a few years ago, the picture was a fairly happy one, but since 2000 there has been a consistent stream of proposals to—I can put it in no other terms—plunder Maidstone.

Over the past two years, we have been raided. We have already lost, in a fairly stealthy way, almost without anybody noticing, our chronic pain unit, which has charged down the road to Pembury. That leaves citizens of Maidstone, who were used to having pain services available, with pain services available only by means of a four-hour round trip on the No. 6 bus. It is scarcely an ideal situation for people without private transport.

Earlier this year, a proposal that had been made in 2000 and rejected was raised again. It would mean our losing the most important chunk of our accident and emergency services to Tunbridge Wells. In addition, there is a proposal that we would lose a major part of our obstetrics services, again to Tunbridge Wells.

The Government decided to merge trusts. It is impossible to imagine that when Maidstone was its own trust, it would have volunteered to lose services and suggested that they wander off 17 miles away—that is the shortest possible distance. But because the trusts of Tunbridge Wells and Maidstone have been merged into one large trust, there is no unique voice, other than mine and that of my hon. Friend, speaking up specifically for Maidstone.

If there were unavoidable strategic reasons for the changes, I might admit that there was some force to the argument for bringing them about, but close examination suggests that that is not the case. One of the reasons why that has been advanced is that the changes all stem from the European working time directive, which means that junior doctors cannot work the hours that they used to. We therefore have to recruit more junior doctors, and when that proves impossible, we have to merge services, so that where there were two services before, we shall have only one.

We have also been told that the consultants involved approve the changes. I shall quote from a letter from Mr. Christopher Walker, a consultant orthopaedic surgeon who worked at Maidstone hospital from its opening in 1983 until August 2002, and still does occasional clinical work. He says this of the proposal to take trauma services to Tunbridge Wells:

"Most importantly, the road access to the Kent and Sussex Hospital is poor when compared to that of the Maidstone Hospital. Maidstone is well placed to receive trauma rapidly having both good access to the motorways and a helipad. Indeed, in my time at Maidstone I received a badly injured motorcyclist who had been involved in a road traffic accident about one mile from the Kent and Sussex Hospital, as it was quicker to transfer him to Maidstone A&E . . . than to get a traditional road ambulance to take him at peak time to the Kent and Sussex A&E."

He goes on to say:

"If Trauma Services are moved to Tunbridge Wells, Maidstone patients will need to access another A&E. The Kent and Sussex would be very difficult for them to reach."

He says that they would be more likely to go to the Medway accident and emergency department, which is already under massive pressure.

Mr. Walker identifies as a further effect of the proposed move

"a downsizing of emergency services in general and a move of staff and facilities from Maidstone to Tunbridge Wells."

He says:

"Trauma Services cannot be managed successfully by Orthopaedic & Trauma Surgeons in isolation. Support is essential from other specialities especially General Surgery, Vascular Surgery, Anaesthetics, General Medicine and Paediatrics. Presumably adequate support could only be given by transferring support in these specialities from Maidstone to Tunbridge Wells."

As a consultant surgeon, he takes the following view:

"I believe this would have the effect of reducing Maidstone A&E to a minor injuries unit, as well as reducing the Consultant and Junior Staff numbers at Maidstone, so further disadvantaging the local population."

Mr. Walker is not alone in taking that view. Another consultant—this time a consultant physician currently practising at Maidstone hospital, where he is also a clinical tutor—contends that the proposals will have a serious effect not only on trauma services, but on training. He makes this point:

"The Acute Services Review of 2000 concluded that trauma services should remain at both Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells. It is the proposal to change this conclusion at this stage that has caused considerable disquiet."

He says that

"the proposal to downgrade the trauma service . . . will impair access to appropriate care for patients from the Maidstone area who sustain a fracture; and . . . it will adversely affect Maidstone hospital as a general hospital and training institution . . . Removing trauma services from Maidstone matters for the hospital as a whole principally because it will reduce the capability of the A&E department."

He goes on to say:

"The Senior House Officer posts in A&E are accredited for training by the Royal College of Surgeons. It is uncertain if that accreditation would remain . . . if no major trauma came to the department . . . A hospital unable to offer the full range of experience will have difficulty in recruiting the best trainees, particularly those whose career plans might include surgery or critical care."

He adds:

"A hospital lacking a full A&E department would struggle to be taken seriously as an acute general hospital".

I fully understand that point, even from a layman's point of view; the hospital would not be taken seriously as an acute general hospital, and it would find it very difficult to recruit and retain consultants in acute specialities, particularly general medicine and critical care.

Perceptively, that consultant goes on to say:

"The real problem with the current discussion is that it puts the cart before the horse. We are discussing individual services without any clear vision for the future of the hospital as a whole. There is a clear vision for cancer services in Maidstone, and there is a comprehensive vision for the new hospital in Pembury"—

for which I am grateful—

"but for non-cancer general hospital services in Maidstone, however"— he puts this politely—

"the future is more opaque."

The future of Maidstone general hospital is a major question. Will it remain as a serious general hospital or will all its major general facilities be moved gradually and piecemeal to Tunbridge Wells, while Maidstone is promoted as Kent's answer to the Royal Marsden hospital? Is that the future that is envisaged? If it is, why do the Government, the trust and the SHA not come clean and let us know? It would cause my constituents massive disquiet.

For maternity services, consultants have stated that the European working time directive is not causing problems in obstetrics, but that difficulties will be created in recruiting serious consultants and doctors to a unit as small as the one proposed for Maidstone. Confronted with that massive reduction, the general expectation is that mothers will choose other hospitals. At the moment, 25 per cent. of mothers transfer from the birthing centre to the labour ward with difficulties. If the labour ward is 17 miles away, consultants claim that brain damage could be caused to babies.

I have also mentioned the loss, which we have already sustained—almost without anybody noticing—of the chronic pain unit. It was moved in September 2004 from Maidstone to Pembury. The first that the patients knew about it was a letter a couple of months earlier. Openness appears to have given way to at best opacity, and at worst secrecy. What is the future, and what is the vision for Maidstone as a general hospital?

Earlier, I said that it had been claimed that the consultants accepted the necessity for that disquieting decision. In fact, however, 50 senior clinicians have signed a letter to Rose Gibb, the chief executive of the trust. This is not a politician speaking; these are clinicians who say:

"We believe the proposed cuts at the Maidstone hospital to be dangerous, ill-advised and unnecessary. They will place acutely ill patients, particularly the elderly and children, at additional risk of morbidity and death by transferring them to an inaccessible and less suitable site. The loss of this acute service will result in the inevitable haemorrhage of essential skilled staff. We feel the knock-on effect on the remaining acute services will lead to their progressive erosion, reducing Maidstone to an elective hospital only."

Among the consultants who signed that statement are those in general surgery, anaesthetics and critical care, cardiology, medicine, neurology, ophthalmics, oncology, paediatrics and, of course, obstetrics and gynaecology. That is the view of those on the ground who actually have to deliver the service.

When I fully recognised the problems and their scale, I wrote to the Secretary of State for Health, who replied promptly but unhelpfully. Essentially, he told me what

[Miss Ann Widdecombe]

I already knew—that there was a consultation exercise. Yes, I had got that far. He then told me that there were proposals to reconfigure services—I had certainly got that far—and that it was a matter for the trust. This goes beyond just being a matter for the trust. There is, I believe, a serious crisis of confidence in Maidstone about the future of a large and well-respected general hospital.

On behalf of my constituents who live at the other end of the constituency, I am of course delighted that at last, after too many years, we are getting a brand-new hospital. I would not want any of the comments that I have made today to be taken to mean otherwise. However, the original plan was that essential services such as trauma and obstetrics should be available in both centres, not that there would be a share-out of some sort, as of eggs in a basket.

My first question for the Minister—who has, I am sure, been in contact with the trust—is this: what is the future for Maidstone? Will it remain a general hospital? If so, will it be taken seriously as a general hospital, given the changes that are mooted? Or will it simply become an elective surgery and cancer specialty? Secondly, as so many consultants are so worried, how can the administrators of the trust decide that this is the right way forward?

Thirdly, may we have an absolute undertaking that, if services such as the chronic pain unit are to be moved in future, there will be a proper and full consultation? Interestingly, when one of my constituents rang the local press, the people there did not know anything about that particular move—but they certainly know about the trauma services, and they are making a fuss.

Although in such circumstances there is always a fine line to be walked, between alerting one's constituents and alarming them, I myself have become alarmed by the proposals. I believe that they should be abandoned, and that the original decision taken in 2000 to retain services in both hospitals should be maintained.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Maidstone and the Weald (Miss Widdecombe) on securing this debate on the proposed transfer of services from Maidstone hospital to Tunbridge Wells. Before I turn to the specific issues that she raised, I should like to take this opportunity to recognise the work across the whole of Kent in delivering good-quality services and to pay tribute to all the staff who are dedicated to that process. I am sure that she would join me in that.

All Members rightly attach the highest importance to developments in the NHS in their constituencies. It is important that local people are able to have local access to high-quality health services for users of orthopaedic and maternity services, as well as several other services that the right hon. Lady mentioned. As she knows, our policy is one of devolution to give local communities a real opportunity to plan and to develop health services according to their needs and demands. We have backed that up with significant additional funding. Over 2003–04 to 2007–08, expenditure on the NHS in England will increase on average by more than 7 per cent. a year over and above inflation—an increase of £34 billion.

The majority of that funding has been made direct to primary care trusts. In that way, we are putting resources in the hands of front-line NHS staff alongside their responsibilities for developing and running services. In the right hon. Lady's constituency, Maidstone Weald PCT will receive an increase in its revenue allocation of £36.4 million between 2003–04 and 2005–6. That represents a cash increase of 28.7 per cent.

The right hon. Lady raised several concerns, some of which touched on the proposed transfer of women's and children's services from Maidstone to Tunbridge Wells. I stress that those remain proposals and that no firm decision has been made.

The right hon. Lady concentrated most of her remarks on the trauma services and linked orthopaedic services. I can give her assurances on some of the matters on which she seeks them. I understand that she is a local Member concerned about what is happening in her patch. She graphically expressed her anxiety about the matter, and I understand that, but she need not worry about a unique voice, because many of us would say that she is a unique voice. I am sure that she is a unique voice on behalf of her constituency.

The joint Maidstone and Tunbridge trust has stressed throughout the discussions that the area and the people that it serves will always need two acute district hospitals. I emphasise the word "acute" because the right hon. Lady is worried that one will become totally elective. That is not the trust's intention: there will be one hospital in Maidstone and another in Tunbridge Wells, and they will work together in a complementary way. I understand that that can sometimes cause anxieties, and I am familiar with the situation from elsewhere, not least my constituency.

Miss Widdecombe: I accept that there will continue to be an accident and emergency unit at Maidstone, but the consultants' point is that it will be greatly reduced. All the orthopaedic trauma will go to Tunbridge Wells and the consultants point out that that cannot be done in isolation. Others will follow, and in the end, the unit will be so small that it will not deserve to be considered in the same way as a big general acute unit.

Miss Johnson: I appreciate the right hon. Lady's view, but both hospitals will continue to provide the bulk of acute surgical, medical, emergency and life-saving care for patients and each will need accident and emergency departments capable of dealing with minor and major illnesses and injuries. I am told that the strategic health authority has categorically stated that Maidstone hospital's accident and emergency department is not closing down or being run down.

I appreciate that issues such as training hospital consultants and doctors, and accreditation by the royal colleges need to be sorted out. That needs to be done locally to ensure that the mix of cases that goes to both hospitals is capable of sustaining the right accreditation by the royal colleges—for example, for accident and emergency accreditation purposes. I understand that the chief executive has met the majority of the consultants individually or collectively.

We do not deny that some concerns have been expressed. They have centred around the misconception that all the surgical services would be transferred to the Kent and Sussex hospital. Some consultants were also worried that there might be pressure on them to express certain views. Notwithstanding that, some have genuine concerns about the future. We accept that concerns have been expressed, but I assure the right hon. Lady that the strategic health authority is committed to two full accident and emergency departments in the two district general hospitals and sustaining the mix of services.

The right hon. Lady mentioned the transfer of the chronic pain clinic. I am not familiar with as much of the detail as I suspect she is. I understand that some £600,000 of additional resources have gone into the clinic at Pembury hospital, to which it is to be transferred. Extra investment has gone into that pain unit, and I am sure that that creates an improved service. We accept that we need two accident and emergency units and two district hospitals. The question is about the division of some of those areas of specialty, which can be provided principally in one or another of the hospitals.

In the past few years, Maidstone hospital has had major investment in its eye, ear and mouth unit. There has been some £11.9 million of investment. The hospital has received £2.8 million for a new breast care centre; £2.2 million for a new emergency care centre; and £1.7 million for the orthopaedic unit. In Tunbridge Wells, the Pembury hospital and the Kent and Sussex hospital have received £3.5 million investment in more doctors; the chronic pain unit that I mentioned; some refurbishment of the maternity unit; and £1.15 million for a new MRI scanner. That shows that there has been a division of resources between the two sites.

The right hon. Lady talked about the pressure on junior doctor hours as a result of the working time directive, but there is a wider rationale. That rationale includes the following considerations: to improve the quality of services for patients; to reduce the number of cancelled operations, as currently one in five elective procedures are cancelled in Maidstone and Tunbridge Wells, which the trust and the strategic health authority are looking to improve on; to reduce the risk of infection by segregating all orthopaedic patients from surgical patients, which is highly important; and the development of on-call rotas that offer consistency of care. Among all the other factors are the fulfilment of the requirement to meet junior doctors' working hours under the European working time directive, and gaining efficiencies of full day-care elective theatre lists to reduce waiting times for patients. The provision of centres of excellence for patients that offer and are able to meet national standards of care and to attract highly skilled staff is also important. Making the best use of the consultant work force, with sub-specialisation, is also a factor.

The benefits for patients that the trust and strategic health authority are looking for are: ensuring that booked operations are not cancelled; reducing waiting time for operations; reducing the risk of infection following surgery; delivering rapid assessment, out-patient, diagnostic and day-case services at both hospitals; and ensuring that professional standards are consistently met. That shows that a rationale exists that makes clear the reasons for this discussion.

Currently, we have only a proposal before us, and I realise that, sadly, the right hon. Lady did not appreciate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's letter. I gathered that. He was being very fair in what he wrote to her, however, as he was pointing out that this matter was still up for discussion, and that the details need to be thrashed out. I understand that such discussions raise a lot of local anxieties, and I sympathise with local MPs and local people concerned about them. I have set out a number of powerful and important reasons why it is necessary to examine these issues, including the benefits that can be gained for patients from improvement of patient care.

I want to touch briefly on maternity services, because I want to assure the right hon. Lady that we are committed to good-quality, women-centred maternity care. We have a commitment to improving maternity services by modernising maternity units, increasing the number of midwives and giving women greater choice in childbirth. There have been huge advances. It is now much safer to give birth, and women are now actively involved in making decisions about the maternity care that they want to receive. As I am sure she is aware, we published a national service framework on 15 September, and under the standard, NHS maternity care providers and primary care trusts are required to ensure that the range of antenatal, birth and post-birth care services available constitutes a real local choice for women, including home births and midwife-led care, and midwife-led units in the community or on a hospital site.

Additional funding has been made available for refurbishments, including of hospitals in Kent, to improve the environment. I hope that the right hon. Lady will agree that we all recognise that hospital services need to change if we are to continue to fulfil patients' needs and improve access. Services cannot remain static. They must be responsive to local needs and changing patterns, higher standards and the different services that can be provided as modern medicine advances. That is what we are seeking to achieve through the changes that are being implemented.

The matter in hand is still a discussion on a proposal, and I trust that the right hon. Lady will be able—

Miss Widdecombe: Very quickly, does the Minister therefore envisage a possibility that these things will not happen?

Miss Johnson: I cannot envisage anything. I was blessed with neither a cup of tea leaves nor a crystal ball. The dialogue must continue, however, so that all the parties are reassured about what the outcomes are. There cannot be a huge difference—

Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Music (Young People)

1. John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the Government's strategy for promoting music among young people. [201757]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): On 6 July this year, along with my hon. Friend the Minister for School Standards, I launched the music manifesto, which sets out our shared aims for music education for the next three to five years.

Over 150 music organisations have become signatories to the manifesto, including Youth Music, a national charity set up in 1999 with £10 million per year of national lottery funding, and the Sage, the landmark music centre in Gateshead, which is due to open before Christmas.

John Robertson: I know that my right hon. Friend is aware that various other organisations try to help with the music manifesto—for example, the "Respect the Value of Music" campaign recently launched by British Music Rights. Does she agree that we should be educating young people about the value of the creativity involved in making music? What steps will the Department take to support campaigns such as "Respect the Value of Music", which are so important for ensuring that the creators of music can make a living in the years to come?

Estelle Morris: I congratulate British Music Rights on the part that it played in the music manifesto, and my hon. Friend on the contribution that the all-party music group has made in both Houses of Parliament to heighten the importance of music and give everybody some fairly good nights out into the bargain. Music in the United Kingdom is strong. There are many music venues and a feeling that music has never been as good as it is now, but there is one threat on the horizon. We must make sure that everybody uses and accesses music in a way that protects the copyright of those who write it. Especially now, with young people having access to music online at no charge if they choose to take it, it is important that we run an education programme. I join my hon. Friend in congratulating British Music Rights on its music education programme. From what I have seen of it, it is very good and I wish it well as it is introduced.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Does the Minister agree that in order to turn that verbal aspiration into reality, it is necessary to provide a time scale for achieving it? She mentioned three to five years. Even five years would be a good aim. Will she take on board a further point? Quite often, all it needs to encourage more primary school children to take up a musical instrument is for schools to copy the practice of the best schools. If they can do that, they are well on their way to achieving a commendable objective.

Estelle Morris: I have no problem with what the hon. Gentleman says. We hope to make real progress in three to five years. It is important that we monitor what works. His comment about learning which school is doing something well and spreading it to other schools is well made. He will know that there are a number of initiatives spread throughout the country, none of which are universal in themselves, but all of which are trying different ways of engaging young people with music—for example, through the activities of the Music Standards fund, the Arts Council music fund, Youth Music and organisations such as Creative Partnerships. In three to five years we should know which of those initiatives have been most successful at engaging young people with music, and making sure that they are properly funded at that point so that they can be rolled out nationally.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): In my constituency, I have many young people who excel at classical music, pop and jazz, both vocal and instrumental. How is the Department encouraging businesses to financially support the development of those young people? What is the Department doing to make sure that those businesses feel included in such partnerships?

Estelle Morris: The role of business is important. We will never get to a situation, nor should we, where the arts receive funding only from the Government, centrally and locally. It is important that all sections of society contribute to something so central to our lives. With my hon. Friend, I recognise the contribution that business has made in constituencies outside London and in London. As regards the Department's involvement, through the Arts Council, we fund Arts and Business, which has the express task of making sure that businesses offer as much to arts and music as they can. If my hon. Friend wants to know more about that, she should look at the details of what Arts and Business has achieved, and she will see that it is a steadily growing amount. I take the opportunity to thank Arts and Business for its business sponsorship, and all businesses for the money that they put into the arts.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): This summer, the Minister launched the music manifesto and announced the appointment of a music champion. One of the manifesto's aims was to "provide every young person with first access to a range of music experiences".

That is a laudable aim, though a rather vague one. Just over 6 per cent. of pupils take up an instrument at key stage 2. The manifesto commits no extra resources to addressing that fundamental problem. Surely the best place to promote music among young people is in schools, where it should have dedicated timetabling and be properly funded by the Department for Education and Skills, rather than being left to a music champion who works only part time and the odd headline-grabbing initiative from the Department for Culture, Media and Sport.

Estelle Morris: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his appointment to the Front Bench. I hope that he stays there longer than his predecessor.

I am not sure why the aim of ensuring that every child has the opportunity to play a musical instrument is vague. I should have thought that it was among the most concrete of the Government's objectives and that we knew exactly what it means. Much progress has been made. Over the past three years, in conjunction with the Department for Education and Skills, we have put extra money into schools enabling us to run pilots. If the hon. Gentleman is interested, the results of the pilots, which were run by Youth Music, were published earlier this year. My colleagues in the Department for Education and Skills have now announced that local authorities will have dedicated money to ensure that they can carry through the best results of the music partnerships.

That is real progress that has been properly funded; it is doing something that was not funded before and making a real difference to children's lives. I remind the hon. Gentleman why it might take longer than he wants to make universal provision. In 18 long years of Tory government, music services in schools in all counties were run down. We started from scratch, and we have a record to be proud of.

ITV Regional Companies

2. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If she will make a statement on the provision by independent television companies of regional news. [201758]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I recognise the level of interest in this issue from all parts of the House.

The Government are committed to strong regional public service broadcasting, including regional news. The Communications Act 2003 requires Ofcom, the regulator, to determine appropriate levels of regional programming, including news, for ITV1. I note that the second phase of Ofcom's public service broadcasting television review, on which it has just consulted, proposes to maintain the level of ITV regional news obligations at five and a half hours a week.

Miss McIntosh: I thank the right hon. Lady for that answer, but may I ask what guarantee there is beyond the election that there will be that level of local and regional coverage from excellent companies such as Yorkshire Television and Tyne Tees Television? What role will the new body, the public service publisher, have in the digital age? Could it lead to job losses in such companies within ITV?

Tessa Jowell: The answer to the hon. Lady's first question is that the requirements on news will be written into ITV licences. It will be an obligation that they will have to meet. On her second question about the public service publisher, Ofcom has raised the proposal in its second public service television review. The Government think that the proposal is interesting, and it makes a strong case for maintaining the current value of public service broadcasting, but we have not yet determined a decision on it. There will obviously be a further period of consultation once Ofcom's proposals become clearer.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): While I welcome the slight withdrawal by Ofcom of its original proposals, does my right hon. Friend accept that the principal concern for those of us who represent the civilised part of the country, which is mostly outside London and basically in the north, is that there should be no reduction in either local service or local news? To reduce those services would be damaging to the regional roots of the companies that produce them and also allow the cut-down of regional newsrooms and regional staff at a time when they need to be expanded to face the enhanced competition that the BBC is giving in regional coverage.

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. He is absolutely right about the importance of maintaining support for local and regional news. That is why I welcome very warmly the Ofcom recommendation in this area. It is also worth noting that the Ofcom report was based on extensive consultation with the public. It was the public—the people who were interviewed—who gave regional television news a ringing endorsement.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State is properly linking regional programming with regional news and recognising the importance of both, but when the Leader of the House said 10 days ago that the proposed regional programming cuts by ITV Wales were unacceptable, was he speaking personally or on behalf of the Government?

Tessa Jowell: I suspect that the Leader of the House was, like many hon. Members, reflecting constituency concern about that issue. It is important to make the position absolutely clear: Ofcom has no proposals that ITV should cut regional news; there are proposals to cut the current requirement for three hours a week of non-peak, non-news programming to one and a half hours in order to meet the licence conditions. That is not a requirement, but it would lessen the regulatory burden on ITV.

In reaching a conclusion on the matter, I say to hon. Members that ITV faces increasing competition with the increased take-up of digital television. It is losing audience share, and with that it is losing the advertising revenue that a high level of audience share brings. It is an inescapable fact that ITV cannot continue to broadcast at its current level of operation. The Ofcom analysis is important because it rests on the views of viewers—the people who watch television—rather than on any other interest. That context has shaped the conclusions, which are currently out for consultation.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): When the digital replacement licences were granted to ITV companies, the ITV companies were required to provide regional news and current affairs until 2014, but Ofcom now states that that will be required only until 2007. Will the Secretary of State make it clear to the regulator that we expect it to do its job in maintaining the commitments of the licence until at least 2014?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend will recognise that the negotiation of the licences with ITV continues. However, the message to both Ofcom and ITV is that hon. Members on both sides of the House on behalf of their constituents recognise and insist on the importance of high-quality regional news and current affairs and factual programming.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): Is it not the case that Ofcom has already failed and that the quality of news broadcasting in the regions has diminished over the past few years? Will my right hon. Friend make sure that Ofcom fulfils its responsibilities and makes sure that both the hours of news and the quality of news are maintained?

Tessa Jowell: I agree that that is an extremely important part of Ofcom doing its job properly.

Swimming Pools

3. Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): What plans he has to increase the number of 50 m swimming pools. [201759]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): There are currently 20 50 m swimming pools in England. Sport England lottery funding bids have been submitted to build four additional 50 m pools in Sunderland, Leeds, Liverpool and Portsmouth. Sport England is also working with the Greater London authority, the London Development Agency and the London 2012 Olympic bid on a new aquatics centre in Stratford, which will include at least one 50 m pool. If the 2012 bid is successful next year, the facility will be increased to two 50 m pools.

Mr. Randall: That was an interesting answer from the Minister. He will be delighted to know that we plan to get a 50 m pool in Uxbridge—at the moment, we have worked-out plans for a 25 m pool. Does he agree that a 50 m pool is better than a 25 m pool? Will he come to Uxbridge at my invitation and have a look at those plans?

Mr. Caborn: I would love to take up that invitation. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that a 50 m pool is far better than a 25 m pool. Yesterday I was delighted to read the headline of a Tory press release, which said "Conservatives launch new policy to boost sports provision for the young". They spent 18 years shutting all those facilities—at their height, about 40 a month were going—but as my mum might say, if a sinner repents they are welcome to come and join us.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I welcome the move towards more 50 m swimming pools. As the Minister knows, Paris has more 50 m pools than the whole of this country. Will he give me his views on the London pools campaign, which is concerned about the increasing numbers of swimming pools that are closing down? We lose one a year, and there seem to be no proposals to deal with that apart from a new aquatic centre were we to win the Olympic bid. What are we going to do about swimming in the rest of London?

Mr. Caborn: Swimming has had more lottery money invested in it than any other sport. There are some 3,484 swimming pools in England, which make adequate provision, through the public and private sector, for those who want it.

The difficulty concerns 50 m pools. We have a 50 m pool in my city of Sheffield, but competitive use takes up a very small part of its time—it is invariably divided into three swimming pools for the community. There is always a dilemma as to whether a 50 m pool is used for elite swimming or what the community want to use it for, and Sheffield's pool is no exception.

I can clearly state that there is adequate provision for swimming, which is supported by many local authorities who are investing in free-of-charge facilities for their young people, as well as by increased private sector provision. However, a problem remains in relation to 50 m pools, and we are trying to deal with that.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath) (Con): The Minister knows of my involvement in swimming as a sport, and I recognise that, as he says, there has been a big expansion in the number of pools provided. However, does he accept that there are big issues to do with the funding of swimming generally in the light of the very worrying suggestion that, because our swimmers did not get as many medals at the Olympics as had been expected, there might be a substantial reduction in funding not only for pools but for other sorts of elite swimming? Will he agree to meet me and representatives of the Amateur Swimming Association? Does he recognise that the recent great success at the short course world championships shows that competitive swimming in this country is in a very healthy state?

Mr. Caborn: I agree that competitive swimming in this country is in a healthy state. Since the lottery fund started, it has invested £297 million in swimming, which is the highest amount that has been given to any such recipient.

In Sydney, we probably did as badly in competitive swimming as at any time, but within two years, having brought in a new coach from Australia, our swimmers got the best results in international swimming in Tokyo. They then went to Athens, where they took two medals and got into 16 finals. That remarkable improvement on Sydney—by any standards—was down to the way in which lottery money was invested, coaching, and the responsible attitude of the governing body.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): I want to express thanks and appreciation to my right hon. Friend for the support that he gives local authorities in the development of swimming pools and for the time that he took to come and officially open the swimming pool in Normanton. Does he accept, however, that there are still pressing needs for swimming pools? The communities of Ossett and Horbury in my constituency are appealing for support in obtaining a pool to serve them. Will my right hon. Friend pledge any such support that he can?

Mr. Caborn: Obviously, we will consider any application that comes in. My hon. Friend and I had an exceptionally pleasant day at the pool, although we resisted jumping into it to do a little exhibition of synchronised swimming, as I think people wanted us to. That pool is now serving the community in terms of health, as well as other benefits. I will give my hon. Friend as much assistance as possible in any extension of that.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): In order to meet such demand, the Amateur Swimming Association trains, remarkably, 12,000 swimming coaches each year, but says that it faces significant difficulties with the cost of training, insurance and child protection measures. What assistance can the Minister offer it, particularly given that it is denied access to Learning and Skills Council funding because it comprises volunteers?

Mr. Caborn: That is a serious issue, not only for swimming but for sport in general. Indeed, it affects not only sport but volunteering. We are a more litigious society and have become incredibly risk averse. That has had an impact on sport, and, as the hon. Gentleman said, it is a serious matter. Together with my colleagues in the Home Office, we are considering how we can deal with that in sport. The Department has held a series of meetings with governing bodies and insurance companies.

I shall not say that there is an easy fix—there is not. A few months ago, Parliament considered a private Member's Bill on the subject. It needs addressing and I hope that we can reach some conclusion because if we do not, in my view, our young people will be exposed to more harm from some activities in inner cities than they would ever encounter through performing sport.

ITV Regional Companies

4. Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the recent Ofcom report on public service broadcasting as it relates to ITV regional companies.

[201760]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): Ofcom has proposed that ITV 1's requirement to provide non-news regional programming for the English regions should be reduced from three hours to one and a half hours a week. Quotas for regional network production would be increased from the current 30 per cent. requirement to 50 per cent. As I said earlier, no reduction has been proposed in the current regional news obligation of five and a half hours a week for regional programming.

Mr. Grogan: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, given Ofcom's statutory responsibility to maintain and strengthen public service broadcasting, it is a bit odd that, a full eight years before digital switch-over, it proposes to reduce by half regional companies' obligations to produce non-news programming? Is not there a genuine danger, especially given that Ofcom is negotiating with ITV nationally to reduce its licence payments, of the body's being perceived as a soft touch in its defence of ITV regional programming?

Tessa Jowell: I do not accept that. The key issue is safeguarding regional programming as part of the public service broadcasting offer that ITV makes. It is important that, in addition to regional news, the requirements for non-news programming deliver what people in the regions want. If my hon. Friend examines the Ofcom report and the extensive data on public consultation that it provides, he will realise that public satisfaction throughout England with the non-news programming is approximately 7 per cent. In the Granada region, the figure is 5 per cent. That clearly means that something needs to be improved. The message is that we need strong regional broadcasting as part of delivering a strong public service broadcasting offer. The ITV companies must respond to what their viewers want.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): I heard what the Secretary of State said on the guarantees about the news programming. Does she accept that nowadays, BBC World, Sky News, CNN, Fox News and rolling world news mean that the public have a great choice, but that that does not apply to local news? That is why it is important that regional news is not only maintained but increased, if possible. Will she give a guarantee that, if at any stage a recommendation is made to reduce the hours for regional news, she will step in and ensure that they are protected?

Tessa Jowell: I would not want to pretend that I have powers of intervention on that aspect of regulation; I do not. However, I have made the position clear, and it is clear to Ofcom and ITV through the strength of feeling in the House and the many signatures on the early-day motion that my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) tabled. There is also a message to the BBC, as we consider the review of its charter, to examine not only the important role of ITV regional news but that which an increased BBC presence in the regions could play.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that major ITV shareholders say one thing in public about their public service broadcasting remit but an entirely different thing to the City? If ITV does not want to fulfil the PSB commitment, has she considered including in the charter renewal a BBC 3 proposal for regional television? That would mean that each region would have 24-hour regional broadcasting, thus enhancing a huge cultural change in the regions.

Tessa Jowell: No detailed conclusions have yet been reached on that specific proposal. However, it is possible that, as more people move to digital by choice, and as spectrum is released, new channels could be created, and consideration should certainly be given to my hon. Friend's proposal at that time.

Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): May I draw to the Minister's attention the fact that detailed proposals for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland have yet to be published? Worryingly, Ofcom states that namely that, from 2007, there will be no requirement for ITV companies to produce regional or local news. If the Minister does not take this matter seriously, would she consider devolving responsibility for broadcasting?

"many of the same considerations apply",

Tessa Jowell: No, I do not intend to recommend the devolution of matters relating to broadcasting, because I take them very seriously indeed. It is important that, as part of our UK identity, we have a national approach—a UK-wide approach—to broadcasting. The hon. Gentleman will no doubt have noted Ofcom's specific recommendations on Gaelic and Welsh language broadcasting.

Lawrie Quinn (Scarborough and Whitby) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the producers of the many programmes from Tyne Tees Television and Yorkshire Television? They produce strong regional TV that finds favour not only with my constituents but with people in the rest of the north-east of England and Yorkshire. Will she urge representatives of Ofcom to come to the House to meet the constituency MPs from those areas to discuss the strong regional identity in that part of England, rather than trying to hide behind her and her office near Trafalgar square? They should come to the House and listen to constituency MPs' strong sentiments about these services.

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. Yes, the chairman and chief executive of Ofcom could and should make themselves available to MPs in order to discuss these matters. I understand that the managing directors of each of the ITV regions have either met or are in the process of arranging meetings with every constituency Member of Parliament in order to discuss this issue, and I know that the chief executive of ITV has made a similar offer. It is important that these discussions should take place, because what is at stake is not the status quo in regional broadcasting but clear safeguards relating to high-quality investment in news. It is important to engage in a debate with ITV about the kind of programming that our constituents want and that reflects the areas that we represent and in which we live.

Gambling Bill

5. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What measures the Gambling Bill includes to prevent the proliferation of category A gaming machines. [201761]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): We propose that category A machines should be allowed only in regional casinos, and that there should be only eight regional casinos in the first phase.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that answer. As I understand the Bill, clause 56 reserves to the Government powers to deal with problems that might be caused by the use of category D machines, which would include machines such as penny slides. However, there is no equivalent provision for category A machines. If the Government are concerned about dealing with problems arising from the use of penny slides, why are they not concerned about problems arising from the use of machines that would have large stakes and unlimited payouts?

Mr. Caborn: We will take those powers. Indeed, we have limited the number of regional casinos to eight, and they will be used to see what the effects of their introduction will be over a period of time. The situation will be reviewed by the gambling commission, and we have made it clear that it will be up to the House whether to proceed with establishing any further casinos. In the real world, the category A machines will be limited to about 10 or 20 per cent. of the total number of machines in the casinos. That is what happens internationally. In this country, the highest paying machines are category B1 machines. There are about 1,000 of those, of which only a third pay out the maximum sum of £2,000. The operators clearly keep those machines at well below the maximum payouts, both internationally and in this country, and we believe that, with those safeguards in place, the experiment can take place. We will then evaluate it and bring the matter back to the House.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Is the Minister aware of the grave disquiet about these machines, and the extension of gambling in this manner? The proposals disturb not only those who must deal with the enormous problems that gamblers can create, but those who feel that the general protection of the public is being relaxed far too readily.

Mr. Caborn: I do not accept that. The Gaming Act 1968 was probably one of the most draconian examples of gambling legislation, especially in respect of casinos, but if my hon. Friend looks at the remit of the new Gambling Commission, she will find that we have put a large amount of the 1968 Act into it. We have tried to make integrity, transparency and fairness to punters a major part of the Bill.

I remind my hon. Friend that during pre-legislative scrutiny it was recommended that category A machines should go into large casinos as well, but we rejected that proposal. We have limited those machines to regional casinos, of which there will be eight. We did that in response to a feeling in the House that we wanted too many of them, just as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that we would. We expect the eight regional casinos to be properly evaluated, and we will report to the House before any steps are taken towards expansion.

Creative Partnerships

6. Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): If she will make a statement on the progress made by creative partnerships and the Government's plans to offer a universal cultural entitlement to all children and young people. [201762]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): Twenty-five creative partnerships have been established, with a further 11 due to start in September 2005. By November 2004, there had been over 217,000 attendances by children and young people at more than 2,500 projects.

Ms Munn: My neighbours in Doncaster, Rotherham and Barnsley have a creative partnership that provides excellent events for children at such places as the Yorkshire sculpture park and Magna. I should like one in Sheffield, but failing that, what is my right hon. Friend doing to encourage others to ensure that children and young people take advantage of existing cultural events?

Estelle Morris: I am pleased that my hon. Friend is seeing good work being done by creative partnerships. It is an excellent initiative at ground level, with each partnership finding its own way of spending money while also ensuring that artists are introduced to children in schools. I am happy to say that by September 2005 there will be a creative partnership in Sheffield. I understand that a director has already been appointed, and is putting together a partnership board. I am sure that he would be more than willing to have a conversation with my hon. Friend.

We never envisaged every local authority becoming a creative partnership, but we are keen to learn from this experience so that in time we may be able to announce a universal cultural entitlement.

Theatre (North-west)

7. Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): What steps she is taking to sustain and develop theatre in the north-west. [201763]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): Along with theatres across England, theatres in the north-west have benefited from the sustained extra investment that followed the 2001 theatre review. In the first tranche of the funding, theatres in the north-west received £8,084,150, which will rise to £8,352,139 this year.

Helen Jones: I am grateful for that answer, but what is my right hon. Friend doing to encourage theatre performances in towns such as Warrington that have no theatres of their own? Will she do more to encourage national companies to visit such towns, and put on more successful productions like the one by the Royal Shakespeare Company that we saw last year in Birchwood, in my constituency? What is she doing to support the Pyramid arts centre in Warrington, so that we can see more performances there?

Estelle Morris: I agree with my hon. Friend that impressive statistics showing that theatres have received more money do not mean much if constituents cannot go to them. Sadly, not every town has its own theatre. As my hon. Friend says, innovative ideas—such as making more money available for touring theatres—would help people in Warrington, and in other constituencies. Theatres in Liverpool, Manchester and Chester have already benefited from extra money for touring over the past few years. I understand that Warrington has also benefited, and has enjoyed performances that might not have been possible without that increased funding.

The Pyramid arts centre receives a £21,000 grant—not as much as some projects, but enough, I hope, to sustain it and enable it to serve the people of the town.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend recognise that Burnley council, given its small non-unitary authority budget, finds it very difficult to maintain the Mechanics theatre and arts centre? Is my right hon. Friend aware that councils such as Burnley that are committed to arts funding find it extremely difficult to meet that commitment with a small budget?

Estelle Morris: I acknowledge my hon. Friend's point: local authorities are huge investors in the arts, second only to central Government—I believe that they contribute more than £200 million. Local authorities of different sizes face budget pressures and have to make important decisions. Sometimes, the levers are there to spend the money on certain services, which may not include the arts, theatres or culture. That is something that, over time, the Government will address because it is clear that creativity, culture and theatres are central to local communities. Without that provision, we end up with the sort of estates that we built in the 1960s, when we built houses for people to live in but no culture for them to enjoy. The irony is that we are now knocking down those estates, as we knocked down estates at the start of the 20th century.

Television Licence

8. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Whether it is her intention to discount the BBC licence fee for licence holders who cannot receive BBC digital services. [201764]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): It is not my intention to discount the BBC licence fee for licence holders who cannot get BBC digital services. Rather, my intention is to accelerate the process and preparation for digital switchover, so that all can receive that service.

Mr. Prentice: Well, that is a bit disappointing because 27 per cent. of the population cannot get digital terrestrial services but they pay 100 per cent. of the licence fee. If that state of affairs were to continue for a year or two, that would perhaps be acceptable, but, with digital analogue switchover to be completed by 2012, that is asking an awful lot of people who cannot get digital services.

Tessa Jowell: I accept the sentiment behind my hon. Friend's comments. It is precisely because of the limited range of digital terrestrial television at the moment—only 73 per cent. of the population can access DTT—that we maintain as a principle the policy of platform choice, so that his constituents who are unable to get DTT may opt for another platform, either cable or satellite. However, I entirely accept his impatience. The public want more digital television. The process of digital switchover has real momentum, but we will proceed on the basis of the broadcasters' judgment on when it will be technically right to undertake switchover region by region. They are currently charged with providing that advice to us.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): The Secretary of State will realise that there is considerable resentment felt by those who cannot receive digital terrestrial television and will not be able to receive it except by satellite. Will she do her best to ensure that there is a new free-to-view satellite service, so that people in rural areas in my constituency who will not be able to receive digital television until the switchover can at least be offered the satellite option at no cost?

Tessa Jowell: The short answer is yes. We have already had discussions with the BBC about that, and I know that Sky is also looking at that option. As the hon. Gentleman says, for a small number of people in isolated communities, satellite will be the only option but two principles drive this policy for Government. The first is ensuring universal access, and DTT is the most effective way of doing that, and the second is ensuring affordability. With the reduction in the price of the set-top box, DTT is set to make a free-to-air offering of up to 29 or 30 channels for people, without any additional subscription cost.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): The Secretary of State is on record as saying that she regards it as inconceivable that the licence fee might be replaced as a source of funding for the BBC. How, then, does she react to the preliminary report of her adviser, Lord Burns, who said that the growth of digital channels and multi-channel television will make the licence fee unsustainable and that it should be reviewed in five years?

Tessa Jowell: With great respect, I do not think that I have ever described the likelihood of the licence fee being replaced as "inconceivable". I have certainly said that I think it unlikely, improbable and so forth. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am glad to hear the chorus of approval welcoming that fact.

Lord Burns's report, which is published on the website, as all charter review material is published in the spirit of openness and transparency, describes the licence fee as the least worst option, alongside an evaluation of alternatives. The hon. Gentleman will no doubt also look at what the public said about the licence fee. When faced with the alternatives, they decided that they liked the licence fee best of all.

The critical question, however, is what funding will give the BBC the greatest certainty and the best capacity, first, to maintain the high-quality wide-ranging programme content that people want and, secondly, to equip it best financially to deliver its leadership role in digital switchover. For those reason, paths lead back to the licence fee, at least for the next charter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I appeal to the Secretary of State to give shorter replies at the next Question Time because we are now going into injury time?

National Railway Museum

9. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What grant-aid her Department gives to the National Railway museum in York. [201765]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): The National Railway museum is a branch of the National Museum of Science and Industry. Although we grant aid the NMSI, it then makes its own judgment about the grant-in-aid that it allocates to the National Railway museum, which received £6.1 million this year from the NMSI.

Hugh Bayley: My right hon. Friend is committed to broadening access to culture and heritage. Is she aware that the National Railway museum has almost doubled attendances since the Government removed admission charges and, at 40 per cent., gets more social class C2, D and E visitors than any other national museum, yet receives less funding from her Department than most other national museums? Will she address that in her forthcoming funding announcement? Will she find a date when she can come to York to discuss with the museum director what the museum is doing for the region and the nation?

Estelle Morris: I agree that since free admissions were introduced it is good to see an increase in visitors to all the museums that used to charge. The statistic that my hon. Friend quotes is pretty similar for all museums in that category. I would argue a little about the increase in grant. I am not sure that the museum has received a smaller grant than others. It is about 22.9 per cent. I accept, however, that that includes money to enable free admissions. We hope to continue investing in the arts, including museums, and further announcements will be made in due course when we announce the results of the spending round.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Redundant Churches

21. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): How many redundant churches have been converted to other uses in each of the last three years. [201747]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): Thirteen in 2001, 28 in 2002 and 30 in 2003.

Mr. Prentice: These are significant figures. It is always sad when churches close because the congregations go away and disperse, but are there any inappropriate uses to which those redundant churches will not be put? Can my hon. Friend give me some examples?

Sir Stuart Bell: That is a double negative. First, the use of redundant churches must be by another Christian body or for wider community purposes that are generally regarded as most suitable. In terms of the second negative, the commissioners usually impose covenants on the new owner of a redundant church, restricting its use to that approved under statute and prohibiting any unauthorised architectural or structural alterations, demolition and the disturbance of human remains.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on Electoral Commission, was asked—

Postal Voting (Fraud)

22. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What steps the Electoral Commission is taking to prevent fraud in postal voting. [201748]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The Electoral Commission has produced several reports and made a number of recommendations for changes in the law relating to postal voting, and looks forward to the Government's response in due course. It is also working with relevant authorities to develop best practice to combat fraud.

Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman join me and others who support the view of the Electoral Commission and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister Select Committee that, in the light of the bad experience of postal voting earlier this year, and with the prospect of a general election next year, there should be some early legislation to make voting applications personal, not by household, to allow them to be seen as they are made; to allow any patterns in applications to be seen; and to clean up thoroughly the present unsatisfactory nature of applications, with fraudulent declarations of identity?

Mr. Viggers: Yes, the Electoral Commission will develop proposals for a foundation model, as suggested in its report, "Delivering Democracy", and it will report before 31 March 2005. It will consult with interested individuals, including Members and political parties, as the development work gets under way next year. The model is expected to build on the benefits of all-postal voting but also to retain use of polling stations. As for legislation, as the hon. Gentleman will well know, that is a matter for the Government and the House.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Can I urge the hon. Gentleman not to get too over-excited about the issue of fraud in postal voting? Between 5,000 and 7,000 postal votes were cast in my constituency in the local elections this year, with no accusations of fraud. The one issue that most troubled many voters was that someone else had to watch over them when they were signing a form, which was enforced on us by the Liberal Democrats. Many people find it troubling that someone else must act as a witness to say that they are the person who they said that they are.

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman is right. The commission has noted that the level of allegation and prosecution in the areas where all-postal voting was piloted is at this time no higher than that noted in a conventional election in those areas. The other point that he makes is entirely correct, and the Government have now moved to eliminate that type of form.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): Following the highly unsatisfactory all-postal vote for the north-east assembly, could the hon. Gentleman now confirm that never again will voters be forced to go to the polls without the choice of casting their vote in a ballot box?

Mr. Viggers: As my hon. Friend will have heard me just say, the Electoral Commission is now working on a foundation model, and recognises that a significant proportion of the population wish to cast their vote in a ballot box.

Overseas Voter Registration

23. Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): What steps the Electoral Commission is taking to promote overseas voter registration. [201749]

25. Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): What technology the Electoral Commission is using to aid overseas voters in registering for the next general election. [201751]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The commission provides information and application forms to eligible overseas electors through its websites. In addition, information has been provided to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office for use on the websites of overseas posts. Whenever the commission undertakes general voter registration campaigns, it includes targeted public relations activity, directed at potential eligible overseas electors.

Mr. Greg Knight: Why is the Electoral Commission spending £705,000 in the current financial year specifically to encourage young people to get out and vote, yet only £9,000, the majority of which, I understand, is staff costs, is being spent to encourage overseas voters to register and vote. As it has been estimated that up to 4 million people are living overseas who could take part in our democratic process, is not that discrepancy somewhat perverse?

Mr. Viggers: My right hon. Friend is on to a very good point. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office estimate of British citizens living overseas is 15.5 million, and there is no accurate estimate of the number of those who would be eligible to vote by reason of having been registered on an electoral register in this country within the past 15 years. It is difficult for the Electoral Commission to consider such a wide range of individuals because they are difficult to identify and even more difficult to reach. It is a stark fact, however, that only 11,496 persons were registered to vote from overseas in February 2001. We all have our part to play in encouraging more registrations and voting.

Sir George Young: On that theme, can I press my hon. Friend on online registration? If a citizen can file his tax return online and discharge that civic obligation, why can an overseas voter not complete his electoral registration form online and discharge another important civic obligation?

Mr. Viggers: Indeed, the Electoral Commission has given some thought to that issue, it is in its mind, and it would be one way to facilitate the registration and voting of overseas residents.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Should not the Electoral Commission simply let overseas registration wither on the vine? People should be registered in the country responsible for the relevant laws and economic arrangements—a principle that should be fully adopted not just in this country, but overseas. We should at least change the law regarding a link with the past from 15 years to just five years; at the moment, the situation changes when people move overseas.

Mr. Viggers: I would prefer not to be drawn down that path. As a spokesman for the Speaker's Committee, it is not for me to comment on such matters, but the hon. Gentleman's point will be noted.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): While encouraging those who are eligible to vote to do so, is it not important to maintain for overseas voters the same level of precaution against fraud that we are urging in respect of our domestic electorate? Is the Electoral Commission doing any work on the difficulties experienced by those who register in this country, but who are in fact nationals of other countries and are not entitled to vote in British elections?

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, but it goes slightly wide of the question so I would prefer to leave it for the moment.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Women Bishops

24. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What assessment the commissioners have made of the funding implications of a General Synod vote to allow women bishops; and if he will make a statement. [201750]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): None. By way of a statement, the General Synod has yet to decide whether in principle it wants to embark on the legislative process that would be necessary to enable women to be bishops.

David Taylor: It is very appropriate for the Church, in this season of Advent, to prepare for the arrival of female bishops, and it is proper and reasonable to provide for those who cannot accept the ministry of women in the episcopate. But in addition to its theological and practical flaws, would not the proposal for a new, third province parallel to Canterbury and York cause serious financial damage to the Anglican Church at every level—from the lowest and humblest parochial church council, such as that on which I serve, to the most elevated of bodies, such as the Church Commissioners, on which my hon. Friend serves?

Sir Stuart Bell: The question of a third province would doubtless appeal to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant), who is in his place. The General Synod will be asked at its February meeting to take note of the report, and in principle, the decision as to whether it wishes to remove the legal obstacles to women's ministry in the episcopate will come later in the session. The wider point that my hon. Friend makes will of course be taken fully into account.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): But does the hon. Gentleman not agree that the Church of England should have learned its lesson about separate arrangements for those who disagree with the general opinion of Synod, and that it would be very helpful if, in the interest of the good governance of the Church, the commissioners undertook a survey of the options mentioned by the Bishop of Rochester in his recent report? That survey will hopefully show that people will not be forced to come to a particular conclusion that is based on money, rather than on the very good sense that the Synod will demonstrate when it agrees to women bishops.

Sir Stuart Bell: I take note of the hon. Gentleman's point, which reminds me of a comment that you will be very familiar with, Mr. Speaker. I have no instructions to give other than this House directeth me, although in this case it is question of how the Church of England directeth me. On the financial implications, the Church is giving the Bishop of Rochester's report serious consideration and the archbishops have commended it for prayerful study. There is a very long synodical process through which we shall reach the question of women bishops, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's point, along with the other points raised, will be taken fully into account when Synod meets in February.

Terms of Employment (Clergy)

Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What recent assessment the commissioners have made of the work of the Department of Trade and Industry working group looking at terms of employment for members of the clergy. [201752]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): No concrete proposals have emerged from the DTI working group's meetings to date.

Mr. Chapman: Does my hon. Friend think that satisfactory? I recognise that the wheels turn exceedingly slowly in respect of Church matters, but can he indicate whether any progress has been made, what direction the working group is taking, and when we might expect some form of announcement?

Sir Stuart Bell: The thrust of my hon. Friend's question is a matter for the DTI, since it is up to its working group to introduce concrete proposals. The working group's discussions concerning the service review have been reported back to the clergy, and a report on the second phase of its work will be submitted to the Archbishops Council later this month.

"The mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small; Though with patience He stands waiting, with exactness He grinds all."

I would submit that, at the end of the day, we may reach the conclusion that my hon. Friend wishes.

Church Appointments

27. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): If he will make a statement on the consultation procedures for Church appointments. [201753]

Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): Different procedures are used for different appointments. In all cases, consultation is extensive whether it be for the appointment of diocesan bishops, other senior clerical appointments or parish appointments.

Miss McIntosh: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that reply. Will he join me and, I hope, the whole House in paying fulsome tribute to the present Archbishop of York and wish him God speed in his new parochial duties when he steps down from his current position? Will the hon. Gentleman assure the House that the consultation to which he just referred will be as wide as possible in respect of the succeeding Archbishop of York? Will he have regard to the turmoil in the Church of England, to which the archbishop referred, and ensure that both wings of the Church—the traditional and the modern—are represented?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for mentioning the retirement of the Archbishop of York, who will take up his position as a parish priest on 15 January. I am sure that all hon. Members will wish him God speed in his new role and will welcome and appreciate the work that he has done up to now on behalf of the Church. We all read with great interest his interview, published in The Sunday Telegraph yesterday. As to the consultation process, I doubt whether there has ever been one as wide and far-reaching as the present one. It includes the hon. Lady herself, who was asked to give her views, as have others within the Church. As a result of the extensive consultation period, I am sure that, when it comes, the appointment will represent the widest interests of the Church.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Local Referendums

28. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What advice the Electoral Commission gives to local authorities on the conduct of local referendums. [201754]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that local referendums are held under the auspices of the Local Government Act 2003 and, as such, are outside the remit of the Electoral Commission.

Hugh Bayley: Does not the hon. Gentleman nevertheless have a view that it would be good practice, when the local referendum takes place, for the question and supporting documents to be agreed on an all-party basis?

Mr. Viggers: It is not really my role to have views, Mr. Speaker, but I can say that the Electoral Commission can give advice where it has expertise and knowledge. It will no doubt take account of the point that the hon. Gentleman has made.

Benefits Uprating and Welfare Reform

3.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Alan Johnson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement on benefits uprating in the context of this Government's continued fight against poverty and our aim of employment opportunity for all. I shall place full details of the uprating in the Vote Office and arrange for figures to be published in the Official Report. I can confirm that most national insurance benefits will rise by the retail prices index, which is 3.1 per cent: and most income-related benefits will be uprated by the Rossi index, which is 1 per cent. From next April, retirement pension will go up by £2.45 a week for single pensioners and £3.95 a week for couples. When we came to office, the pension was just £62.45 for a single person: from April it will be £82.05, and £131.20 for couples.

As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor set out in last week's pre-Budget report, both next year and in the spending round to 2008, the pension credit will rise faster than inflation by average earnings, meaning that there will be 600,000 fewer pensioners in poverty than if the guarantee was uprated only in line with prices. Next year, the guarantee credit of pension credit will rise so that no single pensioner need live on less than £109.45 a week and no couple on less than £167.05 a week.

The threshold for the savings element of pension credit will be uprated so that it remains equal to the basic state pension. That means that a typical single pensioner will now gain from pension credit if they have an income of up to £150 a week, while a typical couple will gain on an income of up to £220 a week.

More than 3.1 million pensioners are now in receipt of pension credit, with an average award of more than £41 and with average arrears payments running at around £1,000. Each week, the Pension Service works to help pensioners access their entitlements in their local communities. It is a personalised service that has also led to increases in the take-up of attendance allowance, carers allowance, council tax benefit and housing benefit.

Take-up of pension credit has been strongest among the very poorest pensioners. The definitive national statistics figures on take-up rates will not be available for some time, but among those whose incomes would otherwise be below the guarantee element—currently £105—our best estimate is that take-up rates are running at more than 80 per cent. Among those with incomes at or below the basic state pension who do not gain from the savings element, we are now outstripping our expectations at the time of the spending review, in case load terms, by 25,000 households, or by at least £40 million this year in expenditure terms.

Following all the measures introduced since 1997, the average pensioner household will be £1,350 per year better off in 2005–06 as a result of our tax and benefit policies than they would have been under the 1997 system, while the poorest third will be £1,900 per year better off. In total, there will be an extra £10 billion spent on pensioners in 2005–06. That is £7 billion more than an earnings link would have given them, with almost half of the £10 billion extra spending going to the poorest third of pensioners.

As well as targeting our help at the poorest, we have done more for all pensioners than an earnings link would allow. Take for example, a single pensioner aged 76, living alone and with an income too high to be eligible for pension credit. A straight earnings-related uprating would give her £9.90 extra a week. Instead, this year, as a result of our reforms, she has a basic state pension increased in real terms by 7 per cent., a £200 fuel allowance and a free TV licence worth £121 a year. That adds up to an extra £11.62—or £1.72 a week more than the earnings link would have provided.

With 1.8 million pensioners lifted out of absolute poverty since 1997, we have made remarkable strides in tacking the pernicious pensioner poverty that we inherited in 1997, and we will continue to make its eradication our priority. We reject proposals that would see the poorest pensioners fall back into poverty and that would be an unsustainable burden on the public finances.

Around three quarters of individuals below the poverty line live in households with a pensioner or a child, so as well as tackling pensioner poverty, we are right to focus on child poverty. We have lifted more than half a million children out of relative low income since 1997. The child tax credit will increase by earnings, and the maximum eligible child care costs covered by the working tax credit have increased by 50 per cent. to £300 for two or more children.

The standard rate of maternity allowance and statutory maternity pay will be increased by the retail prices index to £106 a week. Last week my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced the extension of paid maternity leave. Instead of the 16 weeks in 1997, it will rise from six months today to nine months in April 2007, with a goal of an entire year of paid maternity leave. Whereas the maximum maternity pay and child benefit for mothers at home with their first baby in 1997 was just £2,610 for the first year, it will rise by 2007 to £8,300—a real-terms increase of £5,000.

In addition, the pre-Budget report also announced our new measures for child care, including an extra 1 million child care places being made available by 2010 and an increase in the number of Sure Start centres from 600 to 3,500 over the same period. That will not only improve the education opportunities of children but help parents to get into work.

A job is the best route out of poverty, and continued investment in the new deal and Jobcentre Plus will help us to move even further towards full employment and away from the mass unemployment of the 80s and 90s. We have the highest employment rate of the major industrialised nations, with unemployment at its lowest level for 30 years. There are 2 million more jobs than in 1997, with 1 million people helped into work through our new deal programmes. We have seen an increased employment rate for lone parents, disabled people, ethnic minorities, the low skilled and people aged 50 and over. For the fifth successive year, I can announce that we are freezing non-dependent deductions to relieve the pressure on low-income parents who are housing their adult children.

We are determined to ensure that everyone has the opportunity and the incentives to work. Our pathways to work pilots have achieved outstanding early results, with twice as many sick and disabled people getting back to work in pilot areas compared with non-pilot areas. The pre-Budget report announced our intention to build on that success by extending the scheme to a third of the country, covering the areas with the greatest concentration of incapacity benefit claimants, starting from October 2005.

With nine out of 10 people expecting to work again when they first claim incapacity benefits, pathways is helping them to meet their aspirations, fostering a culture change where sickness and disability need no longer mean a withdrawal from work. We are committed to extending that culture change by working with GPs and other health care professionals to embed a more positive attitude towards the beneficial effects of work. We will make a range of support available to GPs, including improved training materials for new and existing doctors to help them to support patients in getting back to work effectively.

We are piloting a scheme, based on innovative projects such as those undertaken in Glasgow, Bristol and Camden, to place employment advisers in GP surgeries. We are allocating £30 million more to expand the number who can benefit from the new deal for disabled people. We want to try to reduce bureaucracy for GPs, but also to build up our understanding of the most effective ways that GPs are helping their patients to manage a return to work.

A key part of that culture change is eliminating discrimination. We are proud to have introduced our Disability Discrimination Bill, which is today being debated on Second Reading in the other place. Combined with our extension of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 in October, we are radically transforming the rights and opportunities of disabled people. We are also committed to breaking down the barriers that older workers face by taking steps to tackle age discrimination and improve the financial inducements for people who decline to take their basic state pension at the age of 65.

The Pensions Act 2004 improves the rewards for deferring the state pension and gives people the new choice of taking an enhanced pension or a lump sum of, on average, £20,000 to £30,000 for people who choose to delay taking their state pension for five years. Furthermore, the rewards are significant even for choosing to defer for a period of substantially less than five years. For example, a 65-year-old single man entitled to a state pension of £105 a week who defers for two years would be entitled to an increased pension of more than £126 a week, or a lump sum of £11,600.

With today's uprating, we continue our commitment to and progress towards a fair and inclusive society of opportunity and independence for all, tackling poverty and breaking down the barriers that prevent people from realising their own aspirations in the workplace. I commend this statement to the House.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant) (Con): We broadly welcome the statement. We also welcome the Secretary of State to the House. I was half expecting someone else, when I read a story in The Sun today about Labour's topped with a nice photo of the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Alan Simpson)—so it is good to see the Secretary of State here.

"New pensions supremo, Alan Simpson",

I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will explain further the background to his plans for pension credit, because there is an interesting difference between what was stated in the official release of the Chancellor's autumn statement and what the Secretary of State has said today. According to the official release, the Chancellor was going to say last week:

"I can confirm that next year the pension credit will rise faster than inflation—by average earnings" which of course left scope for a change of strategy after that—we know that the Secretary of State regards the pension credit as a short to medium-term policy only. However, what the Chancellor told the House, as recorded in Hansard, is:

"I can confirm that, next year and in the spending round, the pension credit will rise faster than inflation—by average earnings"—[Official Report, 2 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 787.]

and it is that formulation that the Secretary of State has repeated today. Does he realise that if he keeps increasing the pension credit by earnings and the basic state pension by prices, the gap between the value of means-tested benefits and the basic state pension will widen? How could that possibly be consistent with what he told us he wanted when he said that we had to "bite the bullet and look at the state pension system . . . so that if you do a lifetime's work, it will deliver a pension above the basic level of means-tested support."?

His uprating statement today is inconsistent with the strategic aim that he set out in that speech last month. We need to know what he is trying to do, and whether he believes in means-testing increasing indefinitely.

It is all right the Secretary of State being a free spirit, speculating about how he can reform the pensions system when he is giving speeches outside this Chamber or in interviews with The Daily Telegraph, but what happens when he turns up here and gives a totally conventional uprating statement that will lead to more means-testing and more pensioners on means-tested benefits? He must make his strategy clear. Following another of his recent media appearances, I read in the Telegraph on Saturday, I think it was, that he spent his youth playing in a pop group called "The In-Betweens"—perfect positioning in today's Labour party, in between the Prime Minister and the Chancellor, and in between means-tested benefits and pension reform. We want to know his strategy for pensions.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that pensioners who got an extra £100 in their benefits this year will not get that next year but will get a £50 special payment instead, so that, after allowing for inflation, there will be a fall in the real value of benefits for pensioners next year compared with this year? Will he also confirm that that is before further increases in council tax? Studying the small print of the Chancellor's autumn statement reveals that average council tax will increase by 8 per cent. next year; what does that mean for real pensioner incomes?

The Secretary of State's statement was billed as being about not only benefits uprating but welfare reform, so let me ask him about what welfare reform means to him. It is obviously important that we reform welfare, and if ever the Government get around to trying to do so seriously, the Conservatives will back them. However, I admit to a certain world-weariness when I see another enthusiastic, fresh-faced Secretary of State, new to his office, come into the Chamber to announce that he will engage in welfare reform. We have been here before, and reform has never been delivered before. Why should it be any different this time?

Nowhere is the gap more obvious than in incapacity benefit, which the right hon. Gentleman mentioned today. May I quote what the Prime Minister said more than five years ago about reforming welfare and incapacity benefit? He said:

"we are reforming the welfare state, and in particular, we are reforming incapacity benefit ... There are now more people claiming incapacity benefit than claiming unemployment benefit. That situation cannot possibly be sustained."—[Official Report, 10 November 1999; Vol. 337, c. 1123.]

That was in November 1999, but since then the number of people on incapacity benefit has gone up from 2.267 million to 2.405 million. Having previously been promised welfare reform that was not delivered, why should we believe the Secretary of State this time, especially when the number of young people who are not working, studying or training has gone up since Labour came to office in 1997 and since the introduction of the new deal? It now stands at 1.112 million, which is the highest figure since 1997. Does that not tell the Secretary of State that there is something wrong with his protestations about welfare reform?

The Secretary of State referred to families, but will he comment on something that he carefully removed from his uprating statement? He talked about child tax credit and the uprating of the value of the child element of the tax credit. He did not say anything about the freezing for the second year of the value of the family element of the child tax credit. That is significant, because the child element of the child tax credit is heavily means-tested, and that is the part into which the Government are putting more money. The family element of the child tax credit goes to most families, and Labour is freezing it. The underlying policy for families, just as it is for pensioners, is more means-testing. The direction of policy on families is more means-testing, just as it is for pensioners. I am pleased that the Secretary of State has asked his officials for a note because, sadly, there are not many families in this country who can find their way around the Gordon Brown system. The statement involves more means-testing for pensioners and families, but that is not the direction in which we believe the country should go, and it certainly cannot be called welfare reform.

Alan Johnson: I reassure the hon. Gentleman that the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions still resides in Hull rather than Nottingham. I was surprised to see the photograph myself—Alan Simpson must be even more surprised.

I thought that there was terrific news in the statement about pension credit, which is something in which hon. Members on both sides of the House should be interested. Her Majesty's official Opposition do not want to do away with pension credit, and neither do the Liberal Democrats, so we all have a shared concern in making sure that we achieve maximum take-up. In my statement, I pointed out that we are succeeding in reaching the poorest pensioners who are on incomes even lower than the basic state pension because they did not make enough national insurance contributions. That is relevant to the point about uprating, as it is tremendous news for those pensioners that we will continue to index the guaranteed element of pension credit by earnings.

It is no good embarking on the task of taking millions of pensioners out of poverty—we are providing them with the reassurance of a safety net, including an additional savings element—and lifting 1.8 million pensioners out of abject poverty only to start to go backwards. The result, as I said in my statement, of linking the pension credit to prices rather than earnings would be 600,000 pensioners falling back into poverty. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman's policy of linking the pension credit to price rather than earnings would mean that, at the start of the 21st century, pensioners who are striving to get closer to average earnings—our ambition is to eradicate pensioner poverty—are, in fact, taken backwards. The statement is therefore good news for individuals on pension credit, and people would be extremely concerned about any political party that seeks to unravel what we have put in place.

The hon. Gentleman said that the proposals were inconsistent with the basic state pension, but there is no inconsistency at all. On the back of the Turner commission, we are looking at a new world for pensioners, in which there is a doubling of the number of people over 65 as a proportion of the population. The birth rate is declining, longevity is increasing and all countries must face the issue of what we are going to do in the long term. That should be a more mature debate than the debate about today's pensions. Of course today's pensions are important, but they must be sustainable into the future. We make no apology for looking at the long term. Part of the accusation was that we had a short-term approach, but there was no more short-term approach than that displayed by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), the Leader of the Opposition, who said that pensioners were more concerned with today than with what happens in 2050. Society and politicians must be worried about the situation now and in the future.

The hon. Gentleman said that there had been various speeches on welfare reform but that nothing had happened. One does not need to look at figures or statistics. One need only walk into a Jobcentre Plus office to see the transformation in welfare reform. It is not just the practical effect of merging the Employment Service with the Benefits Agency. It is the whole approach to people who need help to get back into work—the eradication of the screens and the dreadful atmosphere in those places, which made the customer feel more like a guilty party than like someone seeking assistance. Our reforms through Jobcentre Plus have been remarkable. The hon. Gentleman's policy of privatising Jobcentre Plus and abolishing large chunks of the new deal should concern us all, were there any danger of the Conservative party being elected.

The other aspect of welfare reform that the hon. Gentleman mentioned was IB. It takes a certain amount of panache and style—I give him credit for having both—to stand at the Dispatch Box as a Conservative MP and a member of the Government in the previous Administration, and speak about incapacity benefit. Let me remind the House that that trebled from 700,000 to 2.6 million between 1979 and 1997. Had we carried on that trend, there would now be 4 million people on incapacity benefit. The figure has risen from 2.6 million to 2.7 million because the inflow into incapacity benefit is down by a third.

We must improve the situation even further. Pathways to work is an incredibly important element of that, and I am pleased that the Chancellor last week announced its extension to a third of the country. Given that we have the most stringent gateway into incapacity benefit in the world, as measured by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development, we must examine why people are coming on to that benefit. One factor—the hon. Gentleman asked for some of our thoughts on the subject—is that a third of people are flowing on to incapacity benefit direct from the workplace. They were originally on statutory sick pay. When that runs out, they lose their link with the workplace, stay on the same rate but are suddenly into incapacity benefit. Then we spend an awful lot of time seeing how we can turn those people around and get them back into a job.

There are some important lessons to be learned there, but the most important lesson from pathways to work is that so many people on IB want to be back in work. They do not want to be treated as they were by the previous Government—condemned to a life on benefits. They want a helping hand to get them into work. That is what pathways to work is all about.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the NEET figure—those not in education, employment or training. The increase is entirely explained by the increase in population. Nevertheless, it is too high and we need to tackle the problem. That is why there were a range of measures in the pre-Budget report last week, including the concentration on skills and the change to the benefit arrangements so that those who are in full-time training unwaged can pick up some financial assistance, in the same way as others get the education maintenance allowance. There are important issues that need to be dealt with.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman asked a question about which I make no excuse for having sent for a note. My understanding, before receiving the note, was that the issue was part of the changeover to working tax credit. The family element stays at £545, so families will receive exactly the same, in nominal terms. Since we came to power in 1997, families with two children and an income of £50,000 have received a large boost, raising financial support for their children from £20 a week to £38.90 a week next year—a real-terms increase of 59 per cent.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): There is no better way of improving the income of people at the bottom of the income ladder than helping them off benefit and into work. Will my right hon. Friend look at the pathways to work project figures for the Glossop Jobcentre Plus office in my constituency? At the beginning of the project, the office was set a target of ensuring that 12 people on incapacity benefit moved into employment over six months. It achieved that result in 40 cases, which is a real success, and I hope that my right hon. Friend will pay tribute to it. My only criticism of what he has announced today is that the roll-out of pathways to work is not fast or great enough.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the work that our people on the ground, including those in Glossop, do to achieve such remarkable results. I am not surprised by what has been achieved. When I visited Gateshead I met the staff involved, who have years of experience of dealing with people and trying to get them into work, and they said that the results exceeded all their expectations. As for my hon. Friend's disappointment, the scheme is still in its early days. It is barely six months old, and in the expansion not only in the other areas being covered but in existing pathways to work areas, where we will now move on to those who have been on IB for three years or longer, we will have to take things carefully, so that we are absolutely sure that we are learning all the lessons to keep this remarkable momentum going.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The Liberal Democrats welcome a number of aspects of the statement, including the planned improvement in maternity provision. If I might briefly don my anorak, may I congratulate the Secretary of State on freezing non-dependent deductions for the fifth year running? When young people are increasingly being forced out of family homes, anything that reduces the pressure on low-income families and makes it easier for those young people to stay is a good thing. That is an obscure corner of the system, but I welcome the direction of Government policy.

I also welcome the courageous, visionary and pioneering way in which the Secretary of State is agreeing with the Liberal Democrats on the subject of the citizen's pension. I welcomed his weekend comments in the press about his approach to that issue. Will he give us a flavour of the response that he has received from ministerial colleagues in other Departments when he has broached with them the ideas that he is thinking about in this reform to pensions?

On the specific group of childless adults, will the Secretary of State tell us his thinking as reflected in today's statement? He will be familiar with the New Policy Institute's recent report highlighting poverty among childless adults, who have inevitably been a lower priority than children and the elderly, but are not irrelevant. Let me give two examples that arise from the statement. A woman of 59 on income support gets £56.20 a week—an increase of just 55p was announced today—but the next year her income will go up to £109, and almost double. In one sense, it is good that women can receive a generous amount at 60, but the disparity is growing every year. Can it go on like that? Can there be any logic in doubling somebody's income when she moves from 59 to 60, although her needs may be no different from one year to the next?

The other example is the case of a young woman under 25 with a partner who becomes pregnant. If the partner is not interested and disappears from the scene, she will be living on £44.50 a week—the increase will be just 45p. An expectant mother will be living on less than £45 a week. What does the Secretary of State think that it will mean for the well-being of the child if the woman receives only the single under-25 adult rate? Is it not about time that he considered discrimination in the system against under-25s? Can it really be justified any longer?

Alan Johnson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support. He said that he was an anorak, but Labour Members think that he is well on the way to becoming a cagoul. I welcome his welcome of the freezing of non-dependent deductions and the increase in maternity provision.

I do not think that I will get involved in talking about internal discussions with other Ministers—

Mr. Willetts: Why not?

Alan Johnson: Okay, then. They all support the drive to take pensioners out of poverty and to have a sustainable and equitable pensions system into the future. For every Labour Member, the argument about the citizen's pension is not about whether we are for or against doing something for women pensioners or recognising that they have particular difficulties. The hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) knows the arguments about the contributory principle and the other elements that are there to help. There is, however, absolute unanimity that we must tackle the problem of women's pensions. The citizen's pension, for which the Liberal Democrats are now claiming credit, has been advanced by many Labour Members for many years. The importance of the issue among Labour Members reflects the fact that more women, although not enough, have entered the House of Commons, and that shift is reflected in many areas of policy that have changed dramatically since 1997.

The hon. Member for Northavon raised the Joseph Rowntree Foundation report, which states:

"There has been substantial success over the last decade in reducing child and pensioner poverty and unemployment."

The Rowntree report raises some points about childless single adults, and we must examine that area, but I hope that everyone understands that when we formed the Government, our priority was to tackle the fact that one in three children and 2.8 million pensioners were in poverty. The employment market is benign, and reducing unemployment has had a beneficial effect on all strata of society. We have been working to our priorities, but the Rowntree report rightly points out other areas that we should examine, now that we are seven years into government.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Although the Secretary of State was right to draw attention to the good news that the Government have unfolded in their programme, does he accept that voters quickly acclimatise to Government success, and then look to what the Government might do next? Given that the Tory party and the Liberal Democrats have outlined their plans for long-term reform, does he think that it will be easier for us to fight an election if our election manifesto includes a hint about our long-term pension reforms? [HON. MEMBERS: "Wait for Turner."]

Alan Johnson: We do not have to wait for Turner. My right hon. Friend is right to say that long-term pension reform will be an issue at the next election. We can point to the Pensions Act 2004, which is a crucial element in tackling that problem. It involves major reform on informed choice and security, in the form of the pension protection fund. Many of its other elements are linked with the Finance Act 2004, which merges eight different tax systems into one. Those measures are all progressive, and they will be crucial in this debate.

Many people would do well to wait for the Turner report, because Turner's analysis of the problem is exceptional. He says that even if the Government pushed him to produce his report more quickly he would not do so, because he believes that a comprehensive report that tackles the issues is much more important than a speedily produced report. [Interruption.] Perhaps that is Alan Simpson, asking what I am doing imitating him at the Dispatch Box.

In the foreword to his first report, Turner said that, looking ahead to 2030 or 2050, the issue is so important that knee-jerk reactions are not right, and that we—none more so than the Conservative party—were all living in a fool's paradise in the '80s and '90s. He also made the point that the problem requires a measured mature response from politicians. We should say something in the manifesto. Between now and the manifesto, however, we should not say that we have all the answers without waiting for the second report from Turner, and without having a debate, which the Turner report will instigate throughout the country.

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): I welcome much of what the Secretary of State has said. I welcome the Disability Discrimination Bill, which is better late than never. Given that it has been introduced so late in this Parliament, I hope that it will reach the statute book. I also welcome the extra £30 million for the new deal for disabled people, which has been so successful that some of the organisations involved, such as the Shaw Trust, have been told to stop placing disabled people in work.

I also welcome the extension of pathways to work. Liberal Democrat Members have long said that it is a travesty that the disabled, who face the most obstacles to getting back into work, get only 3 per cent. of the £750 million budget for the new deal. In extending pathways to work to a third of the country, is the Secretary of State rethinking the policy of using the constant threat of benefit sanctions to try to force people into work? Personal advisers at one of the early pilots in Chesterfield in north Derbyshire told me—I have raised this before, in Committee—that they have to do a lot of work to undo the damage done when a disabled person claiming incapacity benefit receives a threatening letter saying, "You must turn up for a work-focused interview, on pain of losing your benefit, or part of it." The adviser has to try to ring the person before the letter arrives, to reassure them that the intention is to help them into work, not to threaten them or to take their benefits away.

Alan Johnson: The hon. Gentleman suggests that the Disability Discrimination Bill is better late than never, but we promised it in our last manifesto and said that it would be introduced in this Parliament—as, with a fair wind, it will be. That is why we gave it a First Reading the day after the Queen's Speech, and why it will have its Second Reading shortly.

[Alan Johnson]

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned that another £30 million is going into assisting some of the problems identified by the Shaw Trust, and by other charities.

I disagree with the hon. Gentleman about sanctions. The pathways to work project has the backing of the disability lobby on the basis of rights and responsibilities. There is a responsibility to attend a work-focused interview. The £11 sanction for not turning up is fair and reasonable, given that the programme involves condition management and assistance such as a £40-a-week in-work credit to help disabled people once they get into work. I understand that insistence that they attend, to the extent of using the £11 sanction, is very rare. When I went to Gateshead I asked the people there how many times they had had to implement it, and they find not only that they do not have to do so, but that people who are not even part of the project, because they have been on IB for longer than a year, beat a path to their door to ask for help. The rights and responsibilities approach must continue. If there are any specific problems I should like to consider them, but that is the right approach, and we have wide support for it.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): The Government's ambition to abolish child poverty is the most important that we have, and I welcome my right hon. Friend's comments on child tax credit. However, will he address the concerns of a constituent of mine to whom I spoke at the weekend, who had her initial award for child tax credit reduced by 80 per cent. in subsequent years because officials overestimated what she was due? She is not alone in that. What can my right hon. Friend and his Department do to ensure that such overestimates, and the misery and distress that they inevitably cause, are minimised?

Alan Johnson: I understand that my hon. Friend has an interest in these matters, his partner having given birth to a child quite recently. Every MP has examples of such problems, and we are working closely with the Treasury to try to solve them. To see what we have done to tackle child poverty, one need only look at the level of income support and child allowance that existed in 1997. Then, for a child of 0 to 11 years it was £16.90; next year, it will be £43.88—an increase of 127 per cent. We have to work to eradicate the genuine problems that my hon. Friend has identified, but that must not detract from the success of our attempts to eradicate child poverty.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): In the context of welfare reform, the Secretary of State will be aware that the working tax credit leaves many couples, and therefore any children that they have, up to £36 per week worse off than if they were on their own. That is in marked contrast to other social security systems, such as that in Australia. Will the Secretary of State investigate that anomaly to ensure that tax credit or benefit recipients are not worse off by living together than by being on their own? It must surely be wrong to penalise people for coming together as couples if they choose to do so.

Alan Johnson: I am not absolutely sure whether the hon. Gentleman is right—but he spoke with such panache and was so positive that I shall assume that he is, and the issue needs to be examined. However, the working tax credit and child tax credit have meant an enormous increase in reducing poverty. There are anomalies in the system, and they need to be tackled.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that I support 100 per cent. the Government's pension credit policy, which helps the poorest pensioners. I also acknowledge that the pension centres have helped many pensioners in all our constituencies to get other benefits to which they are entitled. My right hon. Friend said that take-up was 80 per cent. That means that 20 per cent. do not get the credit to which they are entitled and which, in many cases, they desperately need. How do we reach that 20 per cent. and ensure that 100 per cent. of the pensioners who most need the help get it?

Alan Johnson: The first thing that we can do is knock on the door of every pensioner who we believe should claim the credit, but does not. That was suggested to us, and we will do it. On the point about the 80 per cent., we expected to have a rate of 70 per cent. take-up at this stage. The other point was that we are missing the poorest pensioners, and we must consider that carefully. Every indication that I have received suggests that part of the problem arises because some people are not sure whether the savings credit element, which can sometimes be £5 or £6, is sufficient. There is some confusion about that. There is also a belief among some people that if they claim pension credit they will lose housing benefit or some other payment. We must deal with that. We are also considering whether small payments could be paid as a one-off annual payment rather than a weekly payment, thus making the credit more attractive to claim. We are considering all those aspects, and we want to get 100 per cent. take-up if possible.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): I welcome the success of the pathways to work pilots in helping people on incapacity benefit to get back into work. As my right hon. Friend rolls out and broadens the programme throughout the country, will he further consider the way in which medical rehabilitation services for people of working age could help to get them back to work? That could be an important part of the process.

Alan Johnson: My hon. Friend is right. That is why the Health and Safety Executive has a project under way. Rehabilitation has been underplayed by employers, who could use it to continue a link with people on long-term sickness, and do more to maintain that link and give them help. However, in pathways to work we also find that it is important for people to have not only the expertise of a personal adviser who is looking to place them in work, but condition management from the national health service, as well as GPs' awareness that getting them back into work could help their health. The suicide rate among those who are long-term unemployed is 35 times higher than that of people in work. For people with mental conditions, for example, being in work will be better than being out of work. When we all realise that and work together, that will be a success for pathways to work.

Orders of the Day

Railways Bill

[Relevant documents: The Seventh Report from the Transport Committee, Session 2003-04, The Future of the Railway, HC 145-I; and Fourth Special Report from the Transport Committee, Session 2003-04, Government, Health and Safety Commission and Executive, and Office of the Rail Regulator Responses to the Seventh Report from the Committee, HC 1200.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.18 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The White Paper, "The Future of Rail", which I published in July this year, set out new proposals for reorganising the structure of Britain's railways. The Bill takes forward the legislative elements to implement that White Paper to simplify and restructure the railways and put right many of the problems caused by a botched privatisation 10 years ago.

The main provisions of the Bill are to wind up the Strategic Rail Authority; to transfer the railway safety functions to the Office of Rail Regulation; to change the way in which access charge reviews are calculated; to give the devolved Administrations more responsibility; to allow passenger transport executives and London to take greater responsibilities for services in their areas; to establish a rail passenger council as a single national body and end the formal federal structure of the passengers' committees; and to put in place a better way of changing rail services to allow more flexibility and to provide for rail, light rail and bus schemes. I shall return to all those points in greater detail shortly. Before I do, I should point out that other important changes need to be made, which were set out in the White Paper but do not require legislation, and I shall return to those later as well.

Before I turn to the provisions of the Bill, I want to put the proposed legislative changes in context. The railways are a vital public service and an essential part of the country's transport infrastructure. Whereas the railway industry was seen as an industry in decline in the early 1990s, today it is growing. Last year, more than 1 billion journeys were made—the first time that that milestone has been reached since 1961.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Does the Secretary of State put this renewed confidence in the railway industry down to the way in which the private companies have increased their customer numbers?

Mr. Darling: Actually, I would say that, despite the difficulties encountered by the railways over the past 10 years, it is to the credit of everyone involved that they are now carrying more people than at any time in the past 40 years. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would agree that the railways have been through a very difficult time in the past 10 years, involving a traumatic privatisation—Railtrack was an absolute disaster in terms of its lack of stewardship of the railways and of its failure to get to grips with costs and allowing them to get out of control—and the dysfunctional organisation of the railways, some of which problems we are putting right in the Bill. I made it clear when I announced the review of the railways in January last year that the partnership between the private and public sectors is an important one in relation to the railways, but I am very sure that, without substantial public commitment—not just in organisational terms—and public investment, we could not bring in the corresponding private money, let alone anything else that is needed. I think that we part company with the Tories over this issue. Their idea is that all that they need to do is withdraw public funding—presumably the railways would have their share of the £1.8 billion of transport cuts that they are planning—but that would almost certainly result in a reduced amount of private money coming in. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman gave me the chance to make that point.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con) rose—

Mr. Darling: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to be as helpful, I shall certainly give way to him.

Mr. Wilshire: I should be delighted to help my hon. Friend the Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) on this matter. If the Secretary of State chooses to describe privatisation as a disaster, how would he describe the creation of the Strategic Rail Authority? If that was anything other than a disaster, why is he abolishing it?

Mr. Darling: What I said was that the way in which the railways were privatised by the previous Conservative Government was a disaster. It was bad for the railways and hugely disruptive, and the decision to set up the SRA was—

Mr. Wilshire: A disaster.

Mr. Darling: No, it was an attempt to bring some order to a very disorderly railway system. Under its chairman, Richard Bowker, the SRA made a very good job of sorting out some of the problems that had resulted from the privatisation. I shall come back to the SRA shortly. The hon. Gentleman ought to be aware that the Conservative amendment implicitly calls for the retention of the SRA. He had better have a look at what he is being invited to vote for before he calls it a disaster.

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I welcome the development of a publicly owned railway system in this country and the measures that my right hon. Friend is taking to ensure that the railway is publicly accountable and publicly run. Is he prepared to go a little further and say whether the train operating companies and franchises should also be publicly owned and run, where appropriate, on the ground that that can be done very efficiently?

Mr. Darling: I shall come to the question of franchising later. If I do not say anything about my hon.

[Mr. Darling]

Friend's point, perhaps he will remind me of his question; I shall certainly come back to it. That is one way of guaranteeing an audience for at least another 15 minutes, because he will have to stay put until then. I would say to the hon. Member for Spelthorne that he should not worry; this would not be the first time that hon. Members had been taken aback by the fact that their amendment did not say quite what they thought it did. He should have a good look at the one tabled by the Conservatives.

There has been significant success on the railways, which is a tribute to all who work on them. Moreover, our investment nearly doubles railway investment over five years. Total investment in the four years to 2006 will be almost three times the amount at the time of privatisation. It is important to make that investment to back up the Bill.

Just 10 days ago, when we were discussing the Bill in the context of the Queen's Speech, the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo)—the Conservative spokesman—made the surprising allegation that we had cut spending on transport. I did not intervene at the time, because I was puzzled by his assertion. Let me put the record straight now.

The hon. Gentleman compared the Department's spending according to the 2002 spending review—£11.2 billion—with that in the 2004 review, which he saw as £10.4 billion. The reason for the apparent reduction is that about £450 million of planned DFT spending is going into transport, £138 million of which is going into the ScotRail franchise and therefore goes through the Scottish Executive's books. About £300 million funds the Health and Safety Executive and goes through the books of the Department for Work and Pensions, while about £50 million goes directly to local authorities for concessionary fares. I do not want to labour the point, as I appreciate that it is some years since the hon. Gentleman was a Minister and the intricacies of public accounts are sometimes baffling, but I assure him that we have not cut transport spending. Only he and the Conservative party propose to do that.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): Is it not the case that, even if we include all the figures that have been buried in other Departments' accounts but are—we are now told—available for transport spending, the figure for the current year will be substantially below that projected for the current year in 2002?

Mr. Darling: Those figures are not buried. They are properly accounted for, as is necessary unless we are to hear a row from the Public Accounts Committee. In fact, we are spending about £200 million more than we had planned. The hon. Gentleman should note that, because we are not going to let go of the fact that, between now and the next election, he will have to explain how he will get £1.8 billion out of transport. I shall say more about that later, because it is relevant to the amendment. I did not realise that he had rubbished the David James report on efficiency savings quite so much, but I shall leave him to ponder on that for a few moments.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I do not know whether it was a Freudian slip, but the Secretary of State said that he hoped to get parts of the dysfunctional structure right. Are there other parts that he is not trying to get right?

Mr. Darling: Even for a Liberal Democrat, that is a pretty poor point. We had already fixed the other parts; now we are finishing the process. The Bill deals with only some of them.

The White Paper sets out six key changes that are necessary for us to build the right structure and which underpin the Bill. First, the Government will take charge of the strategic direction of the railways, because only a Government can do that. Over the years, at various times various governments have sought to distance themselves from the consequences of their spending decisions. I firmly believe that only the democratically elected Government of the day can decide how much to spend on the railways and roughly what their shape and size should be. That responsibility rests fairly and squarely with the Government.

When we looked at the organisation of the railways last year, we concluded that one of the first principles should relate to who is best placed to do what. When it comes to strategic direction, only the Government can decide.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): The Railways Act 1993 placed a duty on the Secretary of State to promote use of the railways, which was transferred to the Strategic Rail Authority in 2000. Will that duty be transferred back to the Secretary of State?

Mr. Darling: Is my hon. Friend talking about the duty to promote freight?

Brian White: I was referring to passengers and freight.

Mr. Darling: Of course, promoting the railways is one of the Government's duties. The 1993 Act explicitly gave the SRA a role, but that is not explicit in this Bill. However, it follows from everything that I have said that, where the Government have a responsibility to decide the size and shape of the network, it is for the Government to be accountable for that. It would be difficult to impose on a Minister a duty to promote the railways. We are different from the SRA in the sense that we are elected. It would be open to another Secretary of State from another party such as the Conservative party to say, "I was elected to do something completely different." One has to live with the electoral consequences of that but, as far as we are concerned, the strategic direction of the railways and the responsibility on funding lie fairly and squarely with the Government and therefore with the Secretary of State. That is the first key point of the White Paper. It is important that people recognise that only the Government can do that, but the Government are in a slightly different position from an organisation that they may set up that has more specific responsibilities. The Government have a more general responsibility. Let us not shrink from that. It is up to the voters which Government they elect. They may want to elect a Government who slash and burn the railways, but I do not think that they want the Conservatives just yet.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): The Secretary of State has said twice that it is only the Government who can choose a strategic direction for our railway system. Why therefore does the Bill give such big powers to the Mayor and Transport for London? The White Paper says:

"We will also consider whether . . . there should be any scope for Transport for London to take revenue risk from train companies".

Can the Secretary of State confirm that the Bill will not involve council tax payers in London taking risky ventures on railways in London or inflation-busting fare increases on top of the one that we have just had?

Mr. Darling: The Bill does not do that and I will come to London shortly.

The second key point of the White Paper was to give Network Rail clear responsibility for operating the network and for its performance, timetabling, route utilisation and so on. Thirdly, train and track companies must work more closely together, and they are doing that now. Fourthly, as I said, there will be an increased role for the Scottish Executive, the Welsh Assembly Government and the London Mayor, and more local decision making in London.

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Darling: I will in a moment.

Fifthly, the Office of Rail Regulation will cover both safety performance as well as economic regulation. Finally, there is a better deal for freight, which will enable the industry and its customers to invest for the long term, which is an important point.

I want to talk about the proposals in the Bill that will help us to put in place some of those key changes. I will come on to the Scottish point, if that is what the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) wishes to raise, in a moment. First, clause 1 provides for the winding-up of the Strategic Rail Authority and will enable the Secretary of State, accountable to Parliament, to take charge of setting the railway strategy. That means that the SRA's strategic responsibilities and financial obligations will pass to the Secretary of State, although, in some cases, strategic responsibilities will also pass to the devolved Administrations. It also means that the Secretary of State and the devolved Administrations will take over some of the SRA's role, particularly that of awarding train company franchises. In order to put those changes into effect, it will be necessary for some staff to transfer from the SRA to the Department for Transport, or in some cases to Network Rail or the Office of Rail Regulation.

Again, I want to make an important point that has a bearing on the amendment that has been tabled by the Conservative party. This may be news to Conservative Members, but it wants, apparently, to keep the SRA because, it says, it does not want civil servants and/or politicians to take part in the award of contracts. Let us make one thing clear. Ministers will not be involved in evaluation and discussions in relation to the award of contracts. Of course they have to sign them off, as we did anyway with the SRA. When the SRA went through the contract process, of course it had to come back to the Secretary of State to sign off because there are huge financial implications.

As for the idea that people employed by the Department for Transport cannot do that work, they do it in the Highways Agency, which has long been recognised as an extremely good organisation in procurement. It is done on behalf of the Government, but the contract-awarding process is completely separated from Ministers, as it should be, so that will not happen. The idea that Ministers will be involved in negotiations or have any improper influence on awarding contracts is absolute rubbish, as the Opposition should know. The rail group within the Department is being reorganised to reflect that.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend make it clear that there is no question of any franchise being awarded on the basis of the known personalities or political connections of particular persons? The suggestion is going round the industry that a particular company will not get a franchise simply because of its direct connections with the Conservative party. That is ignorant nonsense and I want it denied here and now.

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend is right to raise this point. I have not heard the suggestion to which she refers, but it is absolute nonsense and she can have the categorical assurance that she asked for. Franchises will continue to be awarded on the basis of completely open and transparent published criteria. Frankly, I do not care about the political allegiance of anyone running the railways; all that I want is for them to work and for the trains to run on time. That might not be a very high ambition but it is all that I want, and I doubt whether the public will care whether it is the Tories, Labour or even the Liberal Democrats who manage to do that.

Secondly, safety is of course of paramount importance, but we believe that it should be integrated more closely with other issues, which is why we want to combine the Health and Safety Executive's functions with those of the Office of Rail Regulation. The ORR will shortly consult on how it will organise itself to ensure that both its primary functions—economic regulation and safety—can be properly discharged.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): On accident reports and investigations, schedule 3 states:

"The Office of Rail Regulation may authorise a person to investigate and . . . report on any accident".

Is that not duplicating the current work of the rail accident investigation branch, or is the intention to complement or supplement that work?

Mr. Darling: I see such work as complementary. It has been agreed that, from next year, when the RAIB is established, it will take the lead in the event of an accident, go to work as quickly as possible, find out what has happened and report as soon as it can, thereby operating in much the same way as the air accidents investigation branch and the marine accident investigation branch, which have worked very well for a number of years. In order that the rail regulator can discharge its safety obligations, it may well want to examine some of the issues arising from such incidents. What we are putting in place is a complementary system. On too many past occasions, there have been a number of people with a legitimate interest in investigating such matters. This will be a far better way of working.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Brown) will doubtless want to pursue this issue. If he is lucky enough to get a place on the Standing Committee, those of my hon. Friends who share that pleasure with him will be happy to go through the memorandum of understanding involving the RAIB and other organisations. However, I think that he will find that the system is complementary.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Secretary of State seems to be saying that he wants to set up an organisation similar to the AAIB and the MAIB, but I think that I am right in saying that there has been no public inquiry into an air accident in this country since 1967. When the Government took office, they launched a public inquiry into the incident on the River Thames involving the Marchioness, even though the MAIB had already been set up. Is the Secretary of State saying that he hopes that, if the RAIB secures the same reputation as the AAIB, he would see no need for public inquiries in future?

Mr. Darling: No. First, the RAIB was in fact set up in legislation passed last year—this Bill is not setting it up—and it is due to come into operation early next year. Secondly, of course, no Secretary of State will ever be in a position to say that there will never be a public inquiry. The principal way in which such matters are handled is through the prerogative powers that Secretaries of State can exercise, and it would be very foolish to rule out such a possibility. What I can say is that I hope that the RAIB will do as the other investigation branches have done and satisfy many of the requirements that have hitherto led to calls for a public inquiry. Certainly, the MAIB and the AAIB—thankfully, major air accidents are comparatively rare—have proved very effective in getting to the bottom of such incidents, mainly because they begin on a no-blame basis, get on site and find out what happened. Certainly, of the three transport modes, air is probably the most mature in that everyone in an air accidents investigation branch is not bothered about whose fault it is; they just want to know what happened to ensure that it does not happen again. Ideally, that is precisely where we should be in respect of the railways.

I am not sure that the hon. Member for West Derbyshire (Mr. McLoughlin) was in his place when I made my statement following the recent accident at the level crossing in Ufton. What was good about those proceedings was that, rather than adopting a mood of identifying who was to blame, people focused on what was necessary to find out exactly what happened.

Thirdly, to return to the Bill, the Government want further to devolve decision making for public transport, including rail, to the Scottish Executive, the Welsh Assembly and to passenger transport executives, and a substantial part of the Bill deals with that.

Mr. Paul Truswell (Pudsey) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Darling: I will give way shortly; I believe that I know where my hon. Friend is coming from.

We believe that, where it is possible to devolve powers, it is right to do so, because it makes for better transport planning. As to PTEs—

Mr. Truswell rose—

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Darling: Hold on a moment. I promise that any hon. Member who wants to intervene will get to intervene, unless you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, call the Adjournment or something like it. It may be helpful to the House to say that I intend to say a few words about PTEs in England, then speak about London, then go to Scotland—actually, I would love to go to Scotland, but not just yet—and then back to Wales. My first subject is PTEs, so does anyone want to intervene?

Mr. Truswell: Does my right hon. Friend acknowledge the important role that passenger transport executives have played in securing, developing and monitoring rail services during some very difficult post-privatisation times? If he does, why is he seeking to reduce and remove so many of their existing powers and, if he is mindful of restoring those powers under the Bill, would that not represent an unnecessarily bureaucratic and confusing process?

Mr. Darling: No, quite the opposite. I am glad that my hon. Friend intervened because I thought that he might say what he did and it provides me with an opportunity to explain what we are doing. At the moment, franchises are the joint signatory of both the Strategic Rail Authority as it is now and the PTEs. In some cases, where the franchises involve more than one PTE, they have more than one or two parties to the contract. That means that it is complicated, because more parties are involved in the negotiations, and it can lead—let us be blunt about it—to a lot of horse-trading. At the moment, the PTEs do not have to meet the full consequences of the services that they specify because it all comes ultimately from the Government. In operational terms, we can end up with more and more services being purchased to run through a network that may not be able to take them. It may not be able physically to do so. My approach was to try to simplify the structure as much as possible, to make it less complicated and therefore less expensive. The more people involved, the greater the expense.

I agree with my hon. Friend that the PTEs are very important, not least because they must have regard to all transport within their area—not just railways, but light rail, buses, cars and so forth. The Bill provides that the Secretary of State must consult the relevant PTEs before issuing an invitation to tender, so the Secretary of State knows what the PTEs want to buy. If they want to buy more services, they can do so; if they want fewer, we intend to arrange it for them to receive the money for that and be able to spend the remainder on other things as well. In other words, they will be given greater power.

The Bill is necessary to ensure that we have a far simpler system than the one we have at the moment. Since the publication of the White Paper, I have made one change that was not contemplated in it. Because it may be necessary, for contractual reasons, to have the PTE as a signatory, it can, at the invitation of the Secretary of State, be a co-signatory, if necessary. PTEs thus have nothing to worry about in respect of their interests, which will be taken into account. There is a statutory obligation to listen to what they have to say. What we are doing is to streamline the procedure and, critically—I make no apology for it—I am determined that, in future, if PTEs can buy more services, they must accept the financial consequences of what happens. The present position is a nonsense.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): The position in the constituency of the hon. Member for Pudsey (Mr. Truswell) may not be quite the same as the position that the Secretary of State has set out. What is the position when a PTE has entered into a franchise agreement already? Can it be retrospectively altered? For example, Nexus in the north-east has committed to making further improvements to the metro in Newcastle and Sunderland and to improving railway stations. Will its position be altered by the Bill?

Mr. Darling: No, because it is a general rule that legislation is not retrospective, except with the express consent of the Law Officers. The Bill will apply to new franchises. Existing franchises may be varied if that is agreed, but the Northern franchise was signed relatively recently. I remember an example that led me to believe that we needed a simpler way to deal with such negotiations. In the course of the negotiations on the Northern franchise, it emerged that one PTE had one service a day that went into the Northern franchise area, but it was able to hold up negotiations because it wanted something in its own franchise area. That is not a very satisfactory way of proceeding.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): Notwithstanding what my right hon. Friend has said about the safeguards that he hopes to build into the Bill for PTEs in the future, does he agree that removing them as co-signatories to franchises weakens their position with franchisees? Can he give some examples of the difficulties and complications that the present system has caused?

Mr. Darling: It would not weaken the PTEs' position. The newer franchises have a far greater degree of specification—of performance and so on—than the older ones. Those specifications can be enforced in the future because a contract to provide services can be enforced by the Department, which will be the contracting party. My difficulty with what my hon. Friend says is that negotiations have not been a matter only for the PTE and the SRA—or the Government in the future—and the TOC. Often, negotiations have been between the PTE and the Government or the SRA. Those discussions have held matters up on several occasions. To put it bluntly, sometimes matters have been resolved by a compromise under which the Government pay some money to the PTE. I can see why the PTEs might think that that is a jolly good arrangement, but it is not, to coin a phrase, a very good way to run a railway.

We are trying to develop a rational system that is simpler than the present one. It will not diminish the role of the PTE. Indeed, what we propose—this is the whole thrust not only of the railways White Paper, but of the transport White Paper published a few weeks later—is that over time we will decentralise funds as far as possible to give the PTAs greater power and, crucially, to give them greater flexibility. At the moment, railways are regarded as somehow different from the transport that PTEs do, such as bus and light rail, but they should all be considered together. In some circumstances, it might not be right to run heavy rail because light rail would do the job better.

We are planning to give the PTEs greater power; when they get greater control over the money, that will provide greater influence over the TOCs. No doubt such matters will be explored further in Committee, but our proposals are an improvement. I know that a group has been organised in the past two weeks to campaign against the proposals, but its concern is misplaced.

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way on that point?

Mr. Darling: Yes, but then I am going to London.

Mr. Stringer: While he is still in the metropolitan areas, I remind him that I chair the group that he has just mentioned. Will he agree to a meeting with us so that we may make representations on that issue?

Mr. Darling: I am sure that either my hon. Friend the Minister of State, who will take the Bill through Committee, or I will meet my hon. Friend. I have always made it clear that it is one of the responsibilities of Ministers to meet their colleagues and I am sure that we can arrange an opportunity to go through the arguments.

In relation to London, let us again be clear what we are talking about. The Mayor and TFL have substantial responsibility for most of London's transport. It is logical that, if we can bring rail travel within the Greater London authority closer to what TFL is doing, it will provide a better transport system for the public, not least in relation to fare structures and ticketing. At the moment, it is sometimes difficult to work out why it should cost more to go between one place and another by rail, by bus or by tube, so the principle of greater co-operation is a good one.

In relation to the Silverlink services in London, which run within the GLA boundary—with the exception of the service that goes to Watford—it seems sensible to say that if TFL is responsible for transport in London, it should look after those as well.

The allegation that sometimes arises, certainly from the Conservatives, is that, somehow, we will give the Mayor of London power over all the services that run into London. The hon. Member for South Suffolk is right: about 70 per cent. of train services in this country go to London. There is no way that we will hand over power for those services to the Mayor of London. What I said was that there may be a case, in discussion with the local authorities that surround London, for looking at services—especially commuter services—that come into London where the Mayor wants to specify greater stopping in his area. Clearly, that would have a knock-on effect on services going outside London. That needs to be discussed. That will be done on a slightly longer timetable—it will not happen imminently—but any sensible transport planner would accept that we need to consider the way in which those services are organised.

Jeremy Corbyn: I thank the Secretary of State for giving way on the question of London, before he goes off to Scotland. In his proposals for Scotland, the Scottish Parliament will be given control over the track. I welcome and support that. Does he envisage a situation where TFL and the Mayor would have control over trains in London, as well as the track infrastructure, particularly on the entirely suburban cross-London routes that are not inter-city by any stretch of the imagination?

Mr. Darling: No, I do not, and I had better explain why. In Scotland, most of the railway network is operated by one franchise, ScotRail. Although the Anglo-Scottish services run up to Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen and Inverness and include one or two sleeper services, the dominant provider of trains is ScotRail. The track will remain under the ownership of Network Rail, but the Scottish Executive are largely involved in specifications, enhancements, improvements and so on for ScotRail, the dominant operator, so it makes sense that they should specify what is appropriate for the track. Bluntly, if they want to open up services or take them away, that is a matter for them.

The situation is almost the opposite in London. As I said, 70 per cent. of train services in this country come into London, and a large number of them start well outside London. It would be very difficult—in fact, it would be administratively and operationally impossible—to extract those parts of the track in London that no one else but London uses. I do not understand the strength of doing that, so we do not propose to do it.

However, we recognise that where something is wholly within London—such as, for the most part, the Silverlink Metro services—it is logical that TFL should take it on. In relation to services that go outside London, if commuter services might usefully take people to places with no transport links in London, that ought to be discussed. But I repeat that it can be done only after discussion and a general agreement on the way forward with the surrounding local authorities. I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Member for South Suffolk, who would love us to propose a rather different policy, but there is no question of giving the Mayor say over trains that run outside London. That is not what we are proposing at all.

Mr. Wilshire: TFL representatives tell me that they want to get their grubby little hands on all the tracks and stations in my constituency and that they plan to improve facilities by increasing fares. What guarantee can the right hon. Gentleman give to my constituents that the extra fares that they pay to TFL will be spent in my constituency, and not on some grandiose, half-baked scheme that Ken Livingstone thinks up?

Mr. Darling: I would be surprised if TFL put the proposals in the way that the hon. Gentleman describes. I do not want to repeat myself, but we have no plan at all to transfer the track, as I was just explaining to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn); the hon. Gentleman is wrong on that.

Let me now deal with Scotland and Wales, although I have almost explained the Scottish policy.

Mr. Donohoe: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Pete Wishart: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Darling: I shall let both hon. Members intervene, but let me say first that the Scottish Executive has run the ScotRail franchise for two or three years, and the arrangement has worked well. There will have to be a transfer of resources to reflect the fact that the Executive is to take over responsibility for specifying what they want in terms of track; that is now being discussed.

Mr. Donohoe: Will that allow the Scottish Executive to have what is called vertical integration, so that one company is responsible for both track and the train operating company?

Mr. Darling: No, but the position in Scotland is better than in some other parts of the country. Network Rail and the TOCs are now setting up joint control rooms, so that ultimately, when the number of franchises has been reduced, we will have alignment between the Network Rail regions and the single franchises, which will allow closer co-operation between track and train. That is much easier in Scotland, because ScotRail is the dominant operator; although, because of the Anglo-Scottish services, it is not the only one.

Pete Wishart: I have been keen to intervene to congratulate the Secretary of State on overseeing the biggest devolution of power since the Scotland Act 1998 was passed. It confirms the view of devolution as a process, not an event. Hopefully, the Railways Bill will represent the first of many steps in that process. However, can the right hon. Gentleman convince the House and Scottish Ministers that resources will follow the devolution of powers, so that the Scottish Executive can pursue their objectives in the coming years?

Mr. Darling: The Scottish Executive are well provided for thanks to the excellent spending settlement for the next three years that we were able to make in the summer because of the strong state of our economy and the strength that we derive from being part of the United Kingdom, something on which the hon. Gentleman might want to reflect. He should not count on a stream of further devolution measures regarding the railways; the Bill is sensible and practical, but it is all that is required.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Returning to the subject of London, clause 15(3) refers to consultation that must take place before an invitation to tender for a franchise agreement is issued in respect of services that "are or include London railway passenger services".

Given that 70 per cent. of all rail services pass through London, is not the Secretary of State setting up a huge bureaucracy, whereby he must consult and agree with the Mayor of London before such invitations are issued? If not, what will happen if there is disagreement between the two?

Mr. Darling: No, that is not so. The hon. Gentleman is letting his imagination run riot. The franchises will be awarded through a division within the Department for Transport set up for that purpose. Yes, we have to consult all sorts of people where appropriate, but the position will be infinitely simpler than it is now.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I welcome the proposals that will lead to the Scottish Executive having more influence in discussions with the Department for Transport and Network Rail on the strategic objectives of the system as a whole. That will require resources to be transferred. Is it clear that the Scottish Executive will be responsible for all improvements to rail infrastructure throughout Scotland, including the whole of the east coast main line from Edinburgh north?

Mr. Darling: The Scottish Executive will be responsible for specifying and paying for those enhancements that they want. As for the east coast main line, the Scottish Executive might want to administer a series of comparatively minor upgrades, but so might Network Rail, depending on its requirements for, say, Anglo-Scottish services. However, the White Paper makes it clear that if a major upgrade were in prospect like the one for the west coast main line, the decision would be made by the Department for Transport in association with the Scottish Executive. However, the Scottish Executive could decide to upgrade the line from, say, Edinburgh to Aberdeen—a stretch that my hon. Friend knows something about—if they chose to expend their resources in that way. The Executive will now have that power, which I think is a major step forward.

Under the asymmetrical devolution that we have in this country, each part of the country has to be dealt with differently. The Welsh Assembly Government will be able to, and will, specify the Wales and Borders Trains services, but we will remain responsible for the few Wales and Borders Trains services that operate wholly within England. That is consistent with devolution.

The Bill includes greater powers to make it easier to change services. Earlier, I spoke about wanting to encourage better decision making when choosing between heavy and light rail and so on. Such procedures must be changed because the SRA is going, but the procedures will be much better than those we have at present. Changes to the Rail Passengers Council have been largely instigated by the council itself to enable it better to represent passengers' needs and have been welcomed, by and large.

I said that there were other changes that do not require legislation. Network Rail will be given clear responsibility for operating the network and changes to the agreement between Network Rail and the Department are being discussed at the moment. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe), I said that track and train companies must work together more closely.

The House may be interested to know that, in January this year, I opened the first joint control centre between Network Rail and South West Trains. In the first nine months, performance has improved by 35 per cent. If anyone had any doubts about the wisdom of separating track and train, which was contemplated by the authors of privatisation, that example shows that there is a huge difference in performance, which will continue. I also said that there would be a reduction in the number of franchises; on 19 October, I said that they would fall to 19, and that there would be a further reduction to align them with the Network Rail regions. Network Rail will take over responsibility for drawing up utilisation strategies to make the best use of the network. Finally, the discussions on the rolling stock companies are continuing.

Before I conclude, I ought to do justice to the amendment tabled in the name of the Leader of the Opposition; it is only a courtesy to do so. I do not want to labour the point, but while it is critical of the Government, as one would expect, it is hardly illuminating about what a future Conservative Government might do. That is curious; at this stage in the electoral cycle—unless the hon. Member for South Suffolk is a 2006 man—one would have expected the Conservatives to give a hint of what they would do in the unlikely event of their being returned to power.

The hon. Gentleman is silent about the £1.8 billion-worth of cuts that he would impose. Implicit in his amendment is his wish to keep the SRA, given that he is critical of the changes that we are making to abolish it. I should tell him that Mr. David James, who was hired by the Tories to look at efficiency savings, has banked the savings that derive from abolishing the SRA. I was therefore surprised by the amendment, until my attention was drawn to something that the hon. Gentleman said in an environmental publication in September:

"There's no commitment to implementing these recommendations"—

the efficiency savings—

"I'd be surprised if there is not some scope for efficiency savings but whether those are of the order that the James committee suggested I don't yet know. It isn't a priority for me—it's much more important to get our policy indicators clear so people know exactly what we stand for."

The hon. Gentleman has shot himself in the foot regarding savings; at the same time, he has disappointed us, as we do not have a clue about where he stands. We do not know what the Conservatives' policy is, except that they want to cut £1.8 billion from spending on transport. It is difficult to see how on earth we could have an effective railway system, especially as they have some history, or baggage, as the privatisers of the railway, which led to so much difficulty.

I believe that the railways in this country have a very good future. I accept that there are difficulties and problems to be overcome—reliability, for example, needs to be improved—but we now have the funding and management, and the right organisation, for the railways to make sure that they carry more people and freight. I am optimistic about the future of rail, and I commend the Bill to the House.

5.4 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I beg to move, To leave out from "That" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to the Railways Bill because it increases the extent to which politicians and civil servants interfere in the running of the railways; gives the Mayor of London power over train services which begin or end beyond the boundaries of the Greater London Authority; perpetuates instability in the rail industry with regard to franchising; fails to encourage additional private investment; offers nothing to improve conditions for passengers and the travelling public; and exposes the Government's continuing disarray over the strategic direction of the industry."

I shall start by helping the Secretary of State, who looked frightfully pleased because his researchers had dug out a quotation from some remarks that I made in September about the recommendations of the David James committee. Had he or his researchers done their homework properly, they would have discovered that those remarks of mine made in September referred specifically to the David James committee recommendations in respect of the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, and that the more recent recommendations of the David James committee were, when published last month, accompanied by a specific statement from me, which said that any savings that were achieved as a result of those recommendations—I believe that significant savings will be made—will of course be redeployed entirely in the transport field. So I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to that point, which has clearly been causing some confusion in his mind and that of this staff.

The Secretary of State said that the Bill was needed to put right aspects of privatisation. Even by his standards of accuracy, that is a pretty extraordinary claim, because everybody knows that there is one reason, and one reason only, why the Government have introduced the Railways Bill: it is because they need to put right one of their own blunders. The right hon. Gentleman lapsed into his slightly more patronising style, as he does from time to time, when he said that it was some years since I had been in government. That is absolutely true. It is also true that he has been in government for quite a long time. One of the hallmarks of people who have been in government for quite a long time is that they acquire a complete inability ever to admit any mistake by their Government.

The Secretary of State would have been a great deal more convincing this afternoon if he had recognised publicly even for an instant that the Strategic Rail Authority was an utter and total failure. It turned out to have no strategy, no railway and no authority. Five years ago the Deputy Prime Minister said:

"The Strategic Rail Authority will put railways at the centre of an integrated transport system".

I wonder how that ties in with the decision of the Strategic Rail Authority to end the dedicated Gatwick express. I thought the Gatwick express was quite a good example of integrated transport, so that an international traveller, coming off an overnight flight, is at least guaranteed a seat. But the SRA, the body which the Deputy Prime Minister himself said would put is proposing to put an end to the Gatwick express, so that international air travellers will come off an overnight flight and have to stand all the way to London because some commuter has got their seat, having got on the train at Hayward's Heath.

"railways at the centre of an integrated transport system"

"with proper public accountability and investment, putting the passenger's interest at the top of the agenda in a long-term strategic framework with the focus on a plan for growth."—[Official Report, 20 December 1999; Vol. 341, c. 539.]

In 2001, Labour's election manifesto stated that the Strategic Rail Authority would provide a clear, coherent and strategic programme for the development of the railways so that passenger expectations are met. Just two years ago the Department for Transport's own review of the 10-year transport plan said that the SRA would provide "the firm leadership envisaged for it, that of providing strategic direction and funding for the rail industry."

Today the Secretary of State is consigning the Strategic Rail Authority to the dustbin. Predictably, its failure has not led to a single ministerial resignation, even though £250 million of taxpayers' money has been wasted.

Jeremy Corbyn: As part of the public catharsis that he wants us all to go through, will the hon. Gentleman say a word about the fantastic costs of privatisation, the waste of resources that accompanied it, the sale of assets by Railtrack and the huge public subsidy to private rail operators that has often disappeared into profits? Does he not think that even a moment's apology for the privatisation strategy is worth giving at this time?

Mr. Yeo: Indeed, I intend to touch on some of those issues later in my speech. It is significant that none of the issues that the hon. Gentleman has just raised are among the areas of policy that the Government are proposing to change. They have accepted hook, line and sinker every one of the points about which the hon. Gentleman seems so upset. My concern was that the Secretary of State has not admitted to the House that the reason he has to introduce the Bill today is that the Government made a blunder of the hopes that they had for the Strategic Rail Authority. Those hopes turned out to be unfounded.

For the avoidance of doubt—the Secretary of State seemed rather confused on this point—the Conservative party does not oppose the abolition of the SRA, but we condemn the muddle and incompetence of a Government who have had to oversee such a massive U-turn in the centrepiece of their railway policy—a Government who, after almost eight years of responsibility for railways, find that the main change that they need to make is to reverse one of their own decisions.

There are some aspects of the Bill that we do accept, such as the transfer to the Office of Rail Regulation of the functions previously carried out by the Health and Safety Executive, but we have very strong objections to several parts of the Bill, as our amendment makes clear and as I shall explain. The fundamental problem is that the Bill gives politicians and bureaucrats far more say in running the railways. That is the precise opposite of what the Government should be doing. Indeed, the only hope for railways is leaving management to get on with providing the service that customers want without constant political interference. Unfortunately, nothing in the Bill—not a single clause—will make life better for passengers, make trains more reliable, encourage more investment in the railways or increase the amount of freight carried on the railways.

Mr. Darling: Purely as a matter of interest, where would the hon. Gentleman transfer the SRA functions on the awarding of franchises and so on?

Mr. Yeo: As I have implied, my view is that the companies that are closest to the customers should be given a bigger say, not a smaller one, in how the railways are run. I would discuss with the operating companies how the process of franchise allocation can best be made totally independent of political interference. The system that the Government have set up—I shall return to this point presently—increases the potential ministerial interference in franchise allocation. From a Government who have shown on more than one occasion that they are willing to bend policy in response to political supporters, donors to the Labour party and so on, the Bill introduces a highly dangerous situation.

Mr. Darling: If the hon. Gentleman wants to make franchise awarding independent of the Department and of Ministers, surely it means setting up another body or quango to do it?

Mr. Yeo: As I said, I propose that we will have discussions with the industry and with those who are most affected by this policy area about how to ensure that important decisions about the allocation of franchises are taken out of the hands of Ministers.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: In a moment.

It is not clear now what the Government think the railways are for. Are they there to carry commuters, run services between big cities, maintain rural and cross-country lines and to carry freight? Let us look at the record over the past seven and a half years, and in particular, compare it with what was said in the 10-year plan launched by the Deputy Prime Minister four years ago. According to that plan, trains were to be made more punctual. In practice, twice as many trains now run late as did so in 1997. According to the plan, the amount of freight carried on railways was to increase by 10 per cent. by 2010. In practice, in the past two years, the amount of freight carried has fallen. According to the plan, Thameslink 2000 and the East London line were both to be built by 2010. In practice, those targets cannot be met. Ministers promised that rail fares would not rise faster than inflation. In practice, they have done so, and the latest increase last week amounted to 4 per cent.—the second 4 per cent. rise in only two years. Last but not least, the British Transport police have just reported a worrying increase in violent crime on and near to the railways.

In summary, after seven and a half years of Labour government, train fares are up, trains are running later, freight is falling and new projects are either postponed or cancelled. Just last week, we learned that because Network Rail could not inform train operators of where it would be working on the lines over the Christmas holidays until extremely late in the day, the operators could not publish their Christmas timetables in a timely manner, thus making it hard for people both young and old, who particularly depend on the railways at this time of year to see their families, to make their plans.

I acknowledge that the situation on the railways is not bad in every respect. As the Secretary of State said, the number of passenger miles travelled is now at its highest for more than half a century. Investment in the railways has also risen sharply since the private sector became directly involved in their operation. Neither of those important achievements could possibly have occurred if the railways had remained entirely in the public sector, as the Secretary of State acknowledges.

I shall now set out some of our concerns about the Bill. First, as I said, it gives politicians more control over the railways. Let us start with London: more than two out of three of all train journeys begin or end in London, which is central to the success or failure of the railway system. If the Bill is passed, the Mayor of London, Ken Livingstone, will have a direct say in the running of all trains coming in and out of London, rather than trains that serve the Greater London area only. Clause 15 requires the Secretary of State to consult Ken Livingstone on how tenders for franchises are handled and allocated, on whom franchises are allocated to and on the terms on which franchises are allocated. It specifies that those powers, which Ken Livingstone will exercise, will apply to rail services anywhere in the country that begin or end in London.

I am glad that the Secretary of State is reading the Bill, because he may discover something that he did not acknowledge in his speech. Clause 15(7) defines a "London railway passenger service" as one which includes trains that travel to or from places outside Greater London. It is clear that the Secretary of State has not read the Bill, which he is examining with great interest. I know that he cannot wait for a Cabinet reshuffle—he has never shown great enthusiasm for his present brief—but he is deluding himself if he thinks that the Bill does not give Ken Livingstone the powers that I have described. If he thinks otherwise, he has obviously failed to read his own Bill.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I intervened on the Secretary of State on exactly the same point. My hon. Friend will have heard the Secretary of State's complacent reply that the measure will not increase bureaucracy and council tax for the people of London and that it will not lead to inflation-busting fare increases. Given the record of Transport for London, of which the Mayor is in charge, on running the tube, on which fares have increased hugely, and the fact that the council tax for London has increased by more than 50 per cent. since the Mayor took over, does my hon. Friend think that the Secretary of State has any credibility on that matter?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend has made a powerful point succinctly, and he is right. The Secretary of State has tried to deny the contents of his own Bill, the effects of which will be exactly as my hon. Friend has described. I shall enlarge on those effects, because if the Secretary of State has not read the Bill, it is even less likely that he has read the regulatory impact assessment, to which I should like to draw hon. Members' attention.

[Mr. Yeo]

The RIA makes it clear where the Bill is heading. According to it, clause 16 has been worded to ensure that there is

"flexibility built into the legislation that allows the Secretary of State to potentially extend the mayor's responsibilities for London rail services"—

remember that the Bill defines those as any train that begins or ends in London, regardless of how far outside the Greater London area it travels—

"in line with policy development."

The RIA admits that

"potential costs include the risk of greater interference in the rail industry imposing delay and higher costs on train companies. There is also a risk that projected passenger benefits do not materialise ... as previously noted, the incremental costs associated with policy implementation are not yet known."

The RIA blows the gaff.

I wonder what persuaded the Secretary of State, of all people, to give Ken Livingstone those powers. Was it the cost-effectiveness of the congestion charge, which, as hon. Members know, costs £97 million to administer and raises £68 million after expenses? Was it, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) has suggested, the rigorous way in which Transport for London has negotiated holiday entitlements for tube workers? Does the Secretary of State think that giving Ken Livingstone more power will make it easier to attract investment into the rail industry, and are the train operators clamouring for such a change?

One group of people who I am sure do not seek such a change are commuters who travel into central London from outside Greater London. They may find that instead of services being developed that make it easier for them to travel in from stations such as Colchester and Manningtree, which many of my constituents use, the congested tracks on which those trains travel may be occupied by services designed to suit the needs of Ken Livingstone's voters in the Greater London area.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is making too personalised an attack on the Mayor of London. He has already mentioned the name Ken Livingstone six or seven times. The hon. Gentleman is, in effect, speaking against the principle of consulting locally elected politicians about rail services. If he is opposed to that power going to the Mayor of London, is he also opposed to provisions in the Bill that allow Scottish Executive Ministers to make exactly the same decisions about journeys that begin or end in Scotland?

Mr. Yeo: No, because the situation as between Ken Livingstone and Scotland is wholly different. I mention Ken Livingstone because, as he happens to be Mayor of London, he is the person to whom these powers are to be transferred. Members of the Government might wish it otherwise; they might think, for example, that Steve Norris would have made a better Mayor. I mention Ken Livingstone also because his record of running almost any kind of service is one of appalling waste and extravagance. I can scarcely think of a single politician less suited to being given the responsibility that the Bill bestows upon him. The situation in Scotland is wholly different. Only a tiny fraction of the services for which the devolved Executive is responsible go outside Scotland, whereas a vast number—in fact, the majority—of services for which Ken Livingstone will be responsible begin or end outside London.

Let us move on from Ken Livingstone. Another big gainer of power is Network Rail. Having sought and obtained control over train timetables, its new responsibilities include devising route utilisation strategies, directing network operations, driving up operational performance, and delivering infrastructure maintenance and renewal. That sounds pretty impressive, but to whom exactly is Network Rail accountable? Certainly not to its shareholders, because it does not have any; certainly not to passengers, because it is not burdened with the inconvenience of coming into direct contact with them; and scarcely even to its members, one of whom wrote to me a few days ago, rather plaintively pointing out:

"We are appointed via a mystery process ... We have no sanctions over the board ... Unless Network Rail call the meetings we cannot claim expenses."

It does not sound as though the management of Network Rail has much to fear from anyone. I worry about the effect of that on services. Network Rail's first responsibility, as the Library paper helpfully points out, is to the track. It has no incentive to attract extra passengers on to the railways; indeed, it will be able to cut services if they interfere with its duty to maintain the track. It sounds suspiciously like the worst periods under British Rail, when, having complained about the poor service offered to my commuter constituencies in South Suffolk, I was often left with the impression that it would be able to run the trains much better if it did not have so many passengers to bother about.

What is more, how can we be certain that Network Rail, with its monopoly position in the industry, far-from-transparent operations, unconventional structure and curious lack of accountability, is operating efficiently? Are the cost and speed with which the railway infrastructure is maintained and improved in Britain comparable with the performance achieved in other countries?

Mr. Darling: Again purely as a matter of interest, can the hon. Gentleman tell us what his proposals for Network Rail are? Would he keep it, or privatise it, or nationalise it?

Mr. Yeo: It is pretty clear that there is no possibility of Network Rail's being privatised, given the way in which the Government treated its predecessor body, Railtrack. That matter is still being pursued through the courts. If there had been any wish on the part of the Government to try to boost private sector investment into Network Rail, that wish was greatly obstructed by the way in which Railtrack's assets were seized by the Government and those associated with them.

Mr. Darling: I must press the hon. Gentleman for an answer. What are his proposals for Network Rail?

Mr. Yeo: It is impossible to privatise Network Rail, because of what this Government did previously. No one is going to put money into assets that the Government seized from a predecessor body, so we have ruled that one out, at least for the foreseeable future. What is needed is a review of the structure of Network Rail to give it a clear line of accountability to passengers; to its customers, the rail operators; and, if necessary, to Parliament. However, it is clear that it suits the Government to be able to hide behind Network Rail. They will say that the industry is not nationalised or part of the Department but part of a separate body, which nobody quite knows how to call to account. I daresay my hon. Friends have had the same experience as me. It is difficult, even for those of us on the Front Bench, to get information about exactly what Network Rail is doing.

What incentive is there for Network Rail to speed up the exploitation of its huge property assets? For more and more rail passengers, getting on a train at a provincial station is the same today as it was 100 years ago. The contrast between airports, which are firmly in the 21st century, and most stations, which remain in the 19th century, is painful. Massive amounts of capital can be drawn in from private investors for the benefit of the rail industry, without taxpayers or passengers having to fork out a single penny, simply by unlocking the huge potential of brownfield development opportunities in and around stations. Unfortunately, the Bill will make that process harder rather than easier.

The train operating companies are among the losers from the Bill. Their response has been muted so far, but it is hardly surprising when one realises that another change in the Bill would give the Secretary of State and his civil servants direct control over the allocation of franchises. Woe betide any train operator who dares to point out that the Bill does nothing to help passengers but merely cushions the lives of Ministers and bureaucrats. What chance would such a company have of getting a new franchise even if it was delivering a high quality service for its passengers? The nature of the changes in the Bill will silence opposition from potentially well informed sources, such as train operators, who are much closer to rail users than Ministers, civil servants or Network Rail will ever be.

There is no longer any pretence that the process of franchise allocation is independent of political interference. However, we know that passengers rank pretty low in the Government's priorities. That is clear from the changes to the way in which lines can be closed in future. Would it not be great to have a Bill that dealt with making it easier to open railway lines where demand existed? There is not much chance of that from a Secretary of State who has kicked almost every project for expanding railway capacity into the long grass.Unfortunately, the Bill is not about making it easier to open railway lines but to close them. To be more precise, the measure makes it easier to close lines and ensure that someone other than the Secretary of State gets the blame.

The rail network has remained roughly constant in size since one third of it was chopped in the Beeching cuts of the 1960s. It is widely assumed that the Government's latest wheeze, dressed up in the cuddly title of "the community rail development strategy" is little more than a smokescreen behind which Ministers will try to conceal a new round of Beeching-style cuts. It is a pity that the Secretary of State has not had the courage to come clean about that. After all, it is possible to make a logical case for saying that railways should concentrate on commuters, inter-city journeys and freight. If the Government thought strategically, they might want to do that. However, their transport strategy, like their strategy in almost every other policy area, is simply about spin and massaging public opinion.

The community rail development strategy transfers more responsibility for financing rail services to passenger transport executives—although, significantly, it does not transfer any extra money to them—while simultaneously taking away from those executives their role in determining the local rail franchises that should be awarded. To provide extra local services, a PTE must get approval from Network Rail. Since Network Rail cannot tell us, with three weeks to go, who can run services over Christmas, one can imagine the difficulty a PTE might meet if it had the cheek to say that it wanted to run a new service.

No such problem arises, however, if the local PTE wants to cut a service. In that case, it is free to switch the spending to "other transport modes" as the White Paper delicately puts it. That means a bus. Although Network Rail is there to block the provision of new train services if some of its engineers want to do that, there is no comparable hurdle to starting a new bus service, however congested the roads that the service may have to use.

An interesting insight into where the Government's sympathies really lie is provided by the fact that when new rail services are considered, the extra infrastructure costs and compensation to other operators must be calculated in advance and paid by the local passenger transport executive. In the case of new road services, however, such considerations apparently do not apply. In the White Paper, this is all hilariously described as "streamlining". What it really means is that the Government want to shift traffic from trains to buses, but do not want to say so, and—most of all—do not want to take the blame for the rail closures that they are planning.

I am not against facilitating decisions about new forms of transport service—light rail, guided buses and so on might well have a bigger role to play in the future—but I am utterly against a policy of closure by stealth, which has been designed to ensure that when closures are carried out, the local passenger transport executive will be blamed, although the Government are actually responsible. Furthermore, I share the concerns of the PTEs about the way in which the Secretary of State is removing some of their powers. Kieran Preston, the chairman of the Passenger Transport Executives Group, has said:

"it makes no sense to hand over the planning and management of regional rail networks to unaccountable civil servants in Whitehall who lack the local knowledge and expertise".

I turn now to an important relationship that the Bill will change: the relationship between the Secretary of State and the Office of Rail Regulation. Again, the change that the Bill will introduce increases the power of the Secretary of State and cuts that of the independent regulator. The effect of the change will be a return to the days when capital spending on the railways was subject to constant Treasury cuts, the consequence of which was the largely clapped-out rail infrastructure that resulted from half a century of state control.

[Mr. Yeo]

At present, for all its flaws, the Office of Rail Regulation can act as a driver for new investment. Through the way in which it sets access charges, it can help to ensure that sufficient money is attracted to renewing and improving the network. The Treasury has now taken fright, however, at the way in which that process breaches its own power to exercise absolute control over public spending. I understand why the Treasury has taken that view, but the consequences are significant and potentially damaging. The terms of schedule 4 of the Bill make it clear that in future, whatever the Office of Rail Regulation decides in relation to access charges can be overruled by the Secretary of State. In the absence of assurances from the Secretary of State about funding levels, we have to assume that the Department for Transport will be under constant pressure to make such cuts.

The change will have another serious consequence. Until now, the Office of Rail Regulation has had the power to set access charges and a duty, in doing so, to apply an important list of statutory criteria, such as the promotion of efficiency and economy in the industry, the interests of freight and passenger users of the railway, and the growth and development of the industry. It is not allowed to apply political criteria, as it is recognised that the application of short-term political considerations is harmful to private sector confidence and to the medium and long-term needs of the railway industry. The establishment of independent economic regulation, free of political controls, is essential to private sector confidence and investment. That duty has no doubt provided comfort to private investors in the railways, but if they are putting money into new rolling stock and improved services, there must be at least a reasonable prospect that the infrastructure will be provided for the results of their investment to function.

Mr. Stringer: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's arguments. Is he really saying that he is satisfied with a situation in which, over the past two or three years, the rail regulator has been able to add £7 billion in expenditure to the public purse without any recourse to the Government? If he is not saying that, what is he saying?

Mr. Yeo: I am pointing out the consequences of the Bill. We are here to debate its Second Reading, and I am highlighting the areas about which the Opposition are concerned, which we shall seek to improve in Committee. The consequences of the proposal to allow the Secretary of State to overrule any recommendations from the Office of Rail Regulation will be quite serious, and we need to understand what they will be. The Secretary of State himself stated on 9 February that the Government "rules out any change to the rights of third parties, which will be protected."

He also said that

"maintaining fully effective and independent economic regulation is critical for retaining investor confidence. There will be no diminution in the regulatory protection of the private sector investors in the railway."—[Official Report, 9 February 2004; Vol. 417, c.1237W.]

Just how that statement to Parliament can be reconciled with schedule 4 will be examined in more detail in Committee; just what its effects might be on future private investment in the railways may take rather longer to be revealed.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Will the hon. Gentleman simply answer the question? Does he really think that the taxpayer should have no protection at all?

Mr. Yeo: I am not suggesting that the taxpayer should have no protection. I am suggesting that when the Government effectively go back on an assurance to Parliament, the resulting instability makes it harder to attract the investment that the railways need if they are to be brought up to date.

My worries about the Bill are reflected in the Opposition amendment. While we recognise the need for the Government to reverse the mistake that it made in setting up the Strategic Rail Authority four years ago, we remain concerned about the impact that the Bill will have on the future of the railways. Even in the darkest hours of British Rail, even when state control of the railways was unquestioned, there was never a time when quite so much power was seized by the Secretary of State and his civil servants in the Department.

Following the SRA's demise, just who will have any duty or incentive to promote rail travel? Not the Secretary of State, not the Department's civil servants, not Network Rail, not even Ken Livingstone.

We will pursue our objections to the Bill in Committee and during its later parliamentary stages. As a regular user of trains all over Britain, I believe passionately in their future. I believe that their role in providing environmentally friendly, sustainable transport for freight, commuters and long-distance inter-city travellers could and should grow. I believe that that end can be achieved with far less taxpayer subsidy than is being poured into the railways now. I also believe that it will be achieved only if we draw in more private investment through intensive exploitation of the enormous assets of the rail network, if we allow train operators the freedom that they need to respond to consumer demand, and if we take politicians and officials in the Department and in London right out of the running of the railways—if, in fact, we do the exact opposite of what the Government now propose.

The difference between the Secretary of State and me is that I want our railways to succeed and believe that left alone they can do so, whereas the Secretary of State does not mind whether they succeed or not, but does want to make sure that if they fail, he does not get the blame. Tragically, if they do fail—which will be much more likely if the Bill is passed unamended—it will not be the Secretary of State or the Government who pay the price, but the travelling public and the British economy.

I commend our amendment to the House.

5.38 pm

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am almost aghast when I consider where to start. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) sounded to me like the leader of a gang of vandals blaming those trying to clear up the mess for creating it in the first place. I have my own speech to make, but I could spend an hour or so simply responding to what I have just heard.

I welcome the Bill in so far as it is another significant step away from the disasters of privatisation and back towards the sanity of public ownership of Britain's railways. I believe that it is a staging post towards transfer of power from the SRA to the Secretary of State, and towards public accountability. There are those who are concerned about that prospect because, although Ministers are known to be committed to the railways, the Department does not have a glorious record for supporting the railways. I hope that it has had a change of heart, and that it now has officials who are dedicated to the railways—as, indeed, am I. I speak as one who has travelled to work by rail every day for 35 years, and I have a considerable interest in railways, not just because I am a commuter but because I think that they are a vital part of our economy. Our economy could not operate without our railways. Indeed, I think that they should be expanded, to the benefit of us all.

There are ongoing concerns. Indeed, there are concerns about the Bill, but we should dwell on what has happened since privatisation, because that is where the problem has lain. The costs to the Exchequer have been enormous. Public subsidies per journey have been multiplied by five in 10 years, and track renewal costs have been multiplied by four. In British Rail's time, the average cost of a mile of rail track was about £350,000. It is now between £1.5 million and £2 million. That is way beyond inflation; even if one takes account of inflation, the cost is at least three times higher than it was.

Non-rolling stock investment has risen from about £1 billion 10 years ago to nearly £5 billion. I only wish that output had risen by the same amount. At that time there was a system for measuring output called CRWS. I cannot remember what the acronym stands for, but it was developed by BR to keep careful control of costs and ensure that it was getting value for money. That was conveniently junked by Railtrack when it took over, because it thought that markets and competition would take care of efficiency. How wrong it was.

The privateers have, effectively, been ripping off the taxpayer with a complex network of overlapping and interlocking companies paying each other out of public money. The Treasury has been treated as a milch cow by the private companies, and that is where the money has gone.

Let us look at some examples of how the scams operate. There are lots of agencies hiring staff to companies in the industry. Typically, an engineer may be paid £100 to £150 a day, but the agency hiring to the subcontractor will charge three times that amount, just pocketing the cash. A bridge should have cost £3 million to build but the charge was £12 million. The old BR engineers who know how much such things should cost were kept well away from the scheme, as was anyone who had anything to do with Government or the Treasury. Companies want to make sure that they get their money.

There are frequent press reports about the proportion of profit made by rolling stock leasing companies. Typically, there is a 30 per cent. leasing charge for rolling stock. As the money eventually comes out of the public purse or from the fare payer, they are not particularly worried, but 30 per cent. return for a leasing contract is outrageous—and as I have said, track renewal costs are now four times as high as they were.

What happens when a contract is undertaken? The company takes the specification and works rigidly to that specification, even if it is wrong and it can see that there are little mistakes, because it knows that it will be inspected, the mistakes will be found and it will get another contract to put right the mistakes that it failed to deal with in the first contract. It is making money—why should it worry?

Contrast that with the days of BR, when track work was undertaken by direct employees working to tight cash limits and making necessary corrections when jobs were in process. The recently published Catalyst report suggests that Britain's railways, far from being inefficient, were the most efficient in Europe. There was under-investment and they were under-financed, but they were efficient. They had the lowest subsidy, but the highest productivity. One can have high productivity in an under-invested company, because to keep the show on the road, it has to operate efficiently. That is what the railways used to do.

The shadow Minister said something recently about "ramshackle" BR—but Tom Winsor, the rail regulator, said in my hearing in the past year that BR handed over the industry to the privateers "in good order". Despite decades of under-investment, it was in good order. Engineers and people who worked directly in the industry really cared about what was happening. Contrast that with what happens now.

Public ownership worked and privatisation does not. Under public ownership, there was direct employment. We saw the integration of operations and track work. The cash limits made a real difference. At the time, perhaps we did not like cash limits because they made life more difficult, but we have engineers in the other place who say that they worked ingeniously to use the money as best they could to ensure that they did the best possible job within the cash limit.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is living in an unreal world. Any passenger who travelled regularly from the north-east of England to London in the days of British Rail, and who now travels under the auspices of the Great North Eastern Railway company, would say that the service is 10 times better than it was under British Rail. The idea that the service was better under British Rail is a complete fiction. It was awful.

Mr. Hopkins: I am not saying that the railways are worse than they were, given the billions poured into them—they receive much more money than they did—and the fact that they are now more essential because more people travel by rail. The situation was, however, one of under-investment; when the amount of money that they received is taken into account, they performed brilliantly. I could quote examples at length to demonstrate that, and I refer Opposition Members to the report by Catalyst, which demonstrates it clearly.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Does my hon. Friend remember that the line that GNER took over was not only modernised just before then, but had the best rolling stock and facilities? Indeed, it was a good cheap buy.

Mr. Hopkins: I thank my hon. Friend for that helpful intervention.

[Mr. Hopkins]

As I said, I travel by train every day. I may be a bit of a trainspotter, but I listen for wheel flats—that is when the wheels make a banging noise on the track because they have not been reground. The ROSCOs—rolling stock companies—are not concerned, because it only damages the track, and they charge the cost to the public purse or the travelling passenger. Almost every train has at least one wheel flat and some have six or seven. That damages the track and the trains—but who cares, because someone else is paying?

My final point relates to public ownership. Ministers have said that that would cost a lot of money. The reality is that have we paid out such vast sums in the past 10 years that any cost of bringing the railways back into public ownership would be miniscule by comparison. The track is effectively in public ownership already. The franchises can be handed over to a public sector organisation as and when they mature. The rolling stock is the only thing that the public would have to buy back—but they do not even have to do that, because they could negotiate a better deal with the ROSCOs and pay less, at least for the foreseeable future. So there is no problem of cost.

The real argument is, unfortunately, political. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers) did the necessary and important job of getting rid of Railtrack and bringing activities into Network Rail as a stage towards public ownership, I publicly congratulated him on that. He was applauded by Labour Members, although he got great deal of flak from Conservative Members, no doubt representing the shareholding interest.

We now know that my right hon. Friend was told by the Prime Minister that whatever he did, he was not to nationalise the railways. Unfortunately, that put on the brake. The Prime Minister is the leader of the Government and he had his say. However, I refer hon. Members to the recent report by the Transport Committee, chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), which says:

"the Government needs to keep an open mind on the provision of these services directly by the public sector."

I ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to take note of that, and to keep an open mind on public ownership in the future. That is the way forward. Privatisation has been a disastrous failure.

5.48 pm

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): The Bill sets out the legislation required to enact the changes to the railways and railway management consequent on the rail review in the White Paper. As the Secretary of State said, however, much can be delivered without legislation. The critical requirement is for a long-term strategy that has a clear vision of where the railways are going and how that will be delivered. In my view, that can be delivered only by Government. Consequently, the Bill's main principles are right. They are to establish clear responsibility for strategy, operation and regulation.

Clarity is required to ensure that those responsible for delivery in the three categories have a full understanding of what is required of them and what they are responsible for, as well as to ensure value for money, both for the taxpayer and for passengers, and clear accountability from each segment. We will, therefore, support the Bill on Second Reading.

Railways are and should be a vital part of our transport infrastructure. They can and should, however, be able to contribute more than they do. Many parts of the network are at capacity, which constrains growth and will continue to do so, yet we will look to the railways to contribute solutions to road congestion, both through carrying more passengers and more freight. Rail is therefore a national asset that deserves support and investment.

As the Secretary of State has often stated, and reiterated this afternoon, we have reached this point because of historic circumstances: decades of under-investment by Governments of all shades over many years and a privatisation that clearly failed to live up to its prospectus. It is important to understand the past, if for no other reason than to know where we are going in future. Passengers, however, are not particularly interested in the past and apportioning blame does not improve the network. What passengers want is an efficient network, which delivers a safe, reliable and affordable rail system and allows them to get where they want to go punctually. They want a clear strategy for achieving that, and a Department for Transport that is committed to supporting the railways and producing the railway that they want. I was interested by the comment made by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) that the Department for Transport has a reputation of not always delivering that support. I hope that, under its current leadership, it will dedicate itself to ensuring that the railways operate well and efficiently.

Let me therefore begin with general principles. As I have said, there are three separate functions, and the first is strategy. There is a clear need for a strategy so that the public will know what is happening, when it is happening, and who is accountable for it. No one can pretend that waving a magic wand will cure all the troubles of the railways in an instant. That is simply not possible. It will be a long road to putting in the investment necessary for a modern infrastructure and delivering all the services as they should be delivered. Most passengers understand that. What they want is a strategy that sets out a route map for delivering that with clear milestones to be achieved. They want to see who is responsible for delivery in terms of operation. They want that clear strategic framework so that the operators can see what they are doing.

It is clear to me that strategy must be the responsibility of the Government because the Government specify policy and are responsible for public expenditure. The railways will receive public support for some years to come—of that I am sure—so it is absolutely right that the Government shoulder that responsibility clearly and unambiguously.

The second function is delivery. It seems logical that the delivery of the infrastructure should be the role of Network Rail and that it must deliver the operating plans to deliver the strategy. It is for the train operating companies to deliver the services. The way in which franchises can be developed has a role in this regard. I agree with the Secretary of State that there should be fewer franchises, which makes a great deal of sense, and

I would argue that franchises should be much longer to encourage operating companies to commit to the line that they are running and invest in rolling stock.

One of the worst aspects of privatisation was the creation of ROSCOs. The fact that they are all now owned by banks merely indicates that they must have huge money-making potential, because banks do not buy things that do not make money. I believe that that money can be better spent elsewhere in the railways. Were there longer franchises, we could put together a system that would enable those who take on the franchise to invest in rolling stock, which would be a tremendous benefit.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that success should be rewarded in the franchise process and that, if Great North Eastern Railway's bid to renew its successful east coast franchise were to be rejected by the Strategic Railway Authority so that it could get a bigger premium from an operator offering a lower level of service, that would destroy the logic of the franchising system?

John Thurso: My right hon. Friend makes a point that I would have made later: success should be rewarded and, where a franchise operator is clearly delivering a good service to the public, within the parameters that have been set for it, there should be a degree of presumption that such an operator will have that counting in its favour at the time of renewal.

Jeremy Corbyn: The hon. Gentleman's point about ROSCOs is well made and well put. Does he therefore agree that it would be ideal for the national rail network to own the ROSCOs and therefore the rolling stock? Clearly, it is an extraordinarily profitable area with minimal risk involved.

John Thurso: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point. I have not studied the matter in sufficient detail to know whether that is the right answer. Other answers might work. For example, if we consider ferries, particularly in Scotland, the franchise is relatively short, but the Scottish Executive guarantee that, where an investment in a new ship has been made, at the end of the franchise, if the franchise company loses that franchise, the asset is transferred. The Scottish Executive therefore act as a kind of banker. The point is that no third party takes a cut on the way, which, as he would agree, is the evil that needs to be addressed.

The third function is regulation. My hon. Friends and I have long argued for a model of rail regulation more akin to that of the Civil Aviation Authority. The Bill moves in that direction and we are therefore happy to support it. We want a regulator that deals not only with financial aspects of regulation but with safety and, we would add, environmental matters.

The Bill puts both safety and consumer representation into the remit of the Office of Rail Regulation. I agree with the inclusion of both those, but as I have just mentioned, I would like responsibility for the environmental aspects of rail also to be given to the Office of Rail Regulation. Interestingly, in France, locomotives have generally become more fuel-efficient, but that is not the case in this country. That is because neither the size of the engine, nor the amount of fuel consumed, nor the amount of fuel per passenger is taken into account in the specification of the rolling stock. A whole list of aspects come in front of those and, if we are to ensure that rail is among the transport solutions that deliver in terms of using fewer carbon fossil fuels, we must include the environmental consequences in the mix. The best way to do that would be through the Office of Rail Regulation.

We therefore support those principles and the main thrust of the Bill, but there are considerable areas of concern in relation to the details. We look forward to working constructively with the Government in Committee in the hope that they might take on board some of those concerns.

My first concern relates to some of the consequences of the abolition, of which I approve, of the Strategic Rail Authority with regard to the powers that go to the Secretary of State and how he will accountable for them. An allied concern relates to the powers that will go to the devolved legislatures, to London and to the passenger transport executives. It seems to me that the objective is twofold. The first aspect, as I have said, is to have a clear strategy for the railways. It therefore seems extraordinary that the Bill does not lay a specific duty on the Secretary of State to publish that strategy, and neither does it do so on the national bodies. There is a clause in the Bill saying that the national bodies, the Scottish Parliament and the Welsh Assembly, may, if they so choose, publish a strategy, but not that they must do it. It seems to me that if the objective is to have a strategy, there should be a clear duty on both the Secretary of State and the devolved Administrations to publish that strategy.

The second objective is a clear line of accountability. The SRA failed largely because no matter what strategy it came up with, it had no way of putting it into operation; ultimately, it is the Government who have the power to do that. The Bill therefore puts strategy into the Government's hands—I hope that the strategy will be published—but there is no requirement for the Secretary of State to report to Parliament on what has happened during the year. I want him to have a duty to make an annual report, in which he comments on what he has done in the past year, on the bodies for which he is responsible and on updating the strategy. I genuinely hope that the Government will be receptive to that suggestion. It would make them more accountable for their actions and reinforce such actions, rather than diminish them.

I certainly agree with the principle of devolving power. I have always believed that the devolution principle should be, "What can be devolved should be devolved," so it is right that the existing powers of the Scottish Parliament and of the other devolved bodies be reinforced. However, I have two specific concerns, the first of which relates to the representation of passengers. The Bill foreshadows the Rail Passengers Council moving to the Office of Rail Regulation—absolutely right, as that is the correct place for it—but it also envisages the RPC becoming one body for the entire United Kingdom. There is much in that proposal that is good and the current RPC system is fairly unwieldy, to say the least, but while the Bill devolves power to Scotland and Wales so far as responsibility for delivery to passengers is concerned, at the same time it centralises passengers' ability to make representations. That is both illogical and perverse. At the very least, the Bill needs to state how the bodies responsible for delivery—the Scottish Executive and the Welsh Assembly—will relate to passengers.

My second concern, on which the Secretary of State briefly touched in response to an intervention, is how much money will be given to the devolved bodies. Nothing in the Bill sets out how the funding will be apportioned or how the investment will be made. I assume that the Government do not intend to cease funding the devolved bodies completely and say that everything for the rail network must come out of the existing block grants. I assume that there will be some finance, but there should be greater clarity as to what it will be.

The money required splits into two areas: maintenance and investment. Maintenance is not a problem as it can be dealt with on a straight per mile basis, but investment is more difficult. For example, how much money will go to Scotland for new investment? One could decide to use the Barnett formula, but that clearly would not work. It is based on a per capita calculation and works out at about 7.3 per cent.; at the very least, any ratio should be based on mileage. Scotland has some 13.3 per cent. of the national railway mileage, so that factor could be taken into account.

Alternatively, one could use a ratio based on current spend, but there is a danger in that method. The investments made in the past few years have largely centred on major English projects, particularly the west coast main line. Such a method of funding would therefore freeze in a future bias against Scotland. We need a formula that is reasonably flexible and that permits the Scottish Executive and the Welsh Assembly to know what funding they will have to introduce the improvements that they want to make. We want the Bill to ensure that improvements in the service from Edinburgh to Aberdeen or to Inverness are more likely, rather than less.

The Secretary of State's proposal concerning the ORR makes a great deal of sense, but we want to ensure that the safety duties are properly carried out and not conflated with the functional side. Part 3 sets out the modification to the Rail Passengers Council. As I have pointed out, the general principle is fine, with the proviso that we need to consider the important issue of how to deal with the devolved Administrations.

Perhaps my greatest worry relates to part 4, which appears to have only one purpose: to make closures and reduced services easier to implement. Why do the Government want to do that? In the light of that and of last week's announcement on community rail, there is serious concern that this could be another back-door Beeching. Beeching made some serious errors in his approach to the railways, not least in his appreciation of cost. One problem is that branch lines' costs are apportioned to them by Network Rail on an average cost basis—in the days of Beeching, they were apportioned by British Rail—but the true cost could be much less. In averaging out those costs, all the high-class, high-speed lines are included with the lower-class, lower-speed ones. It is the branch lines that tend to be the much slower, lower specification lines, and we need to ensure that a true costing of them is made, so that they are not closed in error. Beeching failed to take into account that closing branch lines removes passengers from main lines, because those who need to travel to a connecting line end up going by car, rather than taking the train.

The role of the railways in moving freight is also important and needs to be encouraged. I was sorry to discover that, in the more recent rail targets, the previous ones have been dropped. It is important that freight move from road to rail, so I hope that when the Secretary of State's long-term vision is published, it will not only make room for freight but clearly indicate that the Government regard rail freight as a way to help combat road congestion.

Mr. Hopkins: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a real need for new lines, particularly dedicated freight lines? Such lines might ease the pressure on passenger lines and allow them to run trains at much higher speeds; indeed, they might enable the creation of dedicated passenger lines.

John Thurso: I certainly agree that new capacity is needed. The biggest challenge that the Secretary of State for Transport will face—whoever it may then be—will be the lack of capacity. Indeed, many are saying that the east coast main line will run out of capacity by approximately 2015. However, I have a slightly different solution from the hon. Gentleman's. I would take the fast trains off the existing network, put them on a dedicated high-speed line and create a fast intercity connection, particularly on the north-south route. The capacity that such a removal of high-speed trains would deliver could then be used to create more freight lines and, indeed, more passenger lines.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we should also consider maximising the slots set aside for freight, which often has to compete with an increasingly overloaded passenger network in some parts of the country, through strategic methods such as upgrading lines and planning properly the interface between freight and passenger routes? Should not a key part of any strategic view of the future of rail be such an integrated view of freight and passenger travel?

John Thurso: I believe that a critical indicator on which the success of the Government's changes will be measured is whether that capacity for rail is maintained and maximised in the way that the hon. Gentleman suggested. I agree with him on that.

I have no doubt that the railways face considerable challenges in the years ahead. Quite apart from the investment needed to catch up on decades of under-spend, new investment will be required over the years. As I said, the east coast main line is forecast by many commentators to reach capacity by 2015. We will need new solutions and other areas will have similar problems. One day, I hope that we will accept the need for a dedicated high-speed rail network.

The Bill provides the framework in which a genuine and much needed long-term strategy can be put in place. That is why I and my hon. Friends will support it.

However, it is for the Secretary of State and his Department to live up to the expectations created by the Bill. For the sake of future rail passengers, I sincerely hope that they are achieved.

6.11 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to speak after the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) because I have always wanted to say the name of that constituency, which is such a wonderful title.

The Bill is important, but small. If we choose to criticise certain aspects, it is not because we fail to regard it as a positive assessment of the real problems that the railway industry faces. Rather, it is because we want to tell the Government that they are doing pretty well, but ask them if they can please do a little bit better.

It is important to understand that some of the problems arising are not new, but need a bit of new and lateral thinking. It is essential for the Government to provide very firm leadership. The Strategic Rail Authority did not provide it and in the new round of franchises, we must be quite clear about what passengers want, what efficiencies are needed and what changes are necessary.

I hope that the Secretary of State will look closely into what is happening in the centre of the railway system around Birmingham. It is a sort of central node, yet the organisation of the services is, frankly, not working. People experience great difficulties there, but an opportunity exists now that much of the rolling stock and diesels have been freed up and are available to run longer services; from the south-west to the north-east and from the south-east to the north-west. By using those trains and providing an hourly service, we could begin to sort out some of those difficulties and provide a much higher standard of service for customers.

When one gets beyond the day-to-day determination of what is needed for the various franchises, it becomes clear that the Railways Bill, which has some useful parts, is worrying in one or two small details. I hope that the Secretary of State will forgive me if I highlight one of them, but I will not be doing the sort of rant about local government personalities that we have heard from Conservative Front Benchers tonight. When I hear determined attempts to make Ken Livingstone into a bogeyman, I wonder whether he has some arrangement with Conservative Members, by which they give him all that free publicity and build him up in a way that, undoubtedly, he warmly welcomes. If they could tell me what the arrangement is, perhaps I could make a contribution and they could demonise me in the same way. I am sure that it would improve my chances of re-election.

There are some real problems with the franchises. I want to comment briefly on those who are choosing to suggest, for reasons that I do not understand, that the next round of franchises will be greatly influenced by personalities and the relationship between various personalities and various political parties. Whatever one says about granting franchises and whatever one's view of companies' abilities to run the franchises that they take over, I do not think that anyone has seriously suggested that those decisions were taken on the basis of the popularity or otherwise of the management of the companies concerned.

Yet the rumour is now gaining considerable weight within the eastern region. A case is already being built; if there are any difficulties with GNER, they will be due entirely to the fact that the Labour Government are not prepared to allow certain people to take over certain franchises. That is so bizarre. Usually, I would not bother to comment on such things, but it is important to make it clear once and for all that if we are to retain a franchise system, it will be done simply on the basis of efficiency and value for money for the taxpayer and the passenger.

Personally, I would like to see much tougher conditions and quality of service written into the franchises. I am sure that the Secretary of State is not only alive to that possibility, but wants to ensure that it happens in the next round. We cannot allow the sort of interpretation of "flexibility of programming" whereby if an efficient and timely service cannot be run, bus substitution or some other cheaper way of providing a service is viewed as acceptable to assist the overall finances without consideration of what that means for the passengers. I am afraid that bus substitution is no substitution for an efficient and competent service.

Jeremy Corbyn: I wholly agree with my hon. Friend that bus substitution is no substitute; indeed, it often ends up driving people away from the public sector altogether. However, is she concerned about the possibility of the community rail initiative going in that direction, with the Devon and Cornwall branch lines, for example, being viewed as appropriate for bus substitution? That would be rather similar to what Beeching did for many of the Norfolk branch lines, as it resulted in fewer passengers using either bus or rail transport.

Mrs. Dunwoody: The Secretary of State knows that the community rail partnerships are capable of producing really high-quality services. The combination of the needs of local people with the desire to provide a good railway system often improves not just the stations, services and passenger information, but even the quality of ride.

I sincerely believe that the Secretary of State wants to develop that and I do not concur with any suggestion that it is all about some hidden attempt to cut services. I know that my right hon. Friend will not expect us to sit quietly here, should there be a move, even by default, towards such a policy. He and I both know that using taxpayers' money well means providing what taxpayers want, which is continuing community involvement in railways and continuing provision of links between smaller railway lines and the main lines. We all know what happened in the past when, for one reason or another, those lines were discontinued. I am quite convinced that the Bill is not a back-door way of cutting community services. Indeed, I hope to see them developed and improved under the Bill.

However, I do have some concerns. I hope that the Secretary of State will make it quite clear that the rearrangement whereby safety becomes the responsibility of the Office of Rail Regulation should not be regarded by anyone as a cost-cutting measure. It will, I hope, produce a high level of safety, and we should not assume that it will be a cheaper service to run. I think that it will, in fact, be cheaper because it will be much more efficient. By definition, that should mean not having the same overheads, but it must be made clear to the people concerned that it is not a means of spending less on safety. We are seeking a higher standard and we want to maintain it across the network because we happen to think that that is how it should be in the future.

What will determine that will be the quality of the staff in the new office and their experience. Network Rail could undertake much of its own safety work, in the way that British Rail did, because of its particular involvements and the experience that it will build up. However, we need assurances from everyone that that particular development will not be regarded as a cheaper approach. For example, £578 million was spent on the installation of the train protection and warning system, but safety is not only a question of an immediate response to a problem, but of long-term value for money. That is essential. I also hope that the Transport and Works Act inquiry into the extension of the railway in the west midlands will be made available in due course, because it will have an impact on major lines.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State intends to streamline the rail passengers committees, which will be an improvement. No matter how genuine and hardworking the individual members of those committees are, the structure is unwieldy. The passengers do not know where to go to complain, there is no clear line through which to answer complaints and many hon. Members have had to undertake inquiries that would be best left to the committees. I hope that the streamlining will include the provision of a reasonable advertising budget, so that in the future no one need be unclear about where to go to obtain redress for what are real problems.

I should have liked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of state to address the issue of rolling stock. We have already debated the untenable position of rolling stock companies or ROSCOs, which will walk away with large sums of money. Can my right hon. Friend give us an assurance that ROSCOs will be asked to contribute to retaining the rolling stock industry in the United Kingdom? That would be a source of great comfort. It is frightening that at a time when the taxpayer is at long last committing large sums to rolling stock, including improving general carriages, the work will go to overseas companies.

The companies, sensibly, have made strong efforts to produce the responses that the Government want, but we are losing jobs in the rolling stock industry very quickly. Once the expertise is lost, it cannot be regained easily or speedily. However, we know that we will soon need more and more new contracts fulfilled, and I want to see them fulfilled in the UK.

Mr. Hopkins: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the problems for the rolling stock manufacturers is that they do not have stable ordering programmes? Planning is required at a national level to guarantee stable orders for a long-term future.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I agree. Indeed, the Government should accept that we must have a research unit—including manufacturers, universities with transport departments and the industry generally—that plans new rolling stock, freight services and new provision across the board. We are investing the cash, but we are losing jobs. People in the industry have the right to expect that their expertise be not ignored or forgotten. I am sad that the Bill contains no indication of any such development in the future.

The changes in the Bill are long overdue. The SRA, for reasons that are well known, was not working. It did not have the powers and it was not capable of translating imaginative leadership into practical results for the rail industry. We desperately need decisions to be taken now. There are worries about the removal of powers from the PTEs to sign rail franchises and the granting of franchises to those who run bus companies; those concerned regard rail and bus services as parallel and do not understand the differences between them. However, the Bill offers an opportunity to begin to bring the benighted rail industry into shape, so that passengers no longer have to demonstrate stoic resignation in the face of difficulties, but can say cheerfully that this is the first Government to commit large sums of money to the issue, the first to show imagination about the rail industry's problems and the first to deliver the goods.

Mr. David Wilshire (Spelthorne) (Con): The general thesis of this debate is that Britain's rail network is in a mess. That mess is of the Government's making. Even if Labour Members dispute that and claim that it owes something to privatisation, it is no justification for the Government to claim that it has nothing to do with them. The Government have had seven years to do something. To try to blame the mess on other people after all that time is total nonsense. The British railway system is in a mess and the Government have been the main architects of that.

The Bill will make matters worse rather than better. I am content to support some items in the Bill, but overall I oppose it. As the representative of the usual channels who will sit on the Committee, and unfettered by the rules that apply to my opposite numbers, I will be able to explain in some detail why I do so.

Mr. Tom Harris: The hon. Gentleman opposes this Bill and I understand that he also opposed the previous Act. Would he have been content for the 1997 situation to continue unchanged?

Mr. Wilshire: Of course I want to see the railways improved, but this Bill is the not the right way to go about it. If the hon. Gentleman is lucky enough to have to put up with me in Committee again, he will hear in some detail exactly why I think he is wrong and my party is right.

The Bill is an admission by the Government of their failures. In 2000, the Government told us that they had the answer to the railways' problems—the SRA. We did not think that the SRA was a good idea, and it gives me little satisfaction to say, "We told you so." We were told that the SRA was the solution, yet—without apology from the Secretary of State—we are now told that it is the cause of the trouble. The Government have failed, but either they cannot see that or they have the brass neck not to say sorry. That is a bit much.

The Bill also shows a failure to understand a basic truth that I like to think most people have now grasped. It is that politicians and bureaucrats are useless at running businesses. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) is no longer in his place, because I listened with amazement—and a little amusement—to his contribution. It appears that dinosaurs are not extinct yet. The thrust of his argument was that nationalised businesses are good and the private sector is evil.

I thought about that for a moment, while the hon. Gentleman began to talk a load of other nonsense, and I realised that what I had heard from the Labour Benches was an argument that vehicle makers—the makers of aircraft, cars, trams and trains—should be nationalised because they are in the private sector, that private sector road builders and road repairers should be nationalised, and that airport builders and operators should be nationalised because they apparently do not work, according to the hon. Member for Luton, North. Of course, using the same argument that only nationalised businesses are any good if they are involved in transport, he would presumably advocate the nationalisation of airlines, bus operators and taxi operators. It is nice to know that good old-fashioned, left-wing Labour flourishes.

Jeremy Corbyn rose—

Mr. Wilshire: Ah.

Jeremy Corbyn: My hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) is not in the Chamber, but one should give credit to his argument, which I support. The railways and the buses in particular in this country would not survive but for the massive public investment in them and public support for those services. Some £10 billion invested in rail subsidies has resulted in £1 billion of profit to the private sector. Is that a good return on public money?

Mr. Wilshire: I disagree with that argument. Just because someone puts up the money does not mean that they must own everything. I am glad to see that the hon. Member for Luton, North has returned to the Chamber. I am sorry that he missed my comments, and I am sure that he will thoroughly enjoy reading them in Hansard in the morning.

Not only does the Bill fail to address past mistakes, but it will make at least another mistake that will make matters worse: it will give the Mayor of London more power. I take the strictures suggested by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) not to give names to those people, but the Bill will give the Mayor of London, whoever it may be—the hon. Lady might want to stand for that post one day, who knows?—more power, particularly over things outside London. I shall say why that is a huge mistake in a moment. I worry about another issue that I fear could be a mistake. Again, I shall explain it in a moment. I am worried that, rather than improving safety, the Bill might run the risk of making matters worse in some respects.

As for the main part of the Bill—the abolition of the SRA—the Secretary of State said that things had gone wrong in the past, but he could not bring himself to say that the SRA was a disaster. It was a good thing—so good that he wants to abolish it. When I intervened on him about that, he accused me of not understanding the reasoned amendment tabled by the Conservative party. Despite the fact that the Secretary of State said that the reasoned amendment says that we want to keep the SRA, try as I might— reading and re-reading it—I have failed to find the words "We want to keep the SRA." The Secretary of State was wrong in attributing something to the reasoned amendment that simply is not there. All we say in respect of the SRA is that, in abolishing it, the Government are giving powers to politicians and bureaucrats. That is what we are against in relation to the SRA, as our reasoned amendment makes clear.

The SRA was not only ineffective, but a waste of money. Let us simply look at the facts of the matter. The Office of Passenger Rail Franchising cost the British taxpayer £13 million and employed 187 staff in 2000–01—its last year in existence before its replacement by the SRA. We are now asked to abolish its replacement, which costs the British taxpayer £102 million and employs 454 people. Not only was the SRA a failure, but it was a waste of time and money too.

I am only too pleased to support the abolition of the SRA in principle—to that extent, I support what the Government propose in the Bill—but I am not happy to pass the responsibility upwards to politicians and bureaucrats. I want the responsibilities and work passed downwards to where they can really make a difference—to the travelling public.

Mr. Hopkins: I am following what the hon. Gentleman says; but in effect, this noble House keeps being maligned. Ultimate accountability will be closer to the House, so we will have some say in the costs and the running of the railways. We do not have that say now.

Mr. Wilshire: One must distinguish the input of taxpayers' money from the operation of the service. I do not understand what is gained by passing responsibility and accountability for what the passengers must endure to the House. I accept that the hon. Gentleman is a regular passenger, but he has an input to make not in his capacity as the Member for Luton, North, but as a regular user of train services. The real accountability for the railways ought to lie with the people who depend on them and use them, not with politicians, because our record—I almost said track record, but I ask the House to forgive that sort of pun—in these matters is not something that we can be proud of.

The issue of the SRA, politicians and bureaucrats is not the only thing that concerns me; I am also concerned about giving more responsibilities to Network Rail—that wonderful, unaccountable organisation. We are not quite sure what it is, who is in it or how it is established, but the one thing that it is not is accountable to anyone. The White Paper made a fair point when it said that the franchise operators tended to try to pass the buck and that, somehow or other, they could wriggle around their responsibilities by pointing the finger at Network Rail.

[Mr. Wilshire]

What is the wondrous solution that the Government come up with? They want to make it easier for the franchise operators to say, "Nothing to do with me, guv." As we go through the Bill, we discover that Network Rail will be responsible for the performance of the railways. The people who operate the trains should be responsible for that. The Government will make Network Rail responsible for planning. Again, the people who operate the railways should be responsible for that.

Worst of all, the Government will make Network Rail responsible for the timetables. I find that quite extraordinary. If a train does not arrive or something is changed, my constituents rightly complain to South West Trains, asking, "What do you think you're playing at?" In the future, South West Trains and the other companies will say, "Nothing to do with us. This is what we were told to do." That is the exact opposite of making the franchise operators more accountable. Network Rail's job is to hold the operators to account, not to take the responsibility itself. When responsibility is removed, those involved become irresponsible.

Mr. Tom Harris: On a point of information, the hon. Gentleman may well be right, but I understand that the SRA, not the train operators, sets the timetables. In fact, the situation for the train companies will remain the same when the Bill is enacted.

Mr. Wilshire: The arrangements are all very vague at the moment. If I understand the White Paper correctly, the responsibility is split, but no one is quite sure. The allegation in the White Paper is that it is possible to pass the buck. To stop that happening in future, everything will lie with this wonderful thing called Network Rail.

The Secretary of State told us in magisterial terms—if I noted this down correctly—that only the Government can handle strategy. I think that he said that twice. That was his great assertion. Let us give a little thought to the Secretary of State's performance in respect of the strategic handling of the railways. My hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), who opened the debate for the Conservative party, mentioned the Gatwick Express. The strategic thinking about the future of the Gatwick Express involves getting commuters to use it, making life more difficult for air travellers, thus driving the people who use Gatwick back on to the roads. Is it joined-up thinking and an integrated transport policy to attack a success, turn it into something else and undermine the principles in the aviation White Paper? That is really "strategic".

Dr. Whitehead: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's alternative theory of how one moves towards a strategic view of the railways. Will he explain how, for example, one might increase and enhance freight capacity on the railways? Would that strategic responsibility lie in the hands of the freight companies or the passenger companies, or perhaps with the travelling public?

Mr. Wilshire: I am sure that my opposite number in the usual channels will have listened with some care to that intervention and spotted another volunteer to sit on the Committee and listen to me explaining at some length the answers to precisely those questions. I am having difficulty finding people for the Standing Committee, but it appears that my contribution is helping to produce Labour Members who are willing to serve and hear my pearls of wisdom.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Wilshire: Ah, here is another one.

Mr. Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on the fact that, as we listen to his speech, those of us who wish to serve on the Committee become less likely by the minute to do so?

Mr. Wilshire: You ain't heard nothin' yet, is my response to that.

The lack of joined-up strategic thinking by the Government does not end with the Gatwick Express. It has taken some effort to beat off the stupid idea that the Heathrow Express should be turned into part of Crossrail and made to stop here, there and everywhere. Not only do the Government want to undermine Gatwick's success, but they want to undermine Heathrow's as well and put at risk a large number of jobs in my constituency.

Jeremy Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on the fact that the Heathrow Express is the world's most expensive railway, bar none, to travel on? Would he not be better employed in endeavouring to bring its prices more into line with those on other train services that operate along almost the same piece of track, apart from the short distance into Heathrow airport itself?

Mr. Wilshire: The cost of the Heathrow Express is a separate issue from the attempt to prevent it fulfilling its function, which is providing a service to Heathrow for passengers. I hear the hon. Gentleman's comment about the cost—I, too, have reservations in that respect—but the cost has nothing to do with trying to close it and turn it into part of Crossrail.

It is not only with the Heathrow Express that the Government's joined-up thinking comes adrift. Consider the attempts to build Airtrack at Heathrow. The Government produce an aviation White Paper that states that Heathrow has a role to play in the future of air transport in this country, but it can develop only if surface access is via public transport, not by road. However, we encounter attempts to stop the Heathrow Express, which is part of that strategic policy, and obstacles in the way of building Airtrack, which is a route from Heathrow into my constituency and thence to Waterloo or Victoria. That has happened because the Government choose a priority—commuters—and do not think through the implications for something just as important, namely, the successful continuation of British aviation. That does not make sense.

The position worsens when we examine the Bill's provisions for London. All the rail services into my constituency and all the stations in my constituency are targets for Transport for London—its representatives told me so in a meeting on 19 October and made their desire to take over all of that crystal clear. When I asked them what they meant by taking over, they told me that TFL wanted to organise the timetables: never mind my constituents, it would be done for the convenience of London. They said TFL wanted to control fares: never mind what rail travel ought to cost my constituents, fares would be decided according to what is good for London. They told me that TFL would be responsible for improvements made to train services in its greatly expanded empire. That worried me, because I saw what happened to the buses in London—the huge expenditure and losses, and fares jacked up to pay for them. I realised that my constituents were in danger of having their rail fares increased to pay for—who knows what? Almost certainly not rail services in Spelthorne.

South West Trains has a programme of improving stations and platforms in my constituency and others outside London. I have no confidence, unless the Bill is amended, that money taken from commuters living in my constituency will not be squandered elsewhere in London for some politically correct programme that Transport for London prefers to helping my constituents. I cannot help wondering whether the plan goes further than the Bill admits. The Mayor of London has an undisguised desire to grab areas surrounding London and make his empire even bigger and he has made it crystal clear that my constituency is one of his prime targets. Perhaps he thinks that if he gets control of my rail services, he will be able to argue that Spelthorne ought to be part of London, after all.

The Bill suggests that we can overcome the problem of taking representations from people who do not live and therefore do not vote in Greater London by having two members of the board of TFL from outside the capital. I thought that, in principle, that might work, but then I looked at the details, and what did I find? The Mayor has to consult the regional assembly—that discredited body that no one in the south-east wants. What do people on the Isle of Wight have to contribute to a discussion about what is best for rail services in my constituency and Heathrow? Nothing. Surely consultation ought to be with those who will be affected by the change. Another thing I have discovered about the arrangement to try to buy us off and keep us quiet is a restriction that only two members of the board of TFL can be elected members of a principal council.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): My hon. Friend is making a powerful point. Is it not possible to engage in consultation, then totally ignore the views expressed therein? Is that not likely to happen in the situation that he is describing?

Mr. Wilshire: That is precisely what the Department for Transport seems to specialise in doing. It consulted on dualling the A303 in south Somerset down into Devon, and the proposal commanded widespread support from local councils, which thought it was precisely the right thing to do, but the Department ignored their views—a wonderful arrangement.

As I was saying, only two members of the board of Transport for London may be councillors. I have not discovered what the present membership of the board is, but let us suppose that there are two elected members on it. Even if people outside London are given some sort of representation on the board, therefore, they will be barred by statute from being represented by persons who have a democratic mandate to speak on their behalf. That is not democracy. It is a sop to try to keep us quiet—but we have spotted it.

I mentioned my concern about safety—an issue that I raise with some trepidation. I know that one of the responses is that the proposed arrangement is modelled on the air accidents investigation branch and on the Civil Aviation Authority's system, about which I know a fair bit and which seems to work. However, I have always had some reservations both about the CAA's safety arrangements and the AAIB. I note that as well as being responsible for safety, the Office of Rail Regulation is responsible for performance and costs. I would not mind if it was only responsible for safety—we could have a discussion about that. However, trying to improve performance and keep costs down often produces pressure to cut corners, and if an organisation that is responsible for safety faces that pressure to cut corners, I worry. I am sure that my concern can be laid to rest and that the Government can deal with the issue, but I believe that, as the Bill stands, there is a risk to the safety of rail passengers.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich said that it might be cheaper to transfer functions carried out by the Health and Safety Executive to an existing body. I accept that argument, and understand why some people say that the CAA carries out such a role for air travel. However, there is a fundamental difference between air travel and surface transport. Everything that happens in the air can easily be brought within the ambit of aviation, so a single-issue approach is appropriate. However, on the ground, railways and roads are both involved, so people would ask whether something was wholly a railway matter, it partly a railway matter or something else. There is a danger of duplication, so perhaps we should consider making surface accidents the responsibility of a single organisation. Although I am concerned about those issues, I am not prepared to assert that I am right. I hope, however, that the Government are prepared to address them.

The Bill represents yet another missed opportunity by the Government, who are merely moving deckchairs around the Titanic. The White Paper said that the railways should be "more customer-focused" and "more passenger-friendly." The Bill, however, does the exact opposite. It marginalises people who work with customers and weakens passenger input, substituting remote national politicians and the unaccountable Network Rail. It is, as I said at the beginning of my speech, an admission of the Government's failure, and it will make matters worse, not better.

Mr. Graham Stringer (Manchester, Blackley) (Lab): To reassure the hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), I can tell him that the railways were in charge of their own safety for many years before that responsibility was handed over to the Health and Safety Executive. There has been a century of improvement in railway safety, so although the hon. Gentleman made some interesting points, we do not need to worry about them.

Our debate has lacked annoyance, perhaps even anger, at what has happened to our railways in the 11 years since the Railways Act 1993. To try to gain some perspective, I looked at the Second Reading of the Bill that set up the Strategic Rail Authority in July 1999. Fascinatingly, in that debate, Opposition Members were completely satisfied with privatisation. I am caricaturing, of course, but the essence of their argument was that nationalisation of the railways had never worked and never would, thus justifying the extremely high costs incurred in selling the railways to Railtrack. Interestingly, in 1999 the railways were valued at six times the price at which they were sold off—the Public Accounts Committee concluded that the railways had been undervalued and sold in haste.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): Does the hon. Gentleman think that by any chance the attitude that the Labour party took at the time of privatisation had some influence on the price?

Mr. Stringer: The major influence on the price was the deep underlying philosophy of the Conservative party that it had to do something to get the problem off its hands. On the other side of the equation, ROSCOs—rolling stock companies—were sold off in an unregulated way and were sold on almost immediately for a third more.

That was the situation that we faced, but it became a great deal worse. Labour Members were keen that the SRA should provide a sensible direction for the disparate rail industry, which, admittedly, was giving a good financial performance. The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor), for example, said on Second Reading of the Railways Bill in 1999 that eventually the railways would be operated without any cost to the public sector. Even though he was right according to his own terms of reference, events proved him wrong.

Railtrack was not a railway company, so it was not controlled. It turned into a rapacious property development company that paid scant regard to the safety of travellers and passengers. "Broken Rails" by Christian Wolmar sets out in great detail the way in which privatisation of the railways and the establishment of Railtrack led to poor railway maintenance. The chief executive of Railtrack got off extremely lightly. Hon. Members may not know that before the accident at Paddington he claimed that the station was the safest in the world. That was mere bravado, and he was not interested in the problems. Subcontractors to Railtrack and smaller groups were operating at a large profit without any direct control, so it was clear that the chief executive had no idea what was going on.

Railtrack has now been replaced by Network Rail, and there is a huge subsidy for the railways. It is difficult to know from the figures what is investment and what is subsidy, but the Government have made two attempts prior to the introduction of the present Railways Bill to put things right. I have already talked about Network Rail—[Interruption.] Opposition Members may laugh, but I do not think that the Government got it right at the time, and I do not wish to defend everything that they did. They acted to provide a sensible direction for a disparate industry, which was beginning to show the cracks.

It is clear, however, that the overlap between the responsibilities of the SRA and the rail regulator were not properly thought through. In its report on the future of the railways, the Transport Committee said that the rail regulator could effectively overrule the SRA, the Secretary of State for Transport and the Treasury and decide how much money went into the railways. I do not believe that that situation was envisaged by the then Secretary of State in 1999; it was a mistake that led to the spending of a great deal of public money, not all of it on investment.

The Government made another attempt to put things right when they created Network Rail after Railtrack had failed both as a property company and in its fundamental duty of running the railways. Network Rail is an improvement, but it is an odd body, and it is difficult to know whether it is in the public or the private sector. It cannot continue in its present form for long, because there is clearly no direct accountability for the money that is spent, either to shareholders or to the Government. It is run by people with vested interests in the railway system. It may work better than Railtrack did, because those people have the interests of the railways at heart, but it will not work in the medium term.

I am disappointed that the Bill does not provide for an improvement in the structure of Network Rail. I see the Bill as a step forward, and in the right direction, but I do not believe that Network Rail is the right medium or long-term solution for the railways. We do not know how taxpayers' money is being spent in the rail system. Network Rail is a vehicle for keeping £100 billion worth of debt off the public accounts. Everybody knows that, and it does not seem sensible to keep an unsatisfactory structure in place to hide something that everybody has seen. That is not a long-term solution.

On the amount of extra money that has been spent and attempts to disaggregate it, Professor Roderick Smith told the Transport Committee that for between £11 billion and £27 billion—the amount of money wasted in the rail system is probably within that range of expenditure—we could have had a new rail system. That is the extraordinary sum that has been wasted.

I support the Bill, and I will vote for it on Second Reading, because it addresses some of the problems in the rail system. Primarily it addresses the need for public accountability for money. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) did not tell us how the large amounts of public money that have been put into the rail system should be accounted for. I believe that there should be accountability for taxpayers' money, and the Bill makes the Secretary of State accountable. That does not mean that the Secretary of State will control the entire railway system. Many of those responsibilities will remain within the rail regulatory system and within Network Rail, but the Secretary of State will take responsibility for the public money and some of the major strategies involved.

There are three aspects of the Bill, to which I shall speak briefly. I mentioned the first in response to the contribution from the hon. Member for Spelthorne—the removal of responsibility for health and safety in the rail system from the Health and Safety Executive. I fully support that decision. It is clearly a brave decision for a Secretary of State to take, because if there is an accident—and there can be an accident in any system—people will tend to point the finger at him. That would be the wrong conclusion to come to. It is clear from the evidence to the Select Committee of Mr. Osborne, who for a period was in charge of safety at the HSE, occupying the position recommended by the Cullen inquiry, that the rail industry had lost confidence in the HSE to pursue safety in the rail industry.

The Select Committee also found many cases of gold-plating—public money spent on minor safety improvements. The money would have been much better spent elsewhere within the transport system. Spending £1 billion in one place to achieve very little improvement in safety means that £1 billion less is being spent elsewhere—for example, on the roads, where 3,000 people a year are killed. I am pleased with the change, and I would hate to see it misrepresented. I was a great supporter of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 when it was introduced—

Mr. Greg Knight: The official Opposition broadly agree with the points that the hon. Gentleman is making about the Health and Safety Executive. Subject to hearing what the Minister has to say further in Committee, we think that the decision is broadly the right one.

Mr. Stringer: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. I am not sure that it is always career-enhancing to have Opposition Members agreeing with me, but I thank him for that intervention.

The other two aspects on which I shall comment are, first, rail substitution, and then the right of passenger transport executives to sign franchises. On rail-bus substitution, there is an implication in the Bill of a one-way ratchet. If the PTEs are willing to take the money currently applied to rail lines and put it into bus services, as a reward for transferring that money they will be allowed to regulate those buses. In some cases that might be sensible. In some urban areas there are probably a very few railway lines that do not have a future use. None the less, I ask the Secretary of State why, if a failing railway line triggers bus regulation, bus regulation is not triggered by failing bus services, such as those in north Manchester, and other major cities and metropolitan areas? It does not make sense to say that if a railway fails the PTE can regulate the buses, but if buses fail, there is no competition and the bus companies rip off the public sector with cartels, the PTE cannot undertake regulation.

There is a further point about rail-bus substitution. Regulation and quality contracts will be allowed if the Secretary of State agrees and they are within the terms of the local transport plan. The local transport plans have been given four objectives by Government—to reduce congestion, improve road safety, improve accessibility and reduce pollution. Nobody could disagree with those aims, but having served on a passenger transport authority and on a city council for a long time, I know that those are not the only objectives of public transport systems. They are good objectives, but two related objectives that should be recognised are getting more people into city centres and something that is probably even more important—supporting urban regeneration schemes.

There are some urban regeneration schemes in Greater Manchester that will not happen if there are only bus services. They need light rail and in some cases heavy rail, or light rail substitution for heavy rail. The Government are too narrow in their objectives for local transport plans if that is the basis on which they allow the substitution of heavy rail for buses. When I asked the Secretary of State about that in the Transport Committee, he said that it was very difficult to measure urban regeneration. Indeed it is.

It is very difficult to measure congestion. The Department for Transport and the Secretary of State have failed for some years to come up with a universally agreed measure of congestion. I ask the Secretary of State a simple question: is Leeds more congested than Manchester? Is Leeds more congested than Birmingham? Is Birmingham more congested than Manchester? If there were a simple measure, there would be a simple answer. The degree of difficulty in measuring something does not mean that it should not be measured. For most councils and most passenger transport authorities, one of their top priorities would be urban regeneration.

The issue of the passenger transport executives' right to sign franchises has been touched on by other speakers. I have said on a number of occasions that I agree with the Government's declared intention to devolve responsibilities to the passenger transport executives, and I listened carefully to what the Secretary of State said in response to a number of interventions on that subject. To summarise, he said that there had been at least one difficulty when a PTE had used a delay in signing to haggle for extra resources. Surely he could take to himself the power to intervene if PTEs unreasonably withheld the signature; I do not seen any problem with that.

It was also suggested that it would be simpler if the Secretary of State took control and effectively devolved responsibility back to the PTEs, allowing them to sign franchises if he agreed. I think that that is a complicating factor, as PTEs and members of PTAs are much more likely to end up spending a lot of time negotiating with Whitehall officials, who will almost inevitably not understand the circumstances in Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Newcastle or elsewhere. That arrangement will be more time-consuming than allowing PTEs to do what, with only one exception, they have done successfully and without any problems.

I welcome the fact that the Secretary of State told the Select Committee that on that matter he would consider representations, and what was said in the Standing Committee. He also said today that he would meet a delegation from the House of Commons passenger transport executive group, which has recently been set up. I hope to persuade him in those discussions that the current proposals are centralising ones that conflict with the objectives set out in the White Paper, with which I agree.

I support the Bill as a step forward and a way of ensuring more accountability for public money. It does not go as far as I would like, it leaves some odd structures in the railway industry that are probably not as effective as they could be and will not deliver as well as they should, and there are some detailed parts of it that I look forward to discussing in Committee.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I wish to start with an apology, as I will shortly be chairing a meeting that I have organised and must leave the Chamber immediately after my speech. No disrespect is intended.

It is a matter of only a few weeks since the tragic rail disaster at Ufton near Newbury. My constituent, Emily Webster, a schoolgirl, was sadly one of the five who died. I have since had conversations with her family and her father, and they are all concerned about rail safety. Her father in particular has raised the issue of seat belts in trains, which I shall come to later. The Bill transfers health and safety responsibilities to the Office of Rail Regulation and the question that we must ask now and on which we have to test the Government in Committee is whether that will improve rail safety.

My hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) likened what is proposed to a Civil Aviation Authority approach. The one thing about the CAA is that it responds and carries out its inquiries quickly and looks into what needs to be remedied, after which the air industry does its repairs promptly. One aspect of the rail inquiries that we have had in the past is that they have taken a long time. Recommendations made in other inquiries are often not fully taken up and are sometimes not implemented. It is all very well to say that rail travel is a safe mode of transport. Yes, it is—it is far safer than flying or driving—but that is no excuse for saying that we should not improve standards even further.

I had a conversation earlier with my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel), two of whose constituents tragically died. He cannot be present because of previous commitments, but he raised a number of safety issues relating to the Ufton disaster. It appears that the emergency hammers that are used to break the glass broke before the glass did, so the windows could not be knocked out. Perhaps people were hitting the windows in the wrong place, but could not see the emergency signs. He asked whether there should be additional emergency lighting.

It appears that the points near the crossing may have added to the disaster. If that is the case, it is a safety issue that needs to be explored further. Perhaps all crossings near points need to be looked at in detail to see whether it is possible to ensure that a chain of events that was perhaps a freak, but a tragedy none the less, cannot be repeated.

Another point that my hon. Friend made was about people leaving the accident scene without their names having been taken. That may cause problems in relation to post-traumatic shock, but evidence is a problem. We have referred to the noises that passengers hear, perhaps from the rails, but it is a problem if they cannot be contacted to find out whether they have any evidence. I hope that the new safety mechanisms will ensure that such details are not only looked at, but acted on, as I am sure they would be in many other areas.

I come now to the concern of Peter Webster, who has raised the issue of seat belts. I often use a term used by John F. Kennedy:

"ask not what your country can do for you—ask what you can do for your country."

It is not a matter of whether we should have seat belts, but a case of why we should not have them. Seat belts demonstrably improve safety in the air and on cars. Common sense says that, if somebody is in a moving vehicle that comes to a halt very abruptly at high speed and turns over, a seat belt will aid their chances of survival and reduce any injuries that they receive.

The Finnish transport authority is often quoted as saying in part that such a proposal could not be recommended, largely on the ground that people would not wear seat belts. Passengers felt that there should be seat belts, however, and the authority felt that they would reduce the number of injuries and deaths. Peter Webster has done his own research on a train. He spoke to a large number of passengers and gave them a quick survey to fill out. He found that the vast majority were in favour of seat belts on trains. When it came to children, the vast majority of passengers said that although they might not wear belts themselves, they would insist that their children did so. That may have saved Emily's life. We do not know.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): I respect the sincerity of the hon. Gentleman's argument, but I would take a great deal of persuading about the merits of installing seat belts, which it would presumably be compulsory to wear. However, may I put to him this prosaic but serious question: what about those on trains who are standing?

Richard Younger-Ross: I take the point. I think that I recall that the number of people standing on the train was a contributory factor to the injuries sustained in the Clapham rail disaster and that the injuries in the Paddington rail disaster were compounded by passengers standing up and moving through first class to the front of the train, as the train came into the station. Standing passengers on a train are at risk. People do not spend a lot of time standing on trains—if seats are available, they may go to and from the buffet car. Peter Webster researched how long people spend out of their seats, and, by and large, people on long journeys spend only a few minutes out of their seats.

Some trains are overcrowded. In my constituency, some people are left on the platform because the trains are too full, which is unacceptable. In the transition to full privatisation, the overcrowding on trains in my constituency led to the rail company putting up fares to try to relieve congestion. In that case, the rail company doubled school fares because the trains were too crowded. It did not put on extra carriages and tried to force people off the trains to reduce overcrowding. We need investment in the rail service to increase the number of seats on trains and to reduce the chance of people standing.

Seat belts on trains need not be compulsory—the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) referred to that issue, which is not the point—but they should be optional and they should be there to give passengers the chance to affect their lives and those of their families. That does not cover all eventualities, and I do not say that it does. On an aeroplane, one is not compelled to wear a seat belt all the time, but one is compelled to wear one on take-off, landing and when the pilot says so. Vacuums occur, and people have been injured in accidents because planes have suddenly lost height. One cannot take account of such events, although I am not saying that one should take account of all eventualities, because we would wrap everything in cotton wool if we did so.

In my view, the provision of seat belts would certainly aid safety at a cost that would not be considerable. A company has contacted the rail companies and offered to fit out carriages on a trial basis. Why not? Rail companies should fit out a carriage or two to measure use and passengers' responses. Having done that, they might say, "No one uses seat belts. They are a waste of money," which might be a valid argument in those circumstances. Until someone does that, however, they cannot argue that point.

Finally, I shall comment on some other issues. The accident at Ufton involved a car on a crossing in which a train hit the car and derailed. Crossings are seen as a problem for the rail operator, but I should like to ask why, because the Bill does not address that point. A crossing is an interconnection between road and rail. If improvements to the crossing are needed for rail safety, they are also needed for road safety. Whether the matter involves a trunk road or a county or other local authority road, the road authority should logically bear part of the cost of improvements, which might involve constructing a bridge.

The road authorities often pressurise Railtrack on gate-closure times, which is one of the reasons why indicators on crossings may not work—the train stopping time may be greater than the time that the gate is shut for traffic. If the length of time that a gate is down is a traffic concern and if a congestion problem relates to that period of time, the road authorities should perhaps deal with the situation by constructing an underpass or bridge.

If one constructs a bridge or alters access, one requires planning consent. One of the Bill's oddities is that rail authorities have permitted development rights: they can put up mobile phone masts for their own use along the track and do a lot of other work without planning consent. On planning, Network Rail and the rail operators should be accountable for all that they do. They may not need full planning consent, but they should be accountable, which does not mean the limited accountability to which they are subject at the moment.

The Bill touches on finance. My background is in architecture. One can examine the costs of running an organisation in terms of whole-life costs or on a cash-flow basis. One of the problems with rail privatisation is that it considered the rail companies in terms of cash flow rather than in terms of whole-life costs. When we examine the costs and how we fund the railways and discuss budgets with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we should do so not only in terms of today's budget, but in total and in the round. If one always worked on cash flow, total costs would exceed the costs if one had built in maintenance costs from the beginning. The road network is a classic example: if a county council cuts its maintenance programme to save money, the structure of the road is eventually damaged, which means that structural repairs are required.

Bypass loops past stations such as Newton Abbott and opening up platforms to improve capacity would improve the Waterloo rail line. Creating an alternative route to Cornwall for whenever Virgin Trains get stuck at Dawlish because water is on the line or because a storm has damaged the sea wall is vital for the Cornish economy. Whenever the Tamar bridge is closed for repairs, it affects districts and towns further down the line.

Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to contribute to today's debate. I ask members of the Committee to examine and test improvements to health and safety, and the measures that I have described will work to that end.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): In view of the source behind the observations of the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross), I am sure that they will be listened to seriously. The points that he raised, particularly in relation to the sad accident that involved one of his constituents, will be taken seriously.

I originally intended to speak on local matters. Having listened to the hon. Members for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) and for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire), however, neither of whom is currently in his seat, I think it is appropriate to make some observations about the argument between the Opposition and the Government. Those speeches were similar and addressed the same issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) commented earlier on Conservative Members' antipathy towards the Mayor of London. We all have our own opinions about the present incumbent, but Conservative Members have overreacted in basing a large part of their opposition to the Bill on their fears about what the Mayor of London might do.

The role of central Government is the second issue that divides us. The hon. Member for Spelthorne put it more robustly, but the hon. Member for South Suffolk made the same argument; the more the Government are out of the railroads, the better the railroads will be. That argument may or may not be true, although I reject it, but the question is this: who created the problem in the first place? It was not this Government; they did not allow many years of underinvestment in the railway system or create a botched privatisation system, the consequences of which we are still trying to recover from.

I have to say to Opposition Members, in a spirit of great friendship, that if they intend to sustain their opposition to the Bill through Standing Committee and beyond, they will need to find a better set of arguments, because on the basis of what they have said today, they simply do not have any. It is opposition for opposition's sake.

The Government, rightly, wish to ensure that we get for value for money in our expenditure and that what is spent is invested wisely in the network. My interest in the Bill relates particularly to the Merseyrail electrics network, a unique system in the United Kingdom. It is local, segregated and electrified, and constitutes a regional metro system.

In July 2003, Merseytravel—the passenger transport executive for Merseyside—and the passenger transport authority took over responsibility from the Strategic Rail Authority for letting and managing the contract to provide passenger services on the Merseyrail electrics network. I should say a few words about Merseytravel, particularly its chief executive and director general and its chair. My hon. Friend the Minister, who is preoccupied elsewhere in the Chamber, knows very well Neil Scales, the chief executive and director general of that esteemed body, and is also very familiar with the work of Councillor Mark Dowd, who is its chair.

Mr. Bercow: He is now searching for inspiration elsewhere.

Mr. Howarth: Councillor Dowd does not need to seek inspiration from anywhere; he is a very inspired politician.

The Government had enough confidence in those involved to let them have this unique arrangement. They have proved in many ways how capable they are, and it is a tribute to them and to the authority that the Government allowed them to go ahead on that basis. Merseytravel accordingly awarded a 25-year contract to Merseyrail Services Holding Company Ltd.—Merseyrail—which is a joint venture between Serco, NedRailways and Merseyrail itself. That marked a new era in the provision of local rail services on Merseyside through the creation of a long-term and genuinely locally controlled public-private partnership between the public transport authority and the train operating company. The confidence that the Government showed in Merseytravel and Merseyrail has proved well merited.

Since these new arrangements have been in place, performance on the network has been transformed. It is currently operating at more than 94 per cent. PPM, which, I am reliably informed, stands for passenger performance monitoring; whatever it is, we have achieved 94 per cent. of it. Punctuality and reliability are at record levels and, according to the latest Strategic Rail Authority figures, Merseyrail is the best performing train-operating company on the UK mainland. Next January's fare rises are one of the lowest in the UK mainland and are pegged to the level of inflation.

Dr. Pugh: Before the hon. Gentleman goes too far in his praise of Councillor Dowd, may I point out that when I last went back from London on Thursday the train broke down on me?

Mr. Howarth: I hesitate to say that Councillor Dowd might have been aware of who was travelling on it; I am sure that that was not the case. Every system has its failures, and it is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman was caught up in one of those. Nevertheless, the fact remains that it is the best-performing train service in the UK, and I am sure that he is as proud of it as I am.

The experience of the Merseyrail electrics network demonstrates the benefits of enabling local people to deliver local solutions to local issues. That is entirely consistent with the objectives set out in the White Paper. Full local decision making will place overall responsibility for the railway infrastructure, alongside overall responsibility for passenger services, in the hands of Merseytravel. That transfer will ensure that this unique local railway is locally controlled and can deliver further improvements to the community on Merseyside that uses it. The people of Merseyside will therefore benefit from local people taking local decisions for long-term and day-to-day management of the entire segregated network. Merseytravel will ensure that local solutions to local problems are provided quickly and properly; indeed, it has a long track record of doing just that. The result will be a more efficient service to passengers with greater accountability and responsibility, as well as reduced operating costs.

Although the transfer is technically possible under the existing legislation—indeed, it took place—it would be prudent for the Government to include in the Bill a reserve power to ensure that Ministers can be satisfied that all railway infrastructure is managed as efficiently and effectively as possible.

I commend the Bill and hope to return to some of the issues if I am fortunate enough to serve on the Standing Committee.

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): We have had a fairly wide-ranging debate, which is not surprising given that we are talking about changing structures in the industry.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross) argued for seat belts in trains. He has a case, and it should be investigated. However, all the research and evidence shows that seat belts work well in cars because they are attached to the frame of a vehicle, which provides their strength. That is less applicable to coaches, because seat belts tend to be attached to the seats, and someone involved in an accident can find themselves attached to a seat that is itself moving. I suspect that there may be a similar problem in trains. Moreover, as my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) observed, in a train many people will be standing. Last time I went on the train between London and Reading well over 100 people were standing until Reading, when they started to thin out a bit. In that situation, one is likely to be hit by a flying passenger or an object such as a bicycle, so there are wider issues beyond seat belts to be considered.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman) was shadow Secretary of State for Environment, Transport and the Regions in the last Parliament, he thought that the issue of passengers standing should be dealt with, and suggested for starters that they should not have to pay a fare as they had not got a seat. If one does not get a seat on an aircraft, one does not travel, but on the railways one pays the full cost and has to stand in the aisles. Many people greeted his suggestion with horror. Nevertheless, we must consider the wider issues of people standing and of bags in corridors. Some trains are so crowded, partly because of the success of privatisation, that getting out of them can take a while even in normal conditions, let alone in an emergency or an accident.

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend accept that although the hon. Member for Teignbridge gave a thoughtful answer to my question, it raised a problem, for did not he suggest that either far more seats should be provided, which would be an extremely expensive and long-term enterprise for any Government, or all carriages should be all-seater in the interim in any case, which would serve only to exacerbate passenger frustration and the length of the delays that people experience?

Mr. Syms: The hon. Member for Teignbridge made a thoughtful contribution that doubtless reflected the genuine concerns of his constituents. However, his questions raised even more questions about the way in which we manage the railway and whether there should be more seats or more cars added to trains. Nevertheless, I am sure that the Minister heard his comments and will consult his civil servants about what can be done.

We tend to concentrate on first principles and I am sure that a few unreconstructed Members would like to revert to the nationalised rail structure. The railways in Britain were a great private sector success. We have heard much about fortunes made and lost and that certainly happened in the mid-Victorian era. The private sector ran the railways for 100 years before it was decided to take them into public ownership. Apart from the ideological concerns of the then Labour Government, it happened because the railways played a major part in our economy in the second world war. They were heavily used and needed massive investment, and it was believed that the public sector would be better able to provide the investment for them to grow in the post-war years.

As many hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso), said, decades of under-investment under British Rail caused the railways' problems. However, if one considers the matter, it is inevitable that a publicly owned railway system, in which the investments are measured against education, health, foreign aid and everything else in the public sector, will be affected by investment rationing. I remember talking to a Minister in the first Thatcher Government of 1979 who worked at the Department of Transport. That person said that, when the Government came to office, any capital investment in British Rail of more than £250,000 had to be referred to the Secretary of State. That was 25 years ago and £250,000 would be some millions today. Nevertheless, that was essentially the cost of a station refurbishment and it had to be referred to the political masters. No railway can run in the long term if politicians deal with that amount of detail.

Mr. Tom Harris: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman knows that the Bill explicitly provides that proposals to refurbish stations will be in the remit of Network Rail, not the Secretary of State.

Mr. Syms: I am glad the hon. Gentleman pointed that out.

We reached the point when the Conservative Government decided to privatise the industry. Did they get it completely right? No. We have acknowledged that from the Opposition Benches. My hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) acknowledged on several occasions that we would do some things differently. The industry was probably too fragmented. Various local operating companies did not have long enough to undertake the work; seven years was too short for specific contracts. It is a matter of common concern that too many experienced people who had worked for British Rail took the opportunity to leave the industry. That meant that it was bereft of many experienced people.

I am a veteran of the Transport Act 2000. Apart from the aspects that affected National Air Traffic Services and quality contracts with buses, it also created the Strategic Rail Authority. On Second Reading, the Deputy Prime Minister said:

"The Strategic Rail Authority will be the new guardian of the public interest: it will close the loopholes in the Government's rail legislation, and will provide tough enforcement to protect the passenger."—[Official Report, 20 December 1999; Vol. 341, c. 540.]

The Government did not essentially change the architecture that they inherited from the Conservative Government, except to provide for another tier in the SRA.

When other hon. Members and I asked in Committee from where people would come to work for the SRA, it was said that some of the BR people had transferred to the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on privatisation and that they would doubtless work for the SRA. There was already a shadow authority, but the staff would move. Four years later, we are now suggesting that those people will move back to the Department. We are shuffling people around and the magic solution of four years ago has turned out not to be magic. As my hon. Friends said, the Government have acknowledged it to be a failure but it would have been better if they had not pursued it four years ago.

The major change has occurred through Railtrack's financial difficulties, leading to the creation of Network Rail. Several hon. Members have said that there is unfinished business to do with Network Rail, not only on public debt but on accountability. Many of us who have had dealings with Network Rail do not find it the most responsive organisation in the world when it tackles constituents' problems. Perhaps the Bill would be more welcome to Opposition Members if we were tidying up some of the details or at least aiming to do that when some of the legal actions had been expended.

Although privatisation was not perfect, it has led to a vast expansion in rail travel. As the Secretary of State said, we have more than 1 billion passengers for the first time since the 1960s and 45 per cent. more freight on the railways than in 1995. There has been much success and the Conservative Government who provided for that should be congratulated more. If there were a free vote on the matter, the result would be interesting because I suspect that many Labour Back Benchers hark back to the old BR days.

There are several other concerns. I was pleased when the Secretary of State reiterated at the beginning of the debate the duty on Government to promote the use of the railways for the carriage of passengers and goods, for which the Railways Act 1993 provides. I am glad that that remains in place; several people were worried about it. People are generally happy about provisions to allow the Welsh Assembly and the Scottish Executive to prepare strategies for those parts of the United Kingdom but there is no reference to a railways strategy for England. That should be considered when the Committee examines the Bill in more detail.

As several hon. Friends said, the number of clauses that deal with closures is interesting. Clauses 22 to 44 deal primarily with closures and there is anxiety about what will happen in future. Concerns have been expressed about the community strategy and several hon. Members have mentioned Beeching. I therefore look to the Minister to provide reassurances, and perhaps a much broader explanation of the extent of the focus on closures, in his winding-up speech.

Several explanations have been given about accident reports and investigation. I will not dwell on that, but the subject causes concern. There is also anxiety about schedule 4 and the ability to determine the scope and size of the network. Concern exists about its general wording and especially proposed new paragraph 1G. It has been suggested that the provision, in granting the Secretary of State the ability to determine the scope and scale of the network, allows him to override private sector contracts, contrary to his undertaking to Parliament earlier this year. The Bill is silent on compensation if that were to happen and I hope that the Minister will comment on that.

We have a private sector industry that has done pretty well. It was not in a perfect state and, in retrospect, things could have been done better. The SRA was the Government's big idea. Earlier, I cited the Deputy Prime Minister's words on that. They were similar to those of the Secretary of State, who said that the Government were tidying up the problem and that, when they get rid of the SRA, they can sort things out. Yet the structure remains essentially the same as that that they inherited. The Government ought to back the system that they have inherited and stop fiddling around with other tiers. People would have rather more respect for them if they did that. At the moment, civil servants, having been transferred out of the Department for Transport to the SRA, are now being transferred back to the Department. Seven and a half years on, the private sector has been running the railways for longer under this Government than it did under the previous Conservative Government, and I think that people would expect the Government to have achieved rather more than they have done through the structural changes that they have introduced.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, Cathcart) (Lab): Madam Deputy Speaker, I must begin by apologising to you and to the House for being absent for a short period at the start of this debate. My presence was once again required at a delegated legislation Committee.

I broadly welcome this new legislation. For the three years immediately before my election to the House, I worked as chief public relations and marketing officer for Strathclyde passenger transport executive. I note that, since I left, the executive faces being wound up and merged with a new organisation. Perhaps it is a tribute to my work there that those who make these decisions waited until I had gone before deciding to abolish it. Or perhaps not.

We must accept that there is a high level of public cynicism whenever a Government—however well meaning—try to reform the railway system in this country. Politicians tend to talk in the abstract on this subject, while voters tend to talk in the specific. One example of that occurred a few weeks ago, when the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) was telling a delegated legislation Committee about how awful the railways in Scotland were, based on his own recent experience of a delayed train journey. I pointed out to him that the Scotrail franchise had in fact performed better than all other rail franchises on the mainland of Great Britain, excluding the Isle of Wight. I accept his point, however, that a swathe of statistics will not provide much consolation for someone stuck on a delayed, dirty or cold train.

The main debating point so far today has been the abolition of the Strategic Rail Authority, and the House has the right to ask whether the Government got this one wrong in the first place. The hon. Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) asked why the Government had not apologised for creating the SRA, only to abolish it four years later. This Government could learn lessons from the Conservatives in regard to instituting legislation that turns out to be wrong but refusing to accept that it is wrong. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), who came as close as any Conservative Member has done to apologising for the way in which the rail industry was privatised. However, his comments—conciliatory as they were—were in marked contrast to the belligerent tones of some of the other Conservative Members who have spoken today.

I am glad that we have a Government who are willing to change direction when circumstances demand it. I am reminded of John Maynard Keynes's saying:

"I change my mind when the facts change. What do you do, sir?"

The answer from the Conservatives seems to be, "We maintain that we were right in everything that we have done." They ought, however, to accept that the general public see the privatisation of the rail industry as an unmitigated disaster. They should also examine the part that that privatisation played in their eventual electoral demise in 1997. There were clearly a number of factors involved, and the privatisation of the railways was only one small part of the fabric, but they should be aware that their own focus groups and internal polling—if they can still afford to carry out internal polling—will surely provide evidence that the general public view is that privatisation in 1993 was an unambiguously bad thing.

I am glad to see that the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) has returned to his place. It is one thing not to apologise for rail privatisation, but it is quite another for him to stand in this Chamber and claim that the capital value of the rail industry was so low when it was privatised because of scare tactics on the part of the Labour party. It beggars belief to suggest that the Labour party was in any way responsible for the disaster that was the Conservative rail privatisation.

Let us examine the history behind the Conservative Government's decision to privatise the railways. Baroness Thatcher had refused to privatise the industry because she recognised that it would be far too difficult and electorally unpopular. However, when the new Conservative leader, John Major, took office, he knew that because most of his support came from the right wing of his party, he had to prove his privatisation credentials. The rail industry was the obvious target, and he went ahead without taking due cognisance of the dangers and pitfalls that his predecessor had recognised. We are paying the penalty for that action today.

The SRA has not been a success. It has achieved very little over the past four years, and at very high cost. Another change that is being proposed, alongside the abolition of the SRA, is a fundamental change to the way in which the Office of Rail Regulation works. It is remarkable that some Conservative Members seemed to suggest that taking away the powers to invest and to set budgets from the ORR and giving them to the Secretary of State for Transport was somehow undemocratic. You say "tomayto"; I say "tomahto". You say "political intervention"; I say "democratic accountability".

It was remarkable that the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) spent so much time criticising the fact that locally elected politicians, including the Secretary of State, who are accountable to the House were to be given more responsibility. Yet the Conservatives also criticised the fact that Network Rail was not accountable to shareholders. Apparently, it is perfectly acceptable for a company as important as Network Rail to be accountable, but unacceptable for democratically elected politicians—Members of this House—to be accountable in this regard. There is a fundamental flaw in the Conservatives' thinking on this issue.

I wish that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) were present in the Chamber this evening. He has very sound views on unelected quangos and commissions—I regard the SRA as such—having some kind sovereignty over this Chamber, and having the final say on budgets, which Members of Parliament do not have. The very idea that the Office of Rail Regulation can set budgets for investment in the rail industry, while this House is powerless to do so, would be anathema to the right hon. Gentleman, and I wish that I could hear his views on the matter. I am sure that they would be more in accord with mine and those of my hon. Friends than with those of his Conservative colleagues.

I hope that Conservative Members will accept—even in their opposition to the Bill—that certain achievements are real and can easily be measured. Is the 28 per cent. increase in passenger miles since 1997—the highest figure since 1946—something that the Government should be ashamed of? Would the Conservatives wish to denigrate that? The 27 per cent. increase in passenger numbers, which have reached 1 billion for the first time since 1961, is also something about which we have every right to be proud. Furthermore, there has been a 27 per cent. increase in the amount of freight carried on the railways, which is important when we consider the need to cut congestion on our roads. Those achievements are to the credit of this Government, and it is simply not enough for the Conservatives to say that our stewardship of the rail industry has not been successful.

I want to take this opportunity, however, to point out that neither I nor the vast majority of Labour Back Benchers share the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) on the renationalisation of the rail industry. The travelling public are entitled to something a bit more substantial than the sterile old 1980s view that everything in the private sector is bad and everything in the public sector is good—or vice versa, depending on which side of the political spectrum we come from. I actually think that there is a third way. I think that there is a possibility of the genuine public-private partnership that the Government are trying to achieve.

It is too easy to look at the effects of privatisation with blinkers on. It is too easy to say that privatisation is all about private profit and lack of investment in the industry. The facts do not support that. The truth is that there is more investment in the privatised rail industry today than there was under British Rail, partly because, pound for pound, public money is being matched by private investment. We should not give that investment away lightly, and we would lose it if we opted for renationalisation.

One example of the benefits of the current arrangement is Chiltern Railways, nowhere near my constituency. A local train service has blossomed and increased capacity and reliability specifically because of a local franchise that was withering on the vine under nationalisation. We should try to duplicate that best practice throughout the railway network.

I want to concentrate on the threat that the Bill poses to passenger transport executives. As I said, I am a former employee of Strathclyde PTE, which has existed for more than 30 years and is the oldest part of Scotland's local government set-up. Unfortunately, as we speak legislation is winging its way through the Scottish Parliament that will eventually abolish the PTE, or at least merge it with a wider body covering the whole of Scotland. I think that regrettable, because Strathclyde PTE's achievements speak for themselves. During its time in charge, there has been an unprecedented expansion in the Greater Glasgow rail network and in other train and underground services, not to mention ferry services.

I fear that, not just in Scotland but throughout the country, PTEs will lose their right to sign rail franchises. In Scotland the justification is that we have a Parliament, and Ministers in the Executive who are responsible for transport. Although I have reservations about that, there is a clear democratic argument for saying that Ministers rather than the PTE should have signatory powers. I understand that argument, but I would prefer Strathclyde PTE to continue to exist and to be co-signatory to the franchise in the west of Scotland, along with the Scottish Transport Minister. In England there are a number of passenger transport executives with a similarly successful track record, and although local services have improved under their stewardship they are being told that they will no longer have signatory rights following the Bill's enactment.

I hope that the Minister will deal with this when he sums up the debate. If the reason for removing signatory powers in England was the same as the reason for removing them in Scotland—the prospect of a devolved Administration—we could ask whether, given the difficulties in the roll-out of regional assemblies in England, the argument had not been somewhat weakened. Might the Government consider changing those provisions in Committee? If I am lucky enough to be appointed to the Committee, I shall hope to table amendments to that effect.

Ironically, in Scotland—particularly in the west, where my constituency is—because of devolution we face an immense amount of centralisation. In the context of this Bill and the Transport (Scotland) Bill, the situation is bizarre: having started with devolution, we are ending up with the centralisation of services. At present, passenger transport decisions are made by democratically elected councillors in the west—in Glasgow. Those decisions affect the daily travel of members of the public, including my constituents. Following the changes made by the two Bills, they will be made in Edinburgh by the Transport Minister, who is currently an MSP representing an Aberdeen constituency. I think my constituents have a right to be concerned about the fact that local knowledge developed over 30 years by Strathclyde PTE will be wasted, and they will no longer have any say over their own affairs.

[Mr. Tom Harris]

Mr. Greg Knight: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument closely, and I wonder where it is leading. Is he about to suggest that we should abolish the Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Harris: Heaven forfend. The Scottish Parliament has many great achievements to its name, and I am sure that it will have a similar success rate in relation to transport. What I am saying—setting aside the fact that Scottish legislation would get rid of Strathclyde PTE in its present form—is that there is a strong case for allowing the PTE to become a co-signatory to the ScotRail franchise in the west, given the experience of its personnel.

In fact I must thank the last Conservative Government, who accepted the argument for PTEs to be signatories. Strathclyde PTE has made a huge difference to the negotiations on the ScotRail franchise, first when it was won by National Express and again when FirstGroup won it this time. It devoted many thousands of staff hours to negotiating with the franchisee on all sorts of standards and efficiencies, and on demands that democratically elected politicians in the west of Scotland were naturally making for rail services. As a result, we in the west of Scotland have a much higher level of satisfaction with rail services.

In my constituency, I am privileged to benefit from the Cathcart circle, which is heavily used by my constituents and by people throughout the city, particularly in the south. My constituents also rely heavily on the Strathclyde PTE underground, colloquially known as the clockwork orange. I shall explain that later: I see a quizzical expression crossing the face of the hon. Member for Poole. It is the third oldest underground system in the world, after those in Budapest and London. That may interest the train anoraks. In fact, it is called the clockwork orange because when it was reopened in 1980 after refurbishment the carriages had been painted orange, and they are entirely clockwork.

Mr. Syms: I thought for a moment that it had something to do with ancient sectarian politics.

Mr. Harris: I would not blame anyone for assuming that. It was probably a risky nickname, but it was not conferred by any authority in the city; it was conferred affectionately by some members of the community.

When I was in charge of public relations for the clockwork orange—the Glasgow subway—I came in for a huge amount of personal criticism. My job was to publicise the underground, and one of my brainstorms was to suggest to the travelling public that football fans should not use the underground to travel to Ibrox, the Rangers football club ground, because the system was not big enough for that to be safe. Allowing 6,000 fans to travel to Ibrox station in the space of half an hour would run a high risk of people being thrown on to the track in front of trains. I will not repeat the language that was used about me in certain Rangers fanzines; I will merely say that all that was said was untrue, but I did not sue.

I go back to the serious issue of local transport services, how those are developed and how political decisions are taken in the west of Scotland post this Bill and post the Transport (Scotland) Bill. There is already a perception that transport infrastructure projects such as the Edinburgh airport link and the light rail transport system in Edinburgh have been given precedence over similar projects in Glasgow, simply because the political focus has inevitably shifted in Scotland from Glasgow to the east coast, because of the Scottish Parliament. That is probably a welcome development for some MPs, for example, the MP for an Edinburgh constituency, say, Edinburgh, South or thereabouts—

Dr. Pugh: Edinburgh, Central.

Mr. Harris: That is what I was thinking of. Those MPs may not have any objection to that, but for those of us who represent a constituency in Glasgow, it is worrying.

Let us remember the ethos behind setting up the passenger transport executives in the first place. They were initially proposed in the White Paper published, I think, by Barbara Castle in 1968. The whole point of them was that they focused on the country's conurbations. A conurbation was defined then, as now, as a metropolitan area whose population exceeded 1 million. Using that definition, and no one has come up with an improved one, Strathclyde remains the only conurbation in Scotland, yet effectively, we are about to lose the passenger transport executive that was set up specifically for that conurbation.

That is a huge shame and I deeply regret it. I only hope that, post the changes, politicians in Edinburgh will be able to work closely with politicians in Glasgow and in the west of Scotland to ensure that some of the infrastructure changes for which we have campaigned for many years, including the Glasgow airport link and Crossrail, are not left to wither on the vine, as some people fear they may be.

The community rail partnerships have been denigrated by some Conservative Members. I am surprised at that. This week, The Economist rather unkindly referred to the people running community rail partnerships as do-gooders and train nuts. That is a bit harsh. We are talking not about a back-door way of the Government closing under-used rail services, but about the possibility of rural rail services being brought out of mothballs and run by the local community—by people who are extremely interested and enthusiastic about running local rail services. That may not be appropriate for every mothballed service but 40 of those partnerships already exist in Britain. Surely, if they work—it is probably a bit early to decide whether they do—and if they provide what is intended, which is the rejuvenation of small lines with variable passenger numbers, every hon. Member, whatever side of the House they sit on, will welcome it.

Economies of scale are mentioned in the White Paper and in the Bill. One of the problems with the existing regime of the SRA and the Office of Rail Regulation is that costs are running out of control. As I have said, currently, Ministers have no legislative right to call those costs into line or to question how the ORR is coming up with those sums of money.

It happens with every capital project in this country and it has become a truism: anything that we buy in Britain costs more than what we would pay for it on the continent, whether we are downloading music, buying a suit or eating in a restaurant. It is accepted that in Britain things cost more money. That does not explain why in Germany the cost of building a new train station is the equivalent of £240,000 but in Britain we would not get much change from £1.5 million.

The Government must look at that urgently. If we are going to get value for money for our constituents and to make the money that we spend, and that is a lot of money, go as far as possible, we must ensure that every penny is spent wisely. Why are capital projects on the railways costing six to eight times the amount that the same projects cost on the continent? We must look at project supervision, at building standards and at the process for initiating those capital projects.

As I have said, I warmly support the Bill. There is a level of cynicism among our voters and the general public. Whatever improvements are made in rail services, it is no consolation to be told that a particular franchise has been performing well when one has been stuck on a cold and dirty train for two hours after it broke down. That is a difficult public relations barrier to get over, but I feel quite optimistic about the Bill. Some hon. Members are being unnecessarily oppositionist in their approach to it.

Mr. Greg Knight: One of the reasons why Conservative Members have concerns is that there are 22 clauses in the Bill to do with closures. Does not that worry the hon. Gentleman?

Mr. Harris: That is an issue that I look forward to debating in Committee, if I am lucky enough to be appointed to it, but few of the criticisms made by the hon. Member for South Suffolk focused on the closure clauses. Most of his criticisms focused on the SRA. He criticised it, but then he criticised the Government for wanting to abolish it. He also criticised the amount of money that has already been spent on the rail industry under the Government's stewardship. Few of the criticisms focused on closures. However, all of us have railways in our constituency. Obviously, none of us wants to see any particular line closed. That is a legitimate concern, but it is not what we have heard this evening from Conservative Members. We have heard criticisms, a defensive attitude and, with the honourable exception of the hon. Member for Poole, a reluctance to admit that most of the problems we face in the rail industry stem from the botched privatisation. I see the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire shaking his head, but he is not getting up to intervene and frankly I do not blame him.

The Conservative Opposition confirm public perceptions. Having made a mess of privatisation, they have no solutions to offer. We have sat in the House for quite some time and we have heard many positive ideas from the Labour Benches—from the Back Benches and the Government Benches. We have heard almost nothing from Conservative Members that will address the problems that we all face day-to-day on our railways.

I hope that the Conservative party continues with that attitude for the next five months at least. I hope, too, that the hon. Member for Spelthorne will be appointed its transport spokesman and put on the "Today" programme and on "Newsnight" every night between now and the general election, because that would do us nothing but good.

The Conservative party has not learned the basic lesson from its defeat of 1997. It has not learned to say sorry. Even when the Leader of the Opposition is questioned on pensions, instead of saying, "We got it wrong 20 years ago and we are trying to put it right now," which is what he should have said, even though he would be wrong in doing so, he said, "We were right then and we are right now." The Conservative party cannot win the debate on transport by saying that it has always been right and has never made a mistake—but strength to its elbow. That is exactly what it is doing and I hope that it continues to do it for a long time to come.

8.18 pm

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): I seem to have temporarily become a Front-Bench spokesman—but I appeal to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, not to be taken in by that.

It is some years since I was on the Select Committee on Transport, or the Transport Sub-Committee of the Select Committee on Transport, Local Government and Regions as it was then known, under the benign and kindly chairmanship of the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), but I hope to be on the Standing Committee and I will venture a few modest observations at this stage.

Under the stewardship of the right hon. Member for Tyneside, North (Mr. Byers), railways were right up the political agenda and debate was febrile and heated. Under the current Secretary of State, however, the atmosphere is calm, even at times positively soporific. We have the illusion that all is going well under his steady control, but that is not quite the case. Were he the captain of the Titanic, no one would be unduly alarmed and all would be calmed by his generally mellifluous tones. However, the essential problems of the railways still exist and, as many hon. Members have said, have been there since privatisation.

Fragmentation was the buzz word when I was on the Select Committee. It is still manifestly present, several times over and writ large, in recent reports. The Transport Committee says precisely that in "The Future of the Railway", its most recent report. It comments that fragmentation is not only still in evidence, but in some ways more in evidence than ever before.

The Bill appears to get rid of one fragment—the SRA—by taking powers upwards to the Department for Transport and devolving some powers downwards to the PTEs. That is the central thrust, as I understand it.

[Dr. John Pugh]

The rest of the Bill is largely concerned with strategies for what is called "network modification", which is ministerial talk for closure and contraction. As has been explained, that is what most of the clauses do. We are in a new phase. Gone is the bold new dawn of the 10-year transport plan. In theory I cannot, and my party certainly cannot, object to one fragment less. However, as many hon. Members have stressed, that falls short of linking track and train, which others have asked for and see on the horizon. It leaves all the old excuses for failure in place, with each side claiming that the other side is at fault.

I come from an area in which the railway service is performing relatively proficiently, as the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) said. We come from the same area, and I can testify to the fact that the Merseyside passenger transport authority is go-ahead and positive in its general effect. However, every local authority—even the most positive and compliant—should always fear a Government bearing gifts and devolving powers, because it often means little more than transferring the responsibilities for subsidies, or transferring only part of the subsidy. The sub-plot is for central bodies to subsidise less and local bodies to subsidise more. That leads to the prospect of underfunded lines being closed by underfunded PTEs, and the Government not taking the rap for it.

If that is what results—and it need not necessarily be the case—it is hard to see that as a complete answer to fragmentation. However, I venture to say, possibly in compensation and perhaps to excuse the Government, that there cannot be a worse and less efficient public subsidy system than the one that we had before. I defy human ingenuity to come up with something less competent.

In my area—if I can put in a plug for it—a pittance spent on restoring one mile of rail track—the Burscough curves—could turn the whole Mersey railway system from a radial shape to an efficient loop, increasing massively the utility of disconnected railway lines, such as the Ormskirk to Preston line, currently vulnerable and seemingly under threat. That would provide enormous customer and economic benefits. We could do that with the small change, or even the tea money, from projects like the west coast main line or Crossrail. In many ways, PTEs can achieve far better effects.

My local PTE would not fall for the suggestion that the Southport to Manchester airport line was vulnerable or uneconomic, which it was listed as a few days ago. That is an SRA view. The real reason for saying that is that it might delay for a few seconds the west coast Glasgow to London main line, on which so much money has been spent—expenditure that the Government must try hard to justify. It is as though those few seconds matter more to passengers, whose main gripe on that line is overcrowding on trains that are half empty because half the carriages are first class, and a first-class ticket costs the same as a week in the Algarve.

If the Bill passes power to the PTEs, I genuinely do not think that they can do a worse job unless—perish the thought—they do not get properly resourced. The Bill can be read—although this is perhaps a cynical reading—as providing what the accountants used to call a special purpose vehicle. They used to say that when they were closing down Railtrack. Its special purpose could be to please the Treasury and contract the network, which has hitherto been so hopelessly mismanaged. I would go into Committee with an open mind to discover what the Government said about their legislation, but their approach could give the signal, which it should not, that they have given up on railways, and perhaps also on public transport as a whole.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): We heard the Secretary of State present the Bill with his usual efficient good nature. We heard a range of views from the Conservative party, its Front-Bench spokesman and others, in defence of privatisation. We also heard the views of the Liberal Democrats from the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) and, more recently, the views of new Labour.

I thought that I would speak on behalf of the Labour party and address the Bill on the basis of Labour party policy, which was fairly straightforward at the conference in October this year. It does not seem to be contained in the Bill, but not to worry, because I shall draft a new clause, which I am sure will be acceptable to the Front Bench as it will reflect the partnership in power policy-making process that the Prime Minister introduced into the Labour party to enable people to introduce a minority report on a particular decision and policy. That is then brought to the Labour party conference, and delegates at the conference, which is the supreme policy-making body of the party, vote on it. In this case there was an overwhelming vote in favour of what can only be described as a policy to introduce legislation for an integrated, publicly owned and public accountable railway system. That is what I shall suggest the Bill be amended to reflect.

Mr. Tom Harris: I do not want to pre-empt my hon. Friend's comments, but I assume that he is about to mention that 78 per cent. of constituency delegates voted against that policy.

John McDonnell: What is interesting about that statement is that I did not support the partnership in power process that the Prime Minister introduced into the Labour party—but it is supposed to have an impact on the Government's policies as part of democratic accountability. However, there is a break in the chain of the accountability of the Prime Minister to the Government to party. Overwhelmingly, the Labour party conference—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. This is a Second Reading debate, and I request the hon. Gentleman to confine his remarks to the Bill.

John McDonnell: Certainly.

The overwhelming decision at the Labour party conference was for the Government to introduce legislation to bring rail back into public ownership. The Bill does not do that. It does not do what the Labour party decided, but this is the view of the Government. I thought that someone in the Chamber should at least represent the Labour party in the debate, and that is what I am trying to do. In addition, the Bill also does not implement London Labour party conference decisions made on Saturday—I think unanimously—to ensure that South East Trains is kept in public ownership and control, so that it continues to be publicly run. Again, I thought that someone should stand up and represent the London Labour party as well.

The gap in the Bill is that there is now no clause to bring forward public ownership and public accountability. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) that this is one in a transitional series of Bills that overcome the problems of privatisation introduced by the previous Government. Slowly but surely we are reintroducing a publicly owned and publicly accountable railway system. The first Bill that the Government introduced tried to overcome some of the problems of privatisation by trying to establish at least some form of rational structure for strategic policy making, and established the Strategic Railway Authority, which was neither strategic nor much of an authority on railways. The Government are seeking to address that through legislation that will bring many of its powers back under their control. I welcome that as the next staging post to a fully publicly owned and publicly accountable system.

Why are the Government moving towards the reinstatement of a mechanism that is like British Rail? The reason is clear. In every opinion poll, two thirds of the British public say clearly that they want a move back to public ownership and public control. Why are they introducing this legislation today? It is a reaction to privatisation over the last decade and a half.

It was clear from the comments of some Opposition Members who have tried to justify privatisation that lessons have not been learned. As a country, we poured £10 billion in subsidy into private companies, which took the profits from the privatisation, £1 billion of which went directly into the pockets of shareholders. Each time, the argument is that if legislation is enacted to end privatisation, we will lose the supposed £70 million a day subsidy from the private sector. At some stage in the debate, we must go past GCSE economics—"failed". Where does the £70 million from the private sector come from? It comes from the public subsidies that we pour into the private companies, making their profits, or from the fares that we impose on passengers. It is recycled public money, for which we are supposed to be grateful. In the days of British Rail, it came as a direct subsidy. We have heard a lot of criticisms of British Rail today, but if we read the Catalyst report that was prepared, we see that pound for pound, in terms of investment and return, British Rail, despite being starved of resources for a long period, was the most efficient and productive railway system in Europe.

What could this Bill do? First, it could introduce a new clause bringing rail back into public ownership and making it publicly accountable. I will draft that clause for the Minister later. Secondly, it would be easy to amend clause 12 so that South East Trains is not forced out into another franchise. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris)—if it ain't broke, don't fix it. At the moment, South East Trains is proving to be an effective and efficient railway service within the public sector. And what are the Government doing? They are privatising it again. Bizarrely, it is likely that South East Trains will probably still be state owned—but it will be owned by the Danish state railway company, which will bid for it in future.

The Bill therefore has the potential, first, to hold back further privatisations, and secondly, to include a simple clause to enable the Government to take back into public ownership individual franchises as they run out over the coming years. In that way, without any cost—although we have heard from the Secretary of State previously that the cost of bringing rail back into public ownership would vary from £3 billion to £20 billion, to which it increased at the Labour party conference—rail could be brought back into public ownership, as the public demand.

I do not think that the Government have the guts to go along that path. In due course, however, they will, and new legislation will be introduced. This Bill is just a staging post. In the meantime, let us at least use it to address some of the anomalies within the industry.

First, I want the Government to address the anomaly of a two-tier work force in the rail industry, particularly with regard to travel facilities. I have drafted an amendment—it will be available to Ministers in Committee—which will end the two-tier work force, whereby staff employed prior to privatisation enjoy safeguarded travel facilities, whereas those employed following privatisation do not have such a guarantee. Before the privatisation of the rail industry, all British Rail staff received nationally negotiated travel facilities, which were subject to the same universal rules and principles.

In a written parliamentary answer in 1993, the then Minister confirmed that about 500,000 people enjoyed such concessionary rail travel, and that the cost was negligible and largely administrative. More recently, the National Union of Rail, Maritime and Transport Workers secured with one infrastructure company a 75 per cent. reduction on standard fares for staff when travelling on services provided by three train operating companies. The scheme costs £1,000, which covers basic administration costs for 475 workers. The cost is fixed, and would not increase if more workers used it. As a result, the company has provided travel facilities for its staff at a cost of just over £2 per worker. It would be easy to amend the Bill to establish a universal scheme, thereby ending the two-tier rail work force.

Another anomaly under the current system is that the SRA can intervene in industrial disputes. It can subsidise companies engaged in disputes with their work force simply by guaranteeing, through the grant regime, that companies affected by industrial action will not disbenefit financially in any way by failing to meet their targets. There is thus no incentive for such companies to settle disputes. That power, which currently pertains to the SRA, is being transferred to the Secretary of State. I did not think that it was the Secretary of State's role to intervene in industrial disputes in any industry. In fact, in dispute after dispute the Government have consistently made it clear that it is not their role to intervene between management and workers. Yet if this provision is retained in the Bill, that power will be transferred to the Secretary of State. Again, a simple amendment to clause 1, which deals with the transfer of functions, would enable the Secretary of State to have clean hands and not become part of the rail industry's industrial relations machinery.

There are some other worries that we need to express today. I reiterate the concerns expressed about the transferring in clause 2 of the Health and Safety Executive's rail safety functions to the Office of Rail Regulation. My simple amendment would do away with that proposed transfer, and would enable an independent safety regime to be maintained. The problem with transferring safety to the ORR is that it is not guaranteed to be independent of economic pressure. The Government's proposal subordinates rail safety to economic regulation and brings the two elements within the same organisation. That flies in the face of Lord Cullen's recommendations following the Ladbroke Grove train crash.

During the consultation process, I urged the Government to listen to the organisations that deliver the service. During the rail review, the Health and Safety Commission, the HSE, the TUC and the rail unions all made strong representations to the Government opposing the transfer of Her Majesty's rail inspectorate from the HSE to the ORR. The TUC fact sheet, which was distributed to many Members, said:

"If safety regulation formed part of any body that made decisions about funding and/or economic regulation, there would be a real risk that safety would be compromised when economic decisions are made that have safety dimensions."

At one point the Secretary of State made clear the priority that he gave to safety. He said that it should be "in with the bricks" of any organisation. But many of us believe that the transfer of responsibility is motivated by a desire to placate elements of the private sector that hold the mistaken view that railway safety regulation is gold-plated—an expression that has been used in the Chamber today. Those on one side of the industry are seeking to push down costs, some of which the management themselves are responsible for. However, saving costs on safety measures is a false saving. Anyone with a constituency involvement in Southall, Paddington or any other place in which a recent rail disaster has taken place will understand the implications of putting cost savings before safety.

The other concern that many of us feel—it has been expressed today—is about clause 39, which links in with clauses 40 and 41. Those provisions relate to the powers that will now be given to end certain services, and sometimes to replace them with bus services. The concept of "bustitution", as it is now called within the industry, has opened up a vista, which some hon. Members have described today as a vista of a new Beeching, and the end of small community lines, which we thought were being protected over the year.

Launching the rail review in January 2004, the Secretary of State said that decisions on the provision of local transport were often best taken by the people who provide and pay for the service. Devolved decision making would enable sensible and informed decisions to be taken between bus, light rail and heavy rail. "The Future of Rail" White Paper of July 2004 made it clear what the Secretary of State meant when he spoke about "sensible and informed decisions" back in January. It said that the document promised to put in place arrangements making it easier for bus quality contracts to be introduced as part of a strategy that included reductions in rail services.

The Bill confirms that position. Clause 39 gives passenger transport authorities the power to make a quality contract scheme "if they are satisfied" that it is "an appropriate way of securing that the transport needs of the potential users of a relevant railway service that has been or is to be reduced or discontinued are met".

That opens the door for what many fear will be large-scale reductions in rail services.

Clause 40 allows the Scottish Executive and the Welsh Assembly to provide a substitute road service route where

"a railway passenger service has been discontinued", but it

"need not correspond precisely to ... the discontinued service if ... it is not practicable ... to do so; or ... the substitute service broadly corresponds to the discontinued service in terms of the localities served."

The danger is in the wording "broadly corresponds", which could lead to existing communities currently served by rail not being so served in future, but being offered replacement road services. Experience of the Beeching cuts shows that the patronage of bus services introduced to replace rail is fairly low, leading eventually to the bus services themselves being removed, leaving whole areas without public transport.

The threat of bustitution is compounded by other proposals in the Bill, which will make it easier for funding authorities to close railway lines. Clause 42 will weaken the safeguards against line closures. Previously, the criterion was whether closure would increase passenger hardship, but the new guidelines provided by the Secretary of State also cover economic, financial, environmental and social factors. The assessment will no longer be made by regional rail passengers committees, but by the funding authorities themselves—those who are making the proposals for closure in the first place.

My final, more general point was made early in the debate, but glossed over in ministerial responses. The failure to transfer to the shoulders of the Secretary of State the current duty of the Strategic Rail Authority to promote rail is a real concern. Previously, clause 205 of the Transport Act 2000 set out clearly that the SRA had the responsibility "to promote the use of the rail network for the carriage of passengers and goods ... to secure the development of the rail network, and ... to contribute to the development of an integrated system of transport of passengers and goods."

All that now goes, and all we are left with is a general commitment by the Government to improving the overall transport system—not specifically rail. That is a real worry. There is now no voice for the rail industry overall. That is why this legislation should transfer the previous powers, responsibilities and duties of the SRA at the very least to the Secretary of State, if not to a new agency.

I make one final prediction. We shall return to debating this subject within five years, and new legislative proposals will be before us. They will probably scrap most of the proposals in the Bill, and may well attempt to set up some form of public railways agency that will bring the railways back into public ownership, making them publicly accountable, publicly funded and generally popular with the British public.

8.44 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell). It would be fair to say, however, that he and I approach the railways from different philosophical perspectives. I hope that the Government will resist his blandishments to take the railways back into public ownership, but as a member of the Selection Committee, I also hope that, when we meet on Wednesday to appoint the Standing Committee, the Government Whips will have the good sense to appoint him, so that the radical amendments that he trailed in his speech can be fully considered.

In my brief contribution, I wish to examine what has remained the same in the past 10 years and what has changed. The landscape still contains many familiar features. The track, signalling and stations are in unified ownership and depend predominantly on the private sector for funding—on Railtrack in the past and now on Network Rail. The rolling stock companies—ROSCOs—are in private ownership and lease the rolling stock to the train operating companies. A series of TOCs, which are in the private sector, compete for the various franchises of different lengths. The basic landscape has not changed that much in the past 10 years. We have had an element of stability, to which my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) referred.

What has changed is the focus. When the industry was privatised, we tried to set up a structure in which the TOCs looked outwards towards their customers—their market—to make the industry more responsive to the needs of the consumer. At the funding end, we wanted an industry that looked to the private sector—the City—to raise the capital needed to fund the improvements that we all agreed were necessary. That outward looking industry was an essential component of the reforms that we introduced.

The Bill will change those two perspectives and move back towards the situation that existed before 1993, when the Government and the Secretary of State had a more important role. That is likely to lead us back to the position of the 1980s and 1990s, when the industry simply could not access the capital it needed for modernisation. I remember when I was Secretary of State for Transport under the last Conservative Government. I attended a series of Cabinet Sub-Committees that were deciding the allocation of public expenditure. The argument was that the Government's top priorities were health, education and law and order, so the resources for transport came well down the list. That was one of the reasons for privatising the railways, as it had been for privatising other nationalised industries. It was done to open up access to capital and to bring the industry into the 21st century.

Following the debacle of Railtrack, the industry once again has to look to the Government for more and more of its capital to keep it going. Some of the ambitious projects that we hoped to get off the ground a few years ago have now gone back to the end of the queue. I am very disappointed that Thameslink, which I thought that I had signed off nearly 10 years ago, is still nowhere near inception. I had also hoped that we would have started on Crossrail by now, but it is still a dream with no serious Government commitment to it. That is one consequence of the industry becoming once again more dependent on the Government for its funding than the structure that we envisaged at the time of privatisation.

I was interested to look at the back of the Bill to see how many pages of repeals there were. I see that there are about the same number of repeals of the provisions of the Transport Act 2000 as there are of the Railways Act 1993.

I hope that the Secretary of State will use the powers he receives under the Bill to allocate longer franchises. I am sure that I am not alone in having several stations in my constituency that need investment. Andover, Grateley, Whitchurch and Overton stations all need larger car parks to cope with increased demand for the railways. However, the TOC has a short franchise and cannot justify the substantial investment necessary to expand the car parks. The TOC referred me to Network Rail, but it does not have the capital to make those modest improvements because it has all been spent on the west coast main line and other desirable projects. I hope that we can seriously consider granting longer franchises to give the TOCs the incentive to invest in improvements to stations, car parks and security.

My last point relates to clause 6, under which the Secretary of State will be given powers to give guarantees and to make grants and loans, and to the classification of the guarantees and loans that the Government will provide under that clause. As the House may know, there has been an argument between the Office for National Statistics on one hand and the National Audit Office on the other about the status of the guarantees that have been given through the SRA to Network Rail. With the SRA disappearing from the equation, those liabilities will now fall on the Secretary of State.

When the Secretary of State made his statement earlier this year, he said:

> "It follows, therefore, that the Strategic Rail Authority will be wound up, and that the majority of its functions, including all its financial obligations, will be transferred to the Secretary of State."—[Official Report, 15 July 2004; Vol. 423, c. 1547.]

One might assume from that that the SRA's liabilities will be absorbed into the Department for Transport and that Network Rail's liabilities will therefore end up on the Department's balance sheet. If so, the Chancellor's statement last week would be seriously affected, because some £9 billion of borrowing would then reappear on the Government's balance sheet. I want to press the Minister to make it clear that, under the new structure, Network Rail's liabilities will indeed be Government liabilities.

Chapter 3 of the White Paper says:

> "The Secretary of State . . . will take responsibility for setting the national-level strategic outputs for the railway industry, in terms of capacity and performance."

It continued:

> "This means that the Government will be responsible for deciding the overall size and shape of the network; the key timetable outputs; policy on regulated fares; minimum performance targets; enhancement priorities".

[Sir George Young]

and so on. In respect of the criteria used by the ONS to determine on whose balance sheet such things appear, the ONS says:

"the guiding principle for classifying institutions as public or private is who exerts control over general corporate policy, including the appointment of directors."

It is absolutely clear that, under the Bill, Network Rail is, in effect, an agency of the Government. Any concept that Network Rail is simply an ordinary private company, doing what it wants and borrowing against its own credit in the market, is strictly for the birds. It will do what the Government ask it to do. No one would dream of lending money to Network Rail unless a Government guarantee was behind it.

I hope that the Minister will address a specific question in winding up the debate: will he confirm whether, when the Bill is passed, Network Rail's debts will appear in future as Government debt and be part of the public sector borrowing requirement?

8.52 pm

Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) (Lab): I apologise to the House for missing three of the past four contributions—I was attending a meeting—but I was here at the start of the debate.

I welcome the Bill in principle, as it goes some way towards addressing some of the problems of the rail industry, which is very important in this country. I particularly endorse the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) in chairing the RMT group in Parliament and the speech that he gave this evening.

The Bill gives us the possibility of getting rid of the SRA and of both unifying national decision making where it ought to be made—by the democratically elected Government in the House of Commons—and introducing regional activities through the Scottish Parliament, the National Assembly for Wales, TFL and the PTEs around the country. I shall say more about that in a moment. All that is welcome and a good step forward, but we must look at the Bill against the background of what was a sad and disastrous period for British railways before the Government's election in 1997 and, indeed, British Rail's treatment as an organisation in the past.

British Rail was starved of investment for many years and its services suffered as a result. It was universally pilloried and made a joke of by large sections of the media, but in many ways it was an innovative organisation. It achieved a great deal for train travel through the development of the high-speed train and the advanced passenger train. Those passing through Crewe can see the sad wreck of an APT, which has been parked in the sidings for years. The APT was overtaken by the Pendolino train run by Virgin—but where did the technology for the west coast main line Pendolinos came from? It came from the work done by British Rail Engineering and British Rail Research in Derby, which developed the APT. Sadly, the project was abandoned because the Government of the day were not prepared to see it through, and as a result we have had to buy in the technology from elsewhere. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made some valuable comments on research and development in the railway industry.

The position after privatisation is interesting. Immediately before privatisation, the Conservative Government increased investment in the railways to form the basis for privatisation—in other words, they fattened them up. They then sold the whole industry off at knock-down prices and all the ensuing scandals and problems continue to haunt us today. Huge profits were made from rolling stock companies that were bought by former BR managers then instantly sold on; they are now extremely profitable enterprises. Huge profits were also made by people dealing in railway infrastructure and land sales immediately after privatisation.

We have made some progress since then, but the fact is that Britain now invests and spends more on its railways than any other European country. We provide a far greater subsidy than was ever enjoyed by British Rail at any stage in its history, yet enormous profits are being made from our railways by the train operating companies. When the original GNER franchise was handed out, the director of the company that got it admitted that he did not really know what he had got. He knew that he had the right, the obligation and the duty to run a train service along the north-east coast main line, but he also knew that his costs in running that service were guaranteed. Therein lies the problem: we are pouring huge sums into train operating companies, and much of the money disappears only to emerge elsewhere as profits.

When the companies fail to deliver and collapse, someone has to step in and take over, as happened in the case of South East Trains. Now, however, we are told that the public sector is not good enough to run the services and they have to be passed to someone else. I ask the Minister who will reply to give us some clear answers. South East Trains is better run and more efficient and the public are happier with it, so why not stick with the arrangement and allow a publicly deliverable service to remain in public hands? To do so would be a useful step forward and demonstrate a commitment to the principle of public operation of our railways, as well as public investment and public ownership of the track itself.

One part of the Bill that I welcome is the transfer of some powers to Transport for London and the accompanying possibility of integration of services. TFL is to take over the franchising operation for Silverlink Metro services. I assume that other services—not inter-city mainline services, but regional and local services that go in and out of London—could also be administered by TFL, by agreement. If that happened, we might see more imaginative developments of services. Let me give an example.

For a long time, Silverlink has run services on the north London line, which extends from Richmond to North Woolwich, and trains then run up to Northampton, Rugby and Birmingham. It also administers trains on the Barking to Gospel Oak line which, like the north London line, runs though my constituency. The Barking to Gospel Oak line is a sadly underused line, which has been kept going only through the diligence of a local users' group that has campaigned assiduously for many years. The service has improved somewhat and I hope that when TFL takes over administration of the franchise we will see far more imaginative services and the development of an outer-London rail ring.

I agree with the Secretary of State that the harmonising of ticketing and travel arrangements in greater London would do much to integrate tube, rail and bus transport with many other essential services.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the north London line is vital for my constituents in Hackney, as it is the main interchange for access to the underground? While we welcome the line being handed over to TFL, we hope that the organisation will have the capacity to raise money so that that important line for the people of Hackney can receive the investment that it needs.

Jeremy Corbyn: My hon. Friend makes a good point, as Hackney is the only borough in north London that does not have any access to the tube network at all. However, one exit from the Manor House tube station is in Hackney, so there is a connection to the borough. My hon. Friend refuses to accept that assertion, even though she and I have walked up that very staircase while campaigning—one simply cannot persuade some people on those matters.

My hon. Friend is right about the improvements to the north London line and the need for integration. For people in most parts of Hackney, the north London line is the only east-west public transport route that they can use, but some of the stations are, frankly, grim and dangerous. The number of crimes in those stations is tragically high, and they are not safe places late at night. More investment is needed and, whatever arrangement TFL reaches with Silverlink or any other operator, I hope that it will insist that every single station is staffed, as that is the only way in which we will attract people back to the railways. They want to travel on them, but if the stations are not safe at night, they will not.

The Mayor and TFL have reached an agreement, which I believe the Government support, about reopening the east London line extension. It was short-sighted to close it, so I welcome its reopening. I have nothing against Hackney—it is a wonderful place that I love dearly—but why should the east London line stop there?

Ms Abbott: Why not?

Jeremy Corbyn: Some people may wish to get off in Hackney and shop in Kingsland road, but others, understandably, wish to travel on to Islington. It is short-sighted to spend a large amount of public money on rebuilding the area around Bishopsgate and rebuilding the line up to Dalston only to fail to link it to the existing track on the north London line. It could run on to Highbury and Islington in the first stage of development, with the option of extending it to Finsbury Park, which would develop into a local hub. I look forward to some imaginative ideas and I hope that, when TFL takes over, it will be able to put them into effect and develop new stations, including one at Tufnell Park on the Barking to Gospel Oak section of the line.

Turning to the notion of a community railway, there are concerns about bustitution. The railway map of this country shows a dotted line in north-west Norfolk, pretending that there is a rail substitution bus service from King's Lynn to Hunstanton and on to the network at Cromer. That is not, by and large, the case. The service was provided as a sop to people who, in the 1960s, opposed the Beeching closure of those lines. If we overlay the current railway map with a pre-Beeching one we can get an idea of the huge number of lines that we have lost throughout the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who chairs the Transport Committee, is right that bustitution is a quick fix. In the short term, it is cheaper and simpler to operate a bus service than a railway. However, many passengers are lost, and people are encouraged to use cars to reach the main line terminus. Having driven there, they then decide that they might as well drive the whole way.

If we are serious about encouraging people in the long term to make journeys by rail, that will not be achieved by bustitution and branch line closures. The examination of branch line use is an undeveloped science and some of it is extremely short-sighted.

When I was first elected to the House, my great friend, the late Member for Bradford, South, Bob Cryer, was campaigning to prevent the closure of the Settle to Carlisle line. He sat where the Liberal Democrat spokesperson now sits and he asked hundreds and hundreds of questions. He bored the House rigid on the subject of the Settle to Carlisle line. He was told that it was expensive, that it was a waste of money, that the bridge infrastructure was decrepit and so on. But the line was saved. It was not closed. Now ask any rail operator, "Should we close the Settle to Carlisle line?" and they would say, "You could not think of closing it. It is a vital bypass for the west coast main line when that does not work, a large amount of freight goes along it, and it has been a contributory factor in bringing some tourist and other life to the villages along the line." It is now seen as a valuable network.

Think of that campaign and compare its success with the suggestion that some branch lines—for example, those in the west country, such as the Exeter to Barnstaple line—are too expensive and should be made ripe for bustitution. That does not help. It diminishes the railways as a whole.

Mr. Tom Harris: I know that my hon. Friend was not present in the Chamber for my outstanding contribution, which I am sure he would have enjoyed. He may be too negative about what community rail partnerships could mean. I accept that he is raising a real concern, but throughout the country community rail partnerships are providing an opportunity to bring out of mothballs rural lines that were previously closed and could now be reinstituted by local people and interest groups. I am sure that he would welcome that.

Jeremy Corbyn: Yes, and I am sorry that I was not present for my hon. Friend's speech. I recognise, and I am sure that the Select Committee Chair would agree, that community rail partnership in the best sense can be the saviour of lines and lead to their development. What concerns me is that it costs money to run a local line and it should not be seen as solely a local cost or resource but as part of a much bigger and wider network. I know that there are examples such as the development of the Alloa line in Scotland and the reopening of part of the Waverley line. I hope that the whole of the Waverley line will eventually be reopened, right through to Carlisle. That is another area of the country that should have been redeveloped.

I hope that the Bill will not be the start of some subtle Beeching-type closure by a curious form of voodoo economics that decides that particular parts of lines are not profitable enough. I hope that the Bill will instead be the protection and renaissance of such lines. There are, however, some strategic decisions that need to be taken. Why, for example, after all these years have we still not achieved a decision on the reopening of the east-west route? The reopening of the line between Bletchley and Bicester, linking up with Bedford all the way through to Cambridge, March, Felixstowe and the east coast ports, would be a massive development and improvement for the rail network. We are speaking about reopening only 25 or 30 miles of track, the bed of which is already in place and in quite good condition. That is the kind of imaginative decision that I look forward to.

I hope that the Bill can be amended in Committee and strengthened in many ways. We are putting large sums of public money into the railway system and the railway network. I welcome that and support it. The productivity of rail workers is as high as or higher than anywhere else in Europe. The amount of public money that goes in is as high as or higher than anywhere else in Europe. Surely there ought to be greater accountability for what happens to that money.

Those of us who read the entrails of the railway press see that large sums of money are being made by some of the train operating companies, even when they are receiving large subsidies for the running of their services. The case for public ownership, where appropriate, of the railway network, particularly of the leasing companies and rolling stock, is overwhelming. Retaining in public ownership franchises such as South East Trains is extremely important.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington that the Bill is welcome as a step forward and a stage of improvement. I wish that it went a lot further, however, and I suspect that we will be back here taking it that stage further in a few years' time.

If anyone thinks that railways are a thing of the past, they should look at a little story that appeared on the front page of yesterday's The Independent on Sunday saying that this country was running out of car parks. That may be the case, but if we continue to promote the car industry and road freight at the expense of rail freight, it will be a problem for all of us. Railways are more efficient and better users of land, as the White Paper's simple picture of a Eurostar train running across the Medway and using only a few square metres of land shows when we look at the space and cost of the motorway running alongside that track, carrying fewer people. We must look to a future that is more sustainable, and railways provide us with that opportunity and future. It is a good public investment to invest in railways and it is an even better public investment to invest in railways and own them at the same time.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): We have had an interesting debate and heard some high-quality contributions from both sides of the House.

The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) said that he hoped the Bill was a step towards the sanity of public ownership. I say to him that this step will never be a staircase. As we and the Ministers know, the reason why is that, to quote the words of the Secretary of State,

"the principle of public and private partnership is right for the railways, and it will continue. It brings in money from two sources, and that is important."—[Official Report, 19 January 2004; Vol. 416, c. 1078.]

I fear that the hon. Gentleman's aspirations for the old-style wholesale nationalisation of the railway network will not be fulfilled, whatever happens to the Bill.

The theme of the speech made by the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) was that railways should contribute more than they currently do. Most of us would agree. He accepted the case for developing the way in which franchises work. We welcome his support for Conservative policy on longer franchises. We feel that longer franchises should be given to train operating companies, but I was disappointed with his conclusion that he intends to support the Bill.

The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) made an interesting and, as we would expect, informed contribution. She lamented the idea that she was not demonised by Opposition Members, but she is far too sensible and down to earth to be so caricatured. She spoke against bus substitution and expressed fears about loss of expertise in the rolling stock industry. That point struck a chord with Opposition Members and with me in particular, as I formerly represented the seat of Derby, North. I hope that Ministers will heed her comments about expertise in the industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne (Mr. Wilshire) wants an apology from the Secretary of State on the SRA. The best advice I can give to my hon. Friend is not to hold his breath. He made a powerful speech, and his main concern was that Transport for London and the Mayor have plans to take over rail routes in his constituency. I share his fear that, in the case of the current Mayor of London, consultation would not lead to dialogue, but would be a process of going through the motions before the Mayor continued on his own way in any event.

My hon. Friend expressed some concerns about safety. I hope and believe that his concerns were unfounded, as I broadly agree with the comments of the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Stringer) on this subject. Subject to what the Minister has to say under cross-examination in the Standing Committee—if we get that far—I think that the Government are broadly right in seeking to streamline the proposals in that regard.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross), who was courteous enough to say that he could not join us for the winding-up speeches, spoke movingly about the recent accidents. We all take the view that any loss of life is a tragedy that we should take all reasonable steps to prevent. I hope that the Minister will look into the point raised by the hon. Gentleman about the emergency hammers breaking before the windows of the carriages in the recent crash, because we clearly need to examine that matter.

I cannot say that the hon. Member for Teignbridge took me with him when he suggested that we should fit seat belts to trains. That idea is a non-starter in a mode of transport in which people expect to move around freely and use facilities such as the buffet car or the lavatory in other parts of train. He also mentioned other aspects of safety; those points need to be examined and, as I have said, I hope that the Minister will do so.

The hon. Members for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) and for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris) supported the Government, which we expected. However, the hon. Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East was unfair when he referred to the "sterile debates of the old days". I hope that I shall make it clear—I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) made it clear—that we support parts of the Bill, which we do not seek to oppose this evening just because it is from a Labour Government.

Mr. George Howarth: The right hon. Gentleman will find that my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Cathcart (Mr. Harris) said that, not me.

Mr. Knight: I stand corrected.

My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) said that he has always had reservations about the Strategic Rail Authority, and his misgivings have been proved to be right.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Cathcart was frank enough to praise the last Conservative Government on passenger transport executives, for which I thank him. He also candidly indicated that he has some reservations about how devolution is working, and I therefore hope that he is one of the hon. Members selected to go on the Standing Committee, so we can explore in further detail the extent of his concerns.

The hon. Member for Southport (Dr. Pugh) said that he is worried about the future of our railways and mentioned one or two constituency points.

The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) expressed strong concern about the Government's policy. He showed an independence of mind and spirit, which, I fear, may keep him off the Standing Committee. I hope that I am wrong and that the Whips are brave enough to put a dissenting voice on the Labour Benches, because our deliberations would be enhanced by his presence, which some would say is the true voice of the Labour party.

In a knowledgeable and compelling speech, my right hon. Friend the Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) highlighted the hands-on role envisaged in the Bill and the problems that that policy will create. I agreed with every word and he underlined the reasons why we are right to urge the Government to embrace longer franchises. He made an interesting point about clause 6, and I hope that the Minister is prepared to respond to it. What will be the status of the guarantees and loans? Will Network Rail's liabilities end up as part of the public sector borrowing requirement, and if not, why not?

The hon. Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) showed that he is, as Conservative Members would expect, firmly in the Luton, North and Hayes and Harlington camp.

Jeremy Corbyn: It is the red triangle.

Mr. Knight: As someone who is interested in classic cars, I have always associated the red triangle with Alvis, which used to make cars in Coventry. On the subject of old cars, I join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to our former colleague, Bob Cryer, who campaigned tirelessly for the Settle to Carlisle railway to remain open. That is an epitaph of which he would have been proud.

The Bill has various objectives, and we certainly do not oppose everything in it, as we have made clear.

Only two years ago, in 2002, the current team of Ministers promised that the SRA would provide "the firm leadership envisaged for it—that of providing strategic direction and funding for the rail industry".

However, in February this year the Select Committee on Transport reported a completely different story—that the SRA

"appears utterly incapable of managing significant improvements."

It also made it clear that

"the fundamental failure of the railway is one of Government policy."

Hon. Members may recall that the SRA took over responsibilities from the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising, which my party set up when we were last in Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Spelthorne mentioned the statistics. In 2000–01, that office cost the taxpayer £13 million and employed 187 people. By 2003, the SRA's staffing costs had grown to £102 million, and by 2004 it employed no fewer than 454 people. In operating costs alone, the SRA has cost us all more than £25 million since it was established in 2000.

Despite costing so much, the SRA has manifestly failed to do its job. The Minister need not just take my word for it; the facts are there to prove it. Train reliability is worse than it was in 1997. Despite this Government's pledge to increase rail usage by 50 per cent. by 2010, only 5.8 per cent. growth has been achieved since 2000. The British Transport police's 2004 annual report showed a 4 per cent. increase in violent crime and a 12 per cent. increase in sexual assaults since 2003. Rail freight has dropped for the past two years, despite a promise by Ministers to increase by 10 per cent. the amount of freight carried. It is therefore hardly surprising that we say that the SRA has been a waste of time and money. It has failed to improve services for passengers and should never have been established in the first place.

Mr. Tom Harris: The right hon. Gentleman is being somewhat selective in his choice of statistics. Is it not the case that rail freight has increased by 28 per cent. since 1997?

Mr. Knight: The figures that I quoted are correct. If the hon. Gentleman checks, he will find that rail freight has dropped for the past two years.

Mr. Harris: I am talking about the past seven years.

Mr. Knight: That does not invalidate my point that there is currently a dip, which my hon. Friends and I find very worrying.

The clear leadership and direction that Labour promised that the SRA would provide has never remotely looked like happening. Therefore, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk said, we welcome its proposed abolition. The Secretary of State asked why we did not put that in our reasoned amendment. I should tell the Minister—perhaps he can pass it on to the Secretary of State—that when one tables a reasoned amendment, one has to set out reasons why a Bill should not receive a Second Reading; one cannot list parts of it with which one is content. That is why our amendment is silent on that particular issue.

Our view is that giving more power to politicians is not the way to improve our railways. Likewise, allowing the currently unaccountable Network Rail to have even more control will not improve services. Although we are delighted to see the demise of the SRA, giving more powers to the Department will not help operators to get on with the job of providing a decent and improved rail service. More powers should be given to the train operating companies, which provide the passenger interface, so that they can provide a greater range of services that better meet the needs of travellers. After the political interference that the railways have endured for the past seven years, private industry needs to be given the confidence to invest without further Government meddling.

I want to comment briefly on rail freight, about which the Bill is strangely silent. With the disappearance of the SRA, no organisation appears to have a statutory obligation to promote or facilitate the growth of rail freight. I ask the Minister whether that is correct. People outside have expressed concerns that, by excluding rail freight from much of the measure, the Government risk leaving freight strategy in a vacuum, with nobody taking responsibility for it.

The people who contacted me say that if the Bill is enacted in its current form, no official voice will represent freight and fight its corner when network capacity is allocated. Does the Minister accept that the allocation of available capacity to freight and passengers must be assessed fairly and according to value for money and national best interests? The incentive to maximise capacity must surely be equal for freight and passenger services. Their performance should be measured on the amount of freight and passengers they can manage efficiently on the network. No provision attempts to deal with that and I would welcome hearing the reason from the Minister.

Like the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich, I want to comment on rail stock. As hon. Members know, the National Audit Office published a report in February that suggested that new rail rolling stock was being delivered late. It warned that new carriages being introduced into service were less reliable than the old slam-door vehicles that they replaced. Trains not only arrive late at the stations but cannot even arrive from the factory on time. Why should passengers have to put up with old, uncomfortable and sometimes dirty rolling stock while manufacturers take up to two and a half years to deliver new trains? Clearly, people will not use the railways if they are uncomfortable while travelling and feel dirty on arrival at their destination.

I want briefly to mention access to rail services by disabled people. That point has not been raised in the debate. Although I accept that other legislation is primarily responsible for delivering results on that matter, I would like the Minister to comment on the proposed end date by which all rail vehicles have to be accessible to disabled people. Do the Government have anything new to say about the requirement for improving disability access when rail vehicles are refurbished? Does that happen in every case? The issue is important for many disabled people who would like to travel by rail but currently cannot do so in safety.

I want to ask the Minister several questions. Clauses 22 to 44—22 provisions—deal with closures. They do not refer to the relevant lines but to the passenger services on them. The Bill includes nothing about what happens to the lines after a service is terminated. If a line currently carries freight or might do so in future, surely it should be kept open, at least for a time, to ascertain whether others want to increase the services or other companies wish to take up and run passenger services. Does the Minister agree?

Schedule 4 covers the Secretary of State's power to determine the scope and size of the network. There is some concern about its wording, especially proposed new paragraph 1G. It has been suggested that the provision might allow the Secretary of State, in determining the scope and scale of the network, to override private sector contracts, contrary to his undertakings. I do not believe that that is possible or in the Minister's mind but I would welcome an answer to that point.

In opening the debate, the Secretary of State said that he intended to consult about safety. Will the Minister tell us when he expects the consultations to be concluded? The Secretary of State also referred to the desirable aim of getting track and train companies to work ever closer together but went on to say that the Bill does not provide for that. Will the Minister regularly update the House on progress, perhaps through a periodic written statement?

On the provisions relating to London, and to giving powers to the current Mayor, I should like to reiterate something that my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk said earlier; we do not support these provisions. Two thirds of all train journeys arrive in or pass through London, leaving millions of passengers from outside the capital facing possible interference by the Mayor in their train services. For example, in an election year, it might suit the Mayor of London—whoever he is—to require a fast, non-stop train to halt at the edge of London to pick up mayoral voters. Passengers might also find their fares being increased to pay for increased expenditure on other services authorised by the Mayor. These are not fanciful concerns. The Bill says:

> "A reference to a London railway passenger service is a reference to . . . a service for the carriage of passengers by railway between places in Greater London and places outside Greater London."

In our view, that drafting is far too vague. Will the Minister consent to look at it again in Committee, with a view to tightening it up?

We have heard about only part of the Government's transport policy in this debate. The Secretary of State likes to put himself forward as a benign, friendly, white-haired gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "He's Santa!"] I would not call him Santa, although that is certainly a gentleman we think of at this time of year. The House should remember, however, what the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells) said earlier this year. I notice that, following his remarks, that particular Minister has now been shunted off into the sidings in another Department. He said that the only way to end Britain's love affair with the car and to get people to use public transport was to "tax people out of their cars in the same way as the authorities have tried to tax people off cigarettes."

That is the real Labour transport policy. The Government want to use taxation as a weapon to make one form of transport unaffordable, so that people have no choice but to take the train. We believe that it is far better to improve rail services, so that those who can complete their journey by rail actually want to do so. Labour's high-tax transport policy is a kick in the teeth for poor rural families and pensioners, for whom there are no rail services for their essential journeys.

Overall, this is a bad Bill, but it is not completely without merit. We support the abolition of the SRA and the streamlining of health and safety issues. However, in supporting those proposals, we do not have to accept the vehicle of this Bill. That is why we commend the reasoned amendment to the House.

9.32 pm

The Minister of State, Department for Transport (Mr. Tony McNulty): This long and interesting debate on the future of rail is long overdue. The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) summed up the Opposition's position when he condemned the Bill as being a bad Bill, but not completely without merit. That is roughly where the Conservatives came in, with similar views being expressed by the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo).

I thought that the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire was going to pre-empt me when he said that the Secretary of State had revealed only part of our strategy. That much he got right, but he then went on to give his little rhetorical political rant, which did him no service at all. He was right to say that the Bill does not, and cannot, incorporate all the elements in the White Paper published in July. Many of those elements do not need legislation, and the Bill needs to be considered in that broader context. So I half accept the point that he half made.

Of course we should more readily apprise people of the fact that we are introducing the Bill in the context of a whole range of things happening in each area, many of which are already in the public domain. Subsequently, as with so much legislation these days, a whole raft of guidance and regulations will flow from the Bill, and I am happy to undertake—as I did last year with the Traffic Management Bill—to ensure that, if we can, we will make available at least the headlines and drafts of those instruments that explain further what is in the Bill, albeit in the wider non-legislative context, to Committee members at the earliest opportunity.

It is important to understand—some Members may not have understood it entirely, not that I blame them—where the Bill and each part of it sit in a wider domain. Let me establish the policy backdrop. It is easy to characterise the rail network as all doom and gloom, and to suggest that everything is as terrible as it was 20 or 30 years ago because the system has been starved of investment. I do not deny that there are problems—if there were not, there would be no need for a Bill—but we are starting from a fairly robust position. I agree with those who have said that we can have a degree of confidence about the future of rail.

When I took over the rail portfolio barely a couple of weeks ago, I said that this was an exciting and interesting time at which to be a rail Minister, and I meant it. Had I said that five or 10 years ago, the white coats of the former right hon. Member for Huntingdon would have come flapping over the horizon, or I would have been quietly taken out of the back door and shot; but it is an interesting time, and it is incumbent on us all to recognise that that is our starting point. Over the past 10 years, our rail network has experienced more significant growth than any other European network, and I would venture to say that once the Bill is implemented, Britain's railways will be in a far better shape than any of their European counterparts.

I do not say that lightly. I know that Members may jump up and tell me how wonderful the French TGV network is, but let them try to travel from one French coast to the other without it. It may be the jewel in the crown, but we should look behind it at the rest of the network. Those who talk of the paucity of the rural network here should go to parts of Germany, France and Spain.

We have concluded that the SRA has had its day, but not on the basis that for four years it was a complete and utter waste of time and achieved nothing, and the sooner it goes the better. That would traduce the contribution of many who have worked in the SRA, and will continue to work in the rail industry in some capacity. It is nonsense to suggest that because 400 or 500 employees are part of a monster called the SRA they are not making a professional contribution in the same way as workers in the wider industry. It could be said, to an extent, that we are only able to improve our public policy contribution to the railways because of the SRA's good work. If that constituted a bridge from the immediate aftermath of the botched privatisation, what we are now building is a bridge to where the system is all the more efficient—a point at which we can drive costs down all the more readily.

Every key part of the Bill relates to non-legislative elements that should be understood and put in context. The early clauses relate to the SRA's demise, and at the time of First Reading we put in the public domain what we sought to do and what the DFT rail unit would look like. It is a travesty, and not terribly intelligent, to use the generic term "civil servants" as a term of abuse. Many people working in the DFT have been there for at least 30 years, and have served the rail industry in various ways for a long time. I do not think it very clever to reduce every civil servant to an interfering bureaucrat.

As we have made clear, the new DFT rail unit will consist of people from the current rail unit and people from the SRA. Whatever Members think of the relevant clause, they should understand that developments are taking place that are not included in the Bill.

[Mr. Tony McNulty]

It is important, too, to understand that a range of working parties and transitional bodies are taking forward work on safety regulation and on economic regulation, necessarily taking account of the elements in the Bill. However, many other aspects are not in the Bill. For example, in terms of safety regulation, we are working through how all the staff involved in rail safety at the Health and Safety Executive will transfer to ORR. There are still some general concerns under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 that HSE will be obliged to continue. There will be a need for a memorandum of understanding between HSE and ORR in that regard. Where there are memorandums of understanding and other elements that link the non-legislative and the legislative processes, it is important that we try to put those in the public domain.

There has been extensive talk in Scotland, Wales, the PTEs and London about how to take all those aspects forward. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State suggested, in some areas, many of the elements are in place now. Transfer can take place far more readily in the Scottish example than in the Welsh, London or PTE examples.

Mr. George Howarth: The Minister was present when I discussed some of the developments that have been achieved on Merseyside by the PTE there, which is known as Merseytravel. Perhaps he can comment on those points and on what successes it has had.

Mr. McNulty: I will certainly try to return to Merseytravel in a moment. I want to pick up on many of the points that hon. Members have made. [Interruption.] It is called an introduction.

There has been discussion with the RPCs, much of it at their instigation, about what the passenger voice will be like after this Bill. Those elements do not necessarily or absolutely have to be part of the Bill, but the demise of the RPCs clearly has to be.

In terms of network modifications, many of the extensive clauses—I accept that there are 22 clauses on this—are about the system post the Railways Bill. There are so many because the SRA and the RPC were central to the entire closure process up to now. We must put that in the context of devolution and ensure that everyone who needs a voice has a voice. The same is true in terms of bus franchising. I stress that any number of elements in the rail review White Paper are not part of the Bill and do not require legislation. It all needs to be seen in that context.

For example, to sum it up, the right hon. Member for East Yorkshire said that no one is doing rail freight. The Department will do the rail freight strategy. There is no need for a statutory duty in order for us to perform the function. The ORR already has a duty under the Railways Act 1993 to promote use of the network by freight. The Freight Transport Association broadly welcomed the White Paper proposals, not simply the Bill. We are working with that organisation and others that have a stake in freight to get to a stage where there is certainty on freight and its use of the network. Further expansion of freight on the network is far more guaranteed than it has been.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Jeremy Corbyn) talked about bustitution of rural lines. There may be some residual notional bustitution of rural lines, but the bustitution—it is a horrible word—clause refers specifically to PTEs. PTEs are overwhelmingly urban. However, I accept that West Yorkshire and South Yorkshire will have rural lines and not just urban lines. The quality contract legislation certainly applies to the PTE areas.

Jeremy Corbyn: Can the Minister assure me and the House that the community rail idea is about the retention, development and increased use of branch lines and not a Trojan horse for their closure à la Beeching?

Mr. McNulty: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. It is slightly different from bus substitution, but the community rail partnership strategy that we launched with the SRA just the other week could not be further from a Trojan horse or "Dr. Beeching 2". There are plenty examples of lines opening in a voluntary capacity. They have stayed open and become more viable, transforming themselves from branch lines to feeder lines to the rest of the network.

Penistone is a key example of that. I was there on a cold and windy day, and it does get very cold and windy up there. That line has gone from what was disparagingly described as a community, fluffy, beards-and-anoraks line—with all due regard to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North—to feeding 500,000-plus passengers a year into the trans-Pennine express network.

Jeremy Corbyn: What anorak?

Mr. McNulty: I apologise for the anorak element of my comment.

That arrangement works so well because all the key interested parties are involved. Local authorities, community groups and others took the view that they wanted the line to stay open.

My hon. Friend also spoke about the east London line extension and those elements that the Mayor will take forward. Again, before I deal with the point about devolution of power, much of what the Mayor can do within London is because of the almost £3 billion line of credit that he has been given through prudential borrowing. That is outwith the Bill and has nothing to do with it. However, it gives mid-term, if not longer-term, certainty to many of the schemes within London and will, finally, give Hackney a tube station.

My hon. Friend mentioned the east-west rail line. Again, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Transport are talking to local authorities and private sector companies to see how they can push that link on. We have made it clear that there is not a substantive economic case in terms of its being additional to our plans for the network. It is perfectly in order, however, for us, the ODPM and others to consider how that part of the loop can be fixed by working with the private sector, but those who most directly benefit from it should contribute to it. It is terribly short-sighted of the hon. Member for South Suffolk to say that because the Bill relates to Ken Livingstone, he does not want it. All the Bill does is to extend to London areas of influence and policy that the PTEs already have.

To the extent that it says anything, the reasoned amendment says that the Bill

"increases the extent to which politicians and civil servants interfere in the running of the railways".

We like to call that public accountability, when politicians have a role to play. It is the public's money and there should be public accountability here.

I could not for the life of me understand what the hon. Gentleman was going to do. Having agreed the demise of the SRA, who was going to make decisions on franchising? It seemed that he was going to get the transport operating companies that want to run the franchises to do the analysis and let the franchises. All he said was: more power to the TOCs. Perhaps we should cut out everyone else, give them the money and let them do whatever they want, but that would do nothing for public accountability.

The reasoned amendment is also against giving

"the Mayor of London power over train services which begin or end beyond boundaries of the Greater London Authority."

It does not say why. There was not much illumination of that in the hon. Gentleman's contribution. Given that so much of intra-London travel is on the heavy rail network, it must be right that we move down the road initially of looking at the discrete services in London and at a role for TFL within that process. I do not understand how anyone could object to that in any way, shape or form.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. McNulty: With the greatest will in the world, the hon. Gentleman has only just popped in, for which I am grateful. However, he was not here for the debate, so I shall not bother to trouble him for a contribution.

If we go further with London powers, it is appropriate that someone from the surrounding regions sits on TFL's board, but that is again way outside the Bill's remit and we are a long way from that process. As has been suggested, the Silverlink metro lines will be considered first in that regard, and all but about three miles of track to the north of my constituency are within the Greater London Authority area. It must therefore be right to start to examine those configurations, not only in that context but in the passenger transport executives.

Many of the points made by the hon. Member for South Suffolk simply do not stack up. Apparently, we are seeking to perpetuate instability in the rail industry with regard to franchising. As to why, he was not forthcoming, and neither were any of his colleagues, apart from giving us the hoary old chestnut that there should be longer franchises. How long should they be? There was no suggestion. Should it be 20, 30 or 50 years? Perhaps we could go into Nicholas Ridley fantasy land, have the House of Commons meeting merely once a decade, give up all the contracts and franchises, and all go down the pub. That did not work terribly well for local government, it will not work well for central Government, and it is completely devoid of substantive consultation and public accountability, which must be the order of the day. Some serious points were raised which were specific to the Bill, some of which will be explored further in Committee. I stress that some of the answers lie outside the scope of the Bill, and I will undertake to keep Committee members, and if it is wanted, the House, fully involved.

The hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) referred to whether there should be a duty on the Office of Rail Regulation in relation to environmental matters. I am happy to tell him that that is already exercised in its functions. Under the Railways Act 1993, it must have regard to the effect on the environment of activities connected with the provision of railway services.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk spoke about the relationship between the Office of Rail Regulation and the Secretary of State. That is an important point—the Bill does not simply reach into contours and leave everything much as it was. Every relationship in the Railways Bill changes. The relationship between the ORR and the Secretary of State will therefore change. The new relationship will maintain the independence of the ORR.

In relation to the point that existing contracts will be overridden, that is simply not the case. The ORR is obliged to review its position at times, but that is not about having a blanket power to override all existing franchises and contracts. It cannot be retrospective in that regard.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), who chairs the Select Committee, made good points about ROSCOs and rolling stock. The issue should not simply be considered in the context of the existing skills base in this country, but I remind her that more than 75 per cent. of new rolling stock is British-made, and it is incumbent on all rolling stock companies, particularly British ones, to ensure that they can react to the pressure down on costs that we are seeking to get into the system. She and other Members raised the conundrum whereby a load of new rolling stock is on a railway line, and there is at least some hiatus while it is run in before getting back to the performance levels promised in the first place, which needs to be considered. Outside the Bill, we are reviewing the whole position of ROSCOs, and we are considering efficacy and efficiency on a company-by-company basis. I take the point, however, about losing job expertise in relation to rolling stock, and about ROSCOs' relationship with people more generally.

My hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich also made a point about safety, and I reassure her that safety will not be compromised by cost considerations in relation to the change to the Office of Rail Regulation. Safety remains paramount, and all the expertise moving through the ORR, which is embedded in and an integral part of all the other considerations, including economic and broader policy, must still have safety at its core. That is an absolute imperative, given all the lessons that we have learned.

[Mr. McNulty]

The right hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Knight) said that it is a shame that Network Rail is being given timetabling powers. I am afraid that Network Rail already has such powers; indeed, it is the lead body in consulting with the rest of the industry. Other Members made a number of points, some of which were slightly confused, about the passenger transport executives. Some Members were responding to the White Paper rather than to the Bill's substance; these issues will doubtless be explored further in Committee. It is clear that PTEs must, and will, have an expansive role not just in rail, but in all other transport provision in their areas. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) that in many cases PTEs have been very strong advertisements for public transport networks, ensuring that all regions get the networks that they deserve. That said, by contrast with the situation in past years, we must ensure that we make optimal use of our railways throughout the system, and at a realistic cost.

On the consultation process, which was mentioned by a number of Members, it is entirely appropriate to look at how the Gatwick Express works with the Brighton commuter line, although we should not determine such matters at this stage. It cannot be right that the Gatwick Express is at best 50 per cent. full at peak times, when the corresponding commuter service is 130 per cent. full. I am not pre-judging the outcome of such consultation, but it is at least worth looking at how those two different services interact with each other.

What did we get from the hon. Member for South Suffolk? The answer is, not a lot. His greatest scheme at the minute seems to be flogging off as much Network Rail land as possible. He said on the radio this morning—thereby spoiling my breakfast—that going down that route would unlock hundreds of millions of pounds. In essence, he has missed the boat—if I may mix transport metaphors—in that much of the non-operational land previously owned by British Rail went not to Network Rail but to BRB (Residuary) Ltd. Much of what Network Rail has, in operational terms, it needs.

I will go half way towards the hon. Gentleman. I have explored this issue over the past couple of months and there are developments—such as major termini in London and elsewhere—that Network Rail could take on far more readily. We are already exploring such ideas and we are grateful for the hon. Gentleman's support. However, 794 of the 800-odd sites of British Railways Board land are worth less than £50,000, so quite how the hon. Gentleman is going to construct a major, integrated Tory transport policy on the back of sites worth less than £50,000 I simply do not know.

I hope that the real issues that I have not had time to deal with will be explored in some detail in Committee. The relationship between the Bill's four or five key areas, devolution, economic and safety regulation and the demise of the SRA are matters worth exploring, and I hope that we will do so, should Second Reading be secured tonight. But what we cannot have is this empty vacuum from the Opposition.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): As opposed to a full vacuum?

Mr. McNulty: We cannot have this vacuum from the Opposition, which offers nothing to the people of this country. Our rail network now carries more than 1 billion passengers and is the most efficient that it has been, in terms of passenger miles covered, since the early 1960s. Our task is to make it all the more efficient, and that is what the Bill will do. I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

RAILWAYS BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Railways Bill.

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Tuesday 18th January 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

Programming Committee

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Programming of proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Ainger.]

Question accordingly agreed to.

RAILWAYS BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a), (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Railways Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenditure incurred by the Secretary of State for or in connection with the carrying out of any of his functions under that Act; and

(b) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums which are payable out of money so provided under any other Act.—[Mr. Ainger.]

Private Finance Initiative (Education)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ainger.]

10.28 pm

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): I am grateful to have the opportunity to introduce a debate on the private finance initiative in schools, particularly on a matter that is directly relevant to my constituency—the problems encountered by Jarvis, the contractor, and the impact that that is having on a primary school PFI. I shall speak on that rather narrow subject, rather than on the broad philosophical issues.

There are three questions that I shall pose. First, given the extreme difficulties of finishing a PFI contract with a company that has enormous liquidity problems and may face bankruptcy, what happens to discharge the contractual obligations? Secondly, what can be done to head off a bankruptcy—a situation that affects many constituencies and many PFI contracts? Thirdly, in the longer term, how can contracts be better designed so as to deal with such a contingency?

I am posing those questions to the Minister, although I recognise that in the short run and most directly, we are dealing with a contractual relationship between a local education authority and a company. It is that relationship that is coming under stress, but this is also clearly a matter for the Government, as it is they who designed and approved the general framework of PFI contracts. As far as I am aware, they have been giving good advice to my local education authority throughout its current difficulties.

The Government have a key role, as they have a bird's eye view of a broad problem. I understand that Jarvis is having considerable difficulties with many of its contracts. In the schools sector and further and higher education, a process is taking place in which cash is being switched from one project to another, and the Government are in many ways in a better position than the local authority to make judgments on how to manage this critical situation.

Before I embark on giving a little more detail about the problem that we have, I stress that I do not want to deliver any general ideological tirade about PFIs. I have a pragmatic view of the issue, both in relation to the education sector and more generally. In the education sector, all three major parties in my borough have their fingerprints on the contract in question. A Liberal Democrat council was in power in 1997, and it had had almost a decade and a half of frustration in which it was unable to invest anything in schools. When the new Government came in with their PFIs, the council jumped on them with considerable enthusiasm and had its programme approved by the Government. We have since had a Conservative council, which is taking the matter forward and has indeed proposed a PFI project for the secondary sector. All three parties are involved in, have supported or are complicit in the arrangement, so there are no party political points to be made out of it.

More generally, my constituency has seen a cross-section of PFI projects of different types demonstrating the costs, benefits, risks and opportunities of this type of financing. My local district general hospital, the West Middlesex, was one of the early second stage projects. It has now been completed, and it was completed on time and within budget, and with an imaginative design. It has also had quite of lot of snagging problems and there are questions about value for money, but broadly speaking, the perception is positive.

We have also had one of the major PFI projects coming through the Department of Trade and Industry in the rebuilding of the National Physical Laboratory. What happened there again illustrated the costs and benefits of the PFI system. The major contractor, one of the McAlpine group, went bankrupt halfway through the project. It was delayed for a couple of years, but the costs have been borne by shareholders and not by taxpayers, which is what PFIs are designed to accomplish. I have a broadly positive view of the issue, and in no sense a doctrinaire view.

The Richmond primary school contract was worth roughly £50 million over a 30-year period. In terms of education and Department for Education and Skills PFI projects as a whole, the project is fairly small beer. Until roughly a year ago, when I last saw the figures, there were about 93 education PFI projects out of 568 such projects altogether, and they accounted for about £1.85 billion out of £35 billion worth of total PFI investment. The Richmond project was only about 3 per cent. of the total education PFI, so it is fairly modest in scale, but it is not trivial, and it gives some important lessons.

The Jarvis contract for six schools on seven sites was due to be completed in summer this year, and for the most part, it was. Indeed, I have visited all the new PFI schools in my constituency, and most of the projects have been very successful. They have been well designed, imaginative and well received by the schools and their governors. They have been opened and the overall reception is broadly positive. Some niggles have occurred, such as quite serious snagging problems, small loose ends that have not been completed and problems with the maintenance contract. At Education questions, indeed, I have asked the Minister about the complexities of maintenance contracts. Why can we not have simpler standardised maintenance contracts across boroughs, rather than reinventing the wheel on every occasion?

The big problem is that one school was left half completed when Jarvis's financial difficulties struck. I have been keeping in fairly close touch with that school, which I visited two weeks ago. The position is frustrating because 90 to 95 per cent. of the work was completed three months ago, but large parts of the school are simply unusable because minor works are incomplete. For example, a new kitchen cannot be used because the cooker has not been connected, a disabled lift cannot be used because no one has been in to check it, and the school hall needs a final coat of varnish. Such minor problems could have been addressed in a few days by concentrated, focused construction work, but the work has been left for months, and there is no prospect of its being dealt with.

I shall read out a letter sent to me by the school council on the occasion of my visit, which graphically expresses what the children see. The children use quite balanced language, but the letter captures the flavour of the situation:

"We are very proud of our school and are very excited about some of the rebuilding that has taken place and also some of the new equipment which has been provided. However, we are at the same time extremely upset that the building seems to have come to an end before it has been properly finished . . . Take a look at our playground . . . It still looks like a builder's yard. The ground in some places is appalling and lots of people have fallen over and hurt themselves . . . The water fountains dribble a lot and you can't drink from them . . . Jarvis are making little progress and are not sticking to their promises. We are very pleased with our classrooms, which are really good with the interactive white boards and the computers. But, we are very angry with Jarvis and we will not rest until it is done!"

The picture is balanced, but there is a great deal of frustration that a modest amount of work simply cannot be completed because of the contractual nature of the financial problems involved.

There are essentially two difficulties. First, there is the cash-flow problem. Jarvis has extreme difficulties in realising cash. It is reluctant to hand out cash to its subcontractors, who turn up on the site and cannot get on with the work—even small amounts of work that require a few hours of a technician's time. The second problem, which partly relates to the first problem, is that because Jarvis's PFI building work is collapsing across the country, there has been a major haemorrhage of construction management staff, so it simply does not have people to carry through the work. The work is not being completed because of a combination of the shortage of people and extreme cash-flow difficulties.

Where do we go from here? The first line of responsibility rests with the local education authority. I know that the LEA is negotiating with Jarvis and the other partners to the PFI vehicle, and I hope that it is successful. As I understand it, however, the PFI negotiations arising from Jarvis's difficulty have been going on for about three months. I have been told—I am not sure whether this is correct—that little is likely to happen before the company's full restructuring is complete, and I am not wildly optimistic that that route will succeed, although I hope for the best. I also understand that the local authority is imposing contract penalties for delays on Jarvis, but the obvious problem is that if a company has severe liquidity problems and councils around the country are imposing penalties, its financial difficulties will become even more serious, which will make it even more difficult to complete the work.

Do the Government have oversight of that problem? I am aware of their involvement in the basic concept for the contracts and giving advice. Will the Minister give us a feel for the problems across the country resulting from Jarvis's difficulties? Are the Government taking a proactive role in trying to manage the process or are they stepping back and allowing the LEAs to deal with it as best they can? As I have said from the outset, I can see an obvious disadvantage in allowing LEAs to manage the situation on their own: because the company can switch cash from one project to another, there will be no oversight of its problems and no sense of prioritisation. Perhaps the Government can help with that matter.

As I come to the end of my remarks, I want to ask a hypothetical question that I do not expect the Minister to answer directly: what would happen were Jarvis to collapse completely? I believe that it has until March to complete its restructuring; it may fail. If a major PFI contractor effectively becomes bankrupt, what happens to the many projects that it is required to manage, including those in my constituency? As I understand the contractual arrangements, the banks and other parties to the PFI contract would assume responsibility, and would have a self-interest in ensuring that the project is completed, because they would then be able to sell the contract on—for profit, one hopes. It is therefore in their interests to ensure that everything is eventually sorted out.

The problem is one of time and delay. One of the key lessons of this experience—the Minister may wish to reflect on it—is that however well designed PFI contracts may be in getting a proper balance of risk between the different parties, what is lacking is any sense of urgency when there is an extreme liquidity problem such as that which exists in this case—or would exist in the case of the potential collapse of a contract. I question whether it is possible in the longer term to redesign PFI contracts to allow more active and rapid intervention in such a position of force majeure.

In conclusion, I shall read what the Government themselves said in their helpful report, "Building Schools for the Future", which anticipated PFI work predominantly in the secondary sector and made a balanced appraisal of it. It states:

"We know from our own information and the recent Audit Commission study that the earliest PFI schemes did not all deliver fully on this vision. We also know that while some local authorities and schools have been delighted with the PFI investment in their areas, others have found it difficult to translate their education vision into suitably flexible contractual terms."

In my borough we have a very good example of a major problem erupting in a PFI contract that was not anticipated and is very difficult to manage. What lessons have the Government learned from the situation, can they help to resolve it, and have they learned any wider lessons about how PFI contracts can be better structured to avoid such difficulties in future?

The Minister for School Standards (Mr. David Miliband): I welcome this debate and congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing it and on the balanced way in which he tried to deal with the issues nationally as well as in terms of their effect on his constituency.

I think that the hon. Gentleman would agree that, over the past 10 years or so, the private finance initiative has developed into a strategy for genuine public-private partnership and that that has been a significant development, if not without its difficulties, which I shall try to address. I welcome the opportunity to set out the Government's position.

It is fair to say that, in the mid-1990s, the private finance initiative was conceived, at least in significant part, as a replacement for public investment. Some saw it as a free lunch—private money supporting national infrastructure. As the hon. Gentleman knows, there is no such thing as a free lunch and, since 1997, the Government have tried to fashion a programme that uses private finance to supplement public investment, not to replace it; that mobilises private sector expertise and experience to serve the public interest; and that sets the incentives for the public and private sectors to serve the interests of taxpayers and citizens.

The schools example is instructive in that respect. In 1996–97, public investment in the schools infrastructure totalled some £700 million. Next year, in 2005–06, it will be more than £5 billion, with 75 per cent. of it provided conventionally and 25 per cent. in the form of PFI credit. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the "Building Schools for the Future" programme. That is worth more than £2 billion a year, about half of which will be PFI and half conventional procurement.

Over seven years, more than £7 billion has gone into school repairs, helping schools around the country. The conception of public-private partnership—PPP—fundamentally changed key aspects of the relationship between the public and private sectors. At the heart of that shift is the idea of the public sector as an intelligent customer of private services. The Government have had a commitment to use public-private partnerships, including projects that were procured under the PFI, to improve the standard of school buildings, as a matter of pragmatism—I believe that the hon. Gentleman used that word—not ideology.

Such action transforms Departments, agencies and local authorities from being simply the owners and operators of assets into the purchasers of services. The public sector is required critically to examine the full cost of owning an asset throughout its life, not only the initial cost of buying it. That also changes the way in which the private sector thinks about providing the assets. Private firms become long-term providers of services rather than simply asset builders. The private sector can no longer simply walk away from the buildings once they are built.

I believe that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that the local authority is the key partner of the private sector in the schools sector. The local authority advertises, negotiates and signs the contract and is subsequently responsible for operating the contract over its life. Local authorities determine whether to undertake a PFI project. However, we recognise that the contracts are long term and therefore different from conventional procurement projects. The Department for Education and Skills and the Treasury have provided and continue to provide substantial support to local authorities that undertake those projects. We also monitor the PFI projects throughout the country.

The public-private partnerships enable the public sector to use private sector resources to deliver elements of services that the latter, through its skills and expertise, is best placed to provide through a structure in which the private sector puts its capital at risk so that it is paid only when it delivers. I understand that, in the case that the hon. Gentleman raised, delivery has not happened and shortly I want to deal with those circumstances and the sanctions that the public sector has at its disposal when the private sector does not deliver.

The structure of risk transfer gives the private sector powerful incentives to innovate, and especially to deliver projects on time and to budget, to manage risks more effectively, to maintain assets and provide the specified quality of service for the length of the contract. It is striking that almost 90 per cent. of PFI projects are delivered on time, while under traditional procurement methods, 70 per cent. of projects came in late. Of course, there are benefits to customers, users and taxpayers but they cannot and should not be bought at any price. We, as the public sector, must ensure that when we enter into long-term contracts, we continue to receive value for money for the project's duration.

The Government's approach is that the PFI should be used only when it can deliver value for money, which cannot be secured at the expense of the terms and conditions of the work force or good design. We are committed to ensuring a level playing field between different procurement routes and we are clear that value for money should be the only criterion that is used to choose between them.

The total cost of the asset over its life is key to assessing the value for money of a PFI project. That is good public sector practice, whether spending under conventional procurement methods or the PFI. The cost includes the essential services that are required to maintain the asset's value, such as maintenance and repair. In the past, those costs were often excluded from investment appraisals, with the result that opportunities to invest in the design of the building to prevent later maintenance expenditure were overlooked and assets not properly maintained.

In contrast, at the end of a PFI contract—typically, 25 years—the school is returned to the local authority or governing body, fit for further use. In addition to analysing the whole life cost of the asset, through the appropriate allocation of risk, the PFI ensures that the private sector partner has strong incentives to deliver the services that the public sector requires.

In PFI projects, the private sector does not get paid until the building is complete and the services are being delivered at the required level. Under PFI, the public sector is guaranteed the specified service. If that is not provided, financial penalties result.

The hon. Gentleman accurately cited figures for the number of PFI projects that are either open or in train. In 40 schemes, pupils, teachers and head teachers are receiving services. We are trying to learn the lessons of improving procurement and management of PFI projects by local authorities. That is especially important, as our investment in the school estate increases, to ensure that every pound spent is well spent. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the lessons that have been learned in the past five to 10 years. Lessons are being learned on organising contracts, the need to bear down on legal and contracting expenses, the importance of high competence on the public sector side of the negotiating table in putting the contracts together and the need to ensure protection of public money.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the importance of standardising contracts, or at least of having standard contracts. He will be pleased to hear that, to aid the process of contracting, we recently issued standards for schools' PFI contracts, to help local authorities coming to the negotiating table to finalise such deals.

Given the hon. Gentleman's description of events, it would obviously be wrong of me to pretend that everything always goes right in PFI projects, just as it would be wrong to pretend that things always go right in conventional procurement projects. We can make the case, however, that the public sector has stronger sanctions in relation to PFI projects than it does under conventional spend. PFI contracts have contingencies built into them to ensure that, when things do go wrong, either they are put right, or the private sector faces a financial penalty.

In most PFI contracts, there is more than one shareholder and, critically, a backing group of lending banks with the financial resources to deal with a situation in which a party to the contract has financial difficulties. For PFI contracts in construction, in the event of a construction company being unable to fulfil its responsibilities, it is the responsibility of the banks and other shareholders to replace the contractor with another firm. The cost of doing so will fall on the consortium. If it fails to meet that cost, the procuring authority can terminate the contract, at a significant cost to the consortium.

If a building contractor encounters serious difficulties, there will be inevitable problems in the procurement of the project, whatever procurement method has been used. In PFI contracts, however, mechanisms are in place to ensure that the banks and shareholders have strong incentives to remedy the situation. It is important to draw a contrast between this and conventional procurement, in which the public sector would be left without such a safeguard. At the end of the day, if everything else fails, the local authority has the final sanction of terminating the contract and providing the services itself.

As we know, a number of projects are in difficulty as a result of the widely publicised financial problems of Jarvis. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman realises that it would be wholly inappropriate for me to comment on the situation relating to that company. I can, however, comment on the situation in Richmond, and on the Trafalgar school in particular. As he said, the scheme in Richmond involves six fully serviced primary schools through a single contract. He was also right to say that a £50 million project is on the small side when it comes to PFI deals. The contract is for two new schools and four expanded and remodelled schools, and was signed in June 2002. I understand that, in the main, construction work has been completed at four of the six schools.

A note that I have here tells me that high-quality information and communications technology specification has been a particular feature of this contract, along with flexible classrooms and improved community assets, and that the use of interactive whiteboard technology is having a special impact on the learning experience of the young people involved. That is obviously good to hear. In addition, the working environment for pupils and staff has been much improved.

However, at the Trafalgar infant and junior schools, a number of items of work, including on the kitchens and the external landscaping, have still to be finished. They have been delayed for some time, and some of the resulting difficulties were brought home to us by the pupils' description of this unacceptable situation through their school council. While the schools might be able to occupy their new buildings, it is obviously unacceptable that they cannot use facilities such as the outdoor play area or the kitchen as they would like to.

The contract that the authority signed with Jarvis has clauses to cover non-performance and it is up to the authority to invoke those terms. It has, therefore—appropriately, in my view—withheld part of the unitary charge, due to deadlines not being met and progress not being made. We have been informed that there is close co-operation between the local education authority and senior debt and equity providers involved in the project—as well as with Partnerships UK, the national body that handles many of these projects for central Government—in an attempt to resolve the outstanding matters. Those discussions have reached a relatively advanced stage, with a view to restarting the works.

I completely understand the hon. Gentleman's view that there needs to be real urgency in this process, because every day that goes by is another day of anxiety and annoyance for the teachers and pupils who cannot use their facilities to the full. I am sure that the mere fact that we are holding this debate will make the point to all the parties concerned that a significant educational loss is resulting from the difficulties that have arisen. I know that the hon. Gentleman is also in touch with the LEA, to whom he has copied various letters that he wrote to the Secretary of State to make his points. It seems to me, however, that the authority is on the case, and I hope to see progress.

The Government are committed to effective public-private partnerships because they can produce clear benefits in the delivery of public services. They can deliver assets that are of high quality, available on time and on budget, and services of an agreed standard. When assets are delivered late or services are poor, the penalties that we have discussed will apply.

We are also determined to learn from our experience of PFI projects to ensure that as we proceed with major investment every pound spent results in high educational standards, whether lessons are taught in schools built through the PFI scheme or schools built through conventional spend.

I look forward to discussing these and other matters with the hon. Gentleman in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

HEALTH

The Secretary of State was asked—

LIFT Programme

1. Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the progress of the NHS local improvement finance trust programme. [202201]

13. Linda Perham (Ilford, North) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the progress of the NHS local improvement finance trust programme. [202214]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): Good progress is being made. The first NHS LIFT building has opened its doors to patients in east London. On 26 November, I announced another nine LIFT projects, taking the total across the country to 51, of which 29 have started construction.

Mr. Hall: Bedford primary care trust and others are pleased with the success of their LIFT application. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that in high population growth areas, such as Bedford and Kempston, future capitation allocations will be based on forecast population growth, rather than always having to play catch-up? In that case, will the full rental costs of new facilities delivered by the LIFT be met from the day the facility is opened, which may be some years before the target population is reached?

Dr. Reid: Announcements on the redistribution will be made early in the new year. The announcements have been delayed by some months because we have been waiting for census statistics on which to base them. We will continue to increase the money available to the NHS, 80 per cent. of which will be made available to local PCTs, which will have to allocate that funding.

Linda Perham: I am pleased that a LIFT project is going ahead in Manford way in Hainault. The area is one of the most deprived in my constituency, and my GP practice is located there. Has the Secretary of State assessed the likely impact of those improvements to primary care facilities and services on hospital attendances, and in particular on accident and emergency attendances?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend's constituency is part of Redbridge and Waltham Forest LIFT scheme, which signed a contract in August this year. The company has already started construction of the new £5 million Manford way health centre, which will have three floors and will bring together not only three GP practices but health visiting and dentistry. It will be of huge benefit and will provide speedier, more convenient access for her constituents. I hope that much more will be done on the primary care level and that that will be reflected in turn in a reduction in demand, waiting lists and waiting times. Both the primary care and secondary care sectors will benefit from the new developments.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): I invite the Secretary of State to look favourably on those constituencies, such as Vale of York and others in North Yorkshire, in rural areas that face difficulties in delivering health services and social services because of their sparse populations and rural nature. One PCT and the ambulance service have run up a deficit of £10 million between them. How does he expect that shortfall to be made up?

Dr. Reid: The hon. Lady will be aware that over the past few years the increases in expenditure on the NHS have been far greater than in the past, and that will continue. I do not have the figures for her area, but I will be pleased to write to her. I am absolutely certain that her area will have had at least 6 per cent. real growth per annum over the past few years and that that will continue for the next few years. We understand the huge range of demands, even on the extended services, but the hon. Lady knows that we cannot write off deficits willy-nilly. The right to have extra money comes with the responsibility to run health services efficiently at a local level. We currently give 80 per cent. of the money to the local level, and we expect those involved at all grades of management to address local problems as well as dispensing local income.

Andy Burnham (Leigh) (Lab): The Atherton LIFT scheme in my constituency will open its doors early in the new year and will be one of the first in the north-west to do so. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that development, which is like a cottage hospital for Atherton, has the potential to transform health care? Will he ensure that his Department works with the hospital trust to put services on people's doorsteps, so that people do not have to travel to the acute site?

Dr. Reid: I certainly hope that what my hon. Friend has asked for comes to pass, because he is right. We tend to discuss statistics, buildings and physical and financial increases: some 2,500 GPs' premises have already been refurbished or replaced, and 51 new LIFT schemes—another £1 billion—have been given the go ahead, but the benefits are better measured in terms of human access and convenience for patients. There is no doubt that patients will get a wider range of health and social care under one roof. They will get help in making healthier choices and therefore in fostering prevention rather than cure. They will have access to more than just health care; in many areas, housing and welfare are being offered as well. I hope that what my hon. Friend asks for prov[illegible]o be the outcome; it is certainly our intended outcome.

Hearing Aids

2. Mrs. Annette L. Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): if he will make a statement on waiting times for digital hearing aids. [202202]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): The modernising hearing aid services programme was developed with the Royal National Institute for Deaf People to respond to audiology issues, and so far 250,000 people have received digital hearing aids. Awareness is now so widespread that some people have to wait, but I expect primary care trusts to do all that they can to meet the increased demand.

Mrs. Brooke: I welcome the progress that has been made in the provision of digital hearing aids. However, does the Minister share my concerns about the quality of life of one of my constituents, who was recently told in a letter from Bournemouth primary care trust that it was currently seeing patients who went on the waiting list in July 2003? That prompts the question of how long it took to get on the waiting list. What action will he take to ensure an improved service for my constituents? The current situation is highly inequitable, given the differing lengths of waiting lists around the country.

Dr. Ladyman: I share the hon. Lady's concerns. I point out to her, though, that this is a four-year programme to extend the availability of digital hearing aids across the entire country. As different parts of the country joined the scheme at different stages, some areas are experiencing particular problems; Bournemouth is one such area. That is why we provided central funding for a further 1,200 people to receive digital hearing aids in Bournemouth. The local PCT has provided funding for a further 2,000 people on top of that; it has also decided to join the public-private partnership, which means that audiology services can be made available from the private sector. Those three factors should lead to some dramatic improvements in the Bournemouth area.

Chris McCafferty (Calder Valley) (Lab): Will the Minister consider offering guidance to PCTs to prioritise people with other sensory deprivations such as deaf-blindness, which is a not infrequent development of old age?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We should be doing everything that we can to ensure that people with multiple sensory deprivations get digital hearing aids as quickly as possible. I am sure that her local PCT will have heard her remarks.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Following my questions to the Minister last July, the British Society of Hearing Aid Audiologists conducted a survey among hospital trusts and found enormous discrepancies in the availability of and waiting times for digital hearing aids, including 130-week waits for fitting at the Chase Farm trust and the Kent and Sussex trust in Tunbridge Wells. What does the Government's promise to roll out digital hearing aids by April 2005 really mean, given that there are such long waiting times now? Around 1.8 million people are still waiting, many of whom are elderly and will find a four-year wait far too long. Why is not the Minister speeding up the use of independent hearing dispensers, who stand ready and willing to help to shift the backlog urgently?

Dr. Ladyman: Of course, there were no waiting lists for digital hearing aids under the previous Government, because they were not available on the NHS under the previous Government: only people who could afford £2,500 to go and buy one in the private sector could have one. This is a four-year programme. By next April, digital hearing aids will be available everywhere in England. As I explained to the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mrs. Brooke), different parts of the country are at different points in the programme, but I expect digital hearing aids to be made available to everybody. Some 250,000 people now have the benefit of digital hearing aids and are able to hear far better than ever before. We are a victim of our own success, because people are coming out of the woodwork to go on the waiting lists. We will meet their needs, unlike the hon. Gentleman and his Government.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): Will the Minister ensure that trusts conduct holistic assessments of people waiting for digital hearing aids? He will know of the case that I raised with him concerning the lady with hearing problems who also has severe depression that would be alleviated by getting a better hearing aid fitted. Is it not right that trusts need to take such factors into account in order to provide better help for patients and to ensure better use of NHS resources?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is right. When people have multi-sensory deprivation or wider health needs that are being exacerbated by their failure to get a digital hearing aid, it is appropriate that we look at their cases individually rather than sticking to rigid procedures, to ensure that they get treated with the proper priority. My hon. Friend should remember that this programme is being managed for us by the Royal National Institute for Deaf People in a unique collaboration between the Government and the voluntary sector. That digital hearing aids are available to anyone at all is due to the fact that this Government decided to invest in them.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): Answers to written questions to the Minister suggest that statistics on this programme are not centrally collated, yet the RNID has been collecting statistics on the modernising hearing aid service project. Is this just another example of a waiting list that the Government want to hide? When will the Minister publish the statistics? Will it be after the four years, when the playing field has been levelled?

Dr. Ladyman: We are working in a partnership between the state and the RNID. We do not collect these statistics nationally in a centrally collated list, but the modernising hearing aid service project does collate some local information. That information is available to any Member of the House who takes the trouble to talk to their primary care trust. If waiting times are outside the standards being set by the RNID, it is open to any Member to go and talk to their PCT and ask it to place a higher priority on providing digital hearing aid funding for its local area. I would have thought that the hon. Lady would welcome this unique collaboration, and the fact that 250,000 people now have digital hearing aids. That is 250,000 more than would ever have had them under her policies.

Tom Levitt (High Peak) (Lab): Despite the scepticism of both the Opposition parties, does my hon. Friend agree that the roll-out of the digital hearing aid programme has been a massive success for a partnership between the public and voluntary sectors? Although I am sure that he would not wish to see a voluntary sector equivalent of privatisation, does he agree, based on this evidence, that the voluntary sector has a major role to play in future partnerships, not only for local delivery but for the strategic delivery of enhanced and increased services in the NHS?

Dr. Ladyman: As usual, my hon. Friend provides a voice of sanity in a debate too often distorted by the biases of the Opposition parties. This has indeed been a unique collaboration between the voluntary and public sectors. It is something that we can learn from across the board, and I want to see more of these collaborative projects being rolled out in a range of other areas besides audiology.

Dentists

3. Mr. Parmjit Singh Gill (Leicester, South) (LD): What assessment he has made of progress with the new contract for NHS dentists. [202203]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Preparations for the most far-reaching reforms of NHS dentistry since 1948, founded on the delegation of new contractual arrangements to primary care trusts, are proceeding on time for introduction from 1 October 2005.

Mr. Gill: Given that many dentists have said that they might still go private in spite of the new contract, and that many people in constituencies such as mine are facing increasing difficulty in accessing an NHS dentist, what specific steps is the Minister taking to engage dentists in the new contract to encourage more of them to undertake NHS work?

Ms Winterton: We are continuing our discussions with the British Dental Association on the new contract, the principles of which were drawn up after years of discussions with the BDA, following the fiasco that took place under the Conservatives. In fact, dentists are voting with their feet. About 2,500 have now moved over to the new way of working, at about 1,000 sites around the country. We are also continuing with international recruitment; we shall recruit another 1,000 dentists into the NHS by next October, and increase the number of dentists in training. All this is sending a clear message to NHS dentists that we are increasing investment and training, and providing the new way of working for which they have been asking for many years.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on her work so far with the new contract arrangements. Will she join me in congratulating Doncaster health care services, which has just opened a brand new, state-of-the-art dental access centre with a same-day phone and go service? May I ask her to do one thing more and put further pressure on dentists to let people know that they are being de-registered? Usually, the first time that constituents get to know about it is when they turn up for emergency treatment and are told that they cannot have it.

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right to congratulate our local health services on opening the new centre in Mexborough. It represents £3 million of new investment and is one of the first facilities in the country to bring family dentists and hospital dentists together under one roof, so it is very innovative. Naturally, it will benefit some of my constituents as well as some of his.

My hon. Friend is right on his wider point about dentists who de-register patients: they are supposed to give notice to the PCT and to their patients. We are working with PCTs to ensure that they are in regular touch with their local dentists and encouraging them to move to the new system, but if they are not, they should ensure that we can consider a system whereby we have knowledge of the whereabouts of those who are de-registered, so that when we increase the number of NHS dentists we can ensure that they have access to them.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): Clearly, I have a slight interest in this subject. At a recent press conference, the Secretary of State, in announcing the last White Paper, said to the BDA representative, "Dentistry's sorted." That certainly is not the feeling of the dentists, the BDA, the dental organisations or even the National Audit Office. If it is sorted, will the Minister tell us when the draft contract will be available for dentists and the dental organisations?

Ms Winterton: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman recognises that the NAO report said clearly that we are moving in the right direction. It identified some risks associated with that, but to address those risks we have dental advisers in every PCT, talking with local dentists about moving to the new way of working. As I have said, we are continuing discussions with the BDA and will publish contractual guidance to PCTs in due course.

Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): The experience of the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Gill) is different from that of my constituents in Hartlepool PCT. Under all the key performance indicators, the number of registered patients, the changes in the number of registered patients and the number of practices that are allowing NHS patients to be registered are all massively above the average for England—but I am not complacent. What will my hon. Friend the Minister do to ensure that all those patients in Hartlepool who are registered and who want to be registered get the resources needed to ensure that they receive a full dental service from the NHS?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is right to say that in his area about 75 per cent. of dentists are taking on new NHS patients—but we would not want to be complacent about that. There is sometimes an issue, as he says, about people who may not be registering but whom we want to register. There have been a number of initiatives around the country, most particularly in London, where people have been encouraged to come forward to register so that, in general, the oral health of the population can improve. We will certainly consider such initiatives in his constituency.

Dame Marion Roe (Broxbourne) (Con): Is the Minister aware that the National Audit Office reported recently that primary care trusts may not have the capacity or capability to manage the new dental contract? Is she confident that, as the Prime Minister said in 1999, the new contract will ensure that everyone has access to an NHS dentist within two years?

Ms Winterton: The hon. Lady may not have noted what I said to the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), which was that the NAO report recognised that we were moving in the right direction. It identified some risks, and as she said, one of the priorities was ensuring that primary care trusts were able to implement the new contract. She may recall that we announced some months ago that, after discussions with the British Dental Association, we had agreed to delay implementation of the contract until October 2005, to ensure that PCTs were able to implement it by that date. On top of that, in the run-up to that date, we have been organising training sessions with every PCT and issuing guidance about how to do that. As I have said previously, on the ground, many dentists are already moving over to the new way of working—2,500 are doing so in about 1,000 sites around the country, with others wanting to do so. That indicates that dentists recognise that we are moving in the right direction, as did the NAO, and that we will be able to implement the new contract by October.

Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): Unfortunately, the experience of my dentist, whom I visited yesterday morning, is slightly different. While he was messing around inside my mouth, he wanted to inform me that his practice is going to move into the private sector rather than remain in the national health service. One of the problems was the delay in the contract and the uncertainty that that has caused. Can the Minister reassure me, so that I can go back and convince him not to take that course of action, that the contract will be in place by October, and that it will provide certainty to dentists across the country that there is a future for NHS dentistry, not just for me but for every constituent whom I represent?

Ms Winterton: Of course, my hon. Friend is right to be concerned if his dentist says that he plans to move into the private sector. What I would say is that his dentist could already move to the new way of working. I am prepared to talk with the local PCT and suggest that the dental adviser there contacts him and offers him the opportunity to move to the new personal dental services system immediately, if that is what he would prefer to do.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): The NAO and the chief executive of the Dental Laboratories Association, Mr. Richard Daniels, whom I had the pleasure of meeting this morning, both fear that the new contract will give dentists a perverse incentive to abandon some costly dental work that they currently give to dental laboratories. Indeed, a dental technician from Oldham, where the new contract is being piloted, has written to say that between 80 and 90 per cent. of the work that he gets from NHS practices in his area has disappeared. Why is the Minister diverting money for high-quality crown, denture and orthodontic work from dental laboratories to dental practices? Is that the way to make an unpopular dental services contract more acceptable to dentists?

Ms Winterton: There will not be such a diversion away from dental technicians. It will be possible to do anything that is clinically necessary under the NHS under the new contract. Some research has been done on patterns of treatment under the new way of working, and there was a slight decrease in the initial stages, but there is no firm evidence that dental technicians and laboratories will suffer. It is the clinical decision of the dentist as to whether the work needs to be done. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not saying that NHS or other dentists would not act in a clinically professional manner.

Hospitals (Nottingham)

4. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What the percentage change in waiting lists and waiting times for hospital in-patient treatment in Nottingham has been since 1997; and if he will make a statement.

[202204]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): In March 1997, there were 3,444 patients waiting more than nine months for in-patient treatment at the two NHS trusts in Nottingham. Latest figures show that there are now no patients waiting more than nine months at either trust.

Mr. Allen: That is a fantastic and very welcome statistic, as is the 50 per cent. reduction in the number of people on the waiting list from 15,000 to 7,500. Will the Minister take this opportunity to thank and congratulate all in the health service—not just doctors and nurses, but the health workers, administrators and managers who ensure that waiting lists are managed properly? Will he also guarantee that funds for the health service will not be reduced, and will he venture to speculate on what might happen in the event of, for instance, a £50 billion Budget cuts package?

Mr. Hutton: I certainly agree with what my hon. Friend has said about the fantastic work done by NHS staff in Nottingham. They are doing a brilliant job, as I saw for myself when I was there last week. I am sure that everyone in Nottingham would join him in praising the work of NHS staff in that great city.

The progress made in Nottingham and elsewhere has been possible because of our investment and reforms, both of which would be at risk from the policies of the Conservative party.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I, too, congratulate NHS staff in Nottingham. I had an opportunity to visit maternity staff at Nottingham City hospital, who deliver 6,000 babies a year and provide a very good service. Perhaps, however, the Minister will now answer the question, and deal with the reference to waiting times. Will he tell us how long, on average, patients waited to be admitted for treatment during the last financial year?

Mr. Hutton: I did answer my hon. Friend's question, and I am sure that he was happy with my answer. In asking his own question, the hon. Gentleman wants to do one thing above all else: he wants to claim, as do his hon. Friends, that the NHS is not making progress—that waiting times are not falling but rising. He is wrong on that count, and also in what he says about average waiting times. The facts are set out in the statistical supplement to the chief executive's annual report. If he would like to study it in more detail, I shall arrange for him to have a copy.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister, but I have a copy of the chief executive's report. It claims that NHS patients are waiting less long for treatment, but what the chief executive did not publish—indeed, they were not published until this morning—are statistics showing how long patients waited during the last financial year. The average waiting time was 90 days in 1999–2000, and 95 days in 2003–04.

Let us be accurate. The Minister is right in saying that the number of people waiting for more than nine months has fallen, but he should also admit that the average time for which people are waiting has increased. Both those facts are true.

Mr. Hutton: No, that is not true. The facts are set out very plainly in the chief executive's report.

One thing is clear from this exchange, and from the other exchanges that we have had on this subject. The hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends want to trash and ignore all the progress that the NHS is making, and all the hard work of NHS staff in Nottingham and elsewhere. The truth is that the national health service is getting better and waiting times are falling. Their policies would reverse that progress, take money out of the NHS and allow well-off people to jump the queue. That is totally unacceptable.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): A 400 per cent. reduction in the number of in-patient bed stays for drug addicts has been achieved at Bassetlaw hospital. So that hospitals in Nottingham can benefit from a similar reduction, will the Minister conduct an audit to establish how the fall in hospital costs was achieved?

Mr. Hutton: I should be happy to do that.

Care Homes

5. Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): What representations he has received on the practice of care homes and nursing homes charging fees after the death of a resident in lieu of notice; and if he will make a statement. [202205]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): A search of the Department's correspondence database has revealed only one representation on the issue. Under the care home regulations, each resident is required to have a contract with the care home. The contract should specify conditions relating to payment and notice required.

Mr. Wills: As my hon. Friend knows, one of my constituents was deeply distressed recently when his mother died and the care home where she had been staying charged her estate two weeks' fees in lieu of notice. My constituent went to the Daily Mail, and the home then refunded the charges and took the offending clause out of the contract for the benefit of future residents. But the problem still remains for others and is particularly unfair on those who fund themselves. As I understand it, social services departments' contracts do not include such clauses. I recognise that Ministers cannot intervene in individual contracts, but given that social services departments and the Daily Mail seem able to secure more dignified and civilised behaviour from nursing homes at such a sensitive time, will the Government look into what more they can do?

Dr. Ladyman: First and foremost, anybody who goes into a care home needs to understand that they should have a clear contract telling them what will happen in the event of their death. Secondly, my hon. Friend is right in that, when local government negotiates bulk contracts with care homes, it can often get much better terms and conditions than individuals can because it is buying in bulk. I have been encouraging local government to use its power to ensure that such terms and conditions are passed on to people who are self-funding. Thirdly, there will soon be an opportunity to carry out the review that my hon. Friend seeks through the review of the national minimum standards, which I have already announced. I shall certainly take that opportunity to see whether we can do anything further to help.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): I certainly share the concern expressed by the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) about this particularly distasteful practice. But is it not true that nursing homes and care homes have to do such things because they are under huge financial pressure, brought about in part by the overly bureaucratic and prescriptive regulations imposed on them by the Government? Is it not also true that nursing homes and care homes in Worcestershire might have to resort to such practices—I hope that they do not—because of the underfunding of Worcestershire's social services? I invite the Minister to join the cross-party campaign for the area cost adjustment that would provide a fairer share of national funding for Worcestershire's social services department.

Dr. Ladyman: That was yet another demand from the Conservatives for money that they are singularly unprepared to provide themselves. In fact, adult social services has received a 30 per cent. above-inflation increase since 1997, and local government has more than enough money to pay the market rate for care home places, which is what I always encourage it to do. It would be entirely inappropriate for us to force local government to pay more than the market rate simply to keep open places in care homes that people do not want to be in. The Government want people to be able to choose where they spend their retirement, while the Conservatives want everyone to be banged up in a care home.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield) (Lab): Does the Minister recall that when he came before the Health Committee to discuss elder abuse, concern was expressed about the current arrangements for the certification of deaths in care homes and nursing homes, whereby a single doctor can certify a death without actually seeing the body? The Minister shared the Committee's concern about that practice. Have any steps been taken to deal with this issue?

Dr. Ladyman: My hon. Friend is right; I do indeed share his concern. Since the meeting to which he refers, the Home Office has produced new guidance on the certification of deaths in care homes and on the tightening of regulations. In conjunction with the Home Office, I am reviewing those guidelines to see whether they will actually meet the concerns that he and I expressed. I would very much welcome his views in an effort to come up with a system that we can be confident will work better in future.

Edgware Hospital

6. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress with Edgware Hospital's new-build project. [202207]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): The current phase of building at the new £40 million Edgware hospital is due to be completed later this month. The new hospital will be operational in March of next year and will provide an expanded range of services, including intermediate care, services for the elderly mentally ill and a dedicated centre for children, thereby improving both the quality and convenience of local NHS services.

Mr. Dismore: Does that not show the progress that we have made in the health service, and certainly in my area, bearing in mind that Edgware hospital was closed by the Conservatives in April 1997, before that year's election? Will my right hon. Friend pay an early visit to the hospital to see what we have been able to achieve there, and will he look favourably on our bid for additional diagnostic services, particularly an MRI scanner—to be shared with the Royal National Orthopaedic hospital—and a CT scanner? Such equipment would ensure that we have diagnostic services fit for the 21st century, just as the new hospital will be.

Mr. Hutton: I am glad to join my hon. Friend in welcoming the new hospital in his constituency. There is no doubt that the NHS is making progress in his part of London. I shall be happy to visit the new hospital when it is operational. We are looking carefully at what additional diagnostic services may be necessary in London and in my hon. Friend's area in particular, including additional MRI capacity. Those decisions will be taken locally, but I can confirm to him that we are looking to significantly increase and improve diagnostic capacity in the NHS in London.

Clinical Trials

7. Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): What measures he is taking to ensure compliance with the concordat on the NHS funding of excess treatment costs of Medical Research Council clinical trials. [202208]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): The NHS plays a vital part in medical research, ensuring that patients benefit from new and better treatments. We expect primary care trusts to meet the excess treatment costs of Medical Research Council clinical trials from their general allocations.

Dr. Harris: The Minister has not answered the question. What measures are the Government taking to ensure compliance with the concordat? The hon Lady says that she expects compliance. In the Thames valley there is not enough funding for recruitment to Myelona IX, an MRC blue chip trial, and the strategic health authority tells me that the only way it can ensure compliance is to include it as a performance measure. What is the point of a health service circular such as HSG (97) 32 if the only way it can be enforced is through performance targets? Is it not important that we guarantee funding to ensure equitable access to critical research trials?

Ms Winterton: I am aware of the point that the hon. Gentleman makes. There is massive extra investment going into his primary care trust. I am aware also that the strategic health authority held a meeting on the issue with the chief executives of primary care trusts on Friday, and that he has written to my noble Friend Lord Warner, who will be looking into the matter and, if necessary, pursuing it through the strategic health authority.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): Would not considerably more money be available to the Medical Research Council if money did not have to be diverted to protect workers in primary research projects from the activities of animal rights activists? Is it not about time that that link was made so that the public could understand the importance of the work conducted by scientists and the MRC?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I know from my constituency work that the public are concerned about those activities and their effect on medical research. As I am sure my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is taking through legislation to deal with some of those activities, with the full support of Labour Members.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Will the recent changes to the MRC grant system offer greater opportunities for working in partnership with charities and other research councils? If so, what are those opportunities?

Ms Winterton: We are looking at ways in which the relationship between the MRC and the charity sector can be expanded. I do not know the details of how that will be implemented, but I am prepared to write to the hon. Gentleman if that would be helpful.

Recruitment

8. Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): What plans his Department has to increase the recruitment of allied health professionals. [202209]

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Mr. John Hutton): The national health service is on course to meet its expected requirements for an additional 30,000 therapists and scientists in the NHS between 2001 and 2008. Since 1997 the number of allied health professionals working in the NHS has increased by 26 per cent. to 55,946.

Mr. Jack: Although the Minister's reply is helpful—he well knows the health pressures on the Fylde coast—will he look into the availability of child psychologists in the Fylde, where I am told that waiting times of up to 80 weeks for a first consultation are not unusual? In the case of the supply of speech therapists, the Minister knows from correspondence that I have sent him that that is currently being curtailed by difficulties in establishing new training positions at St. Martin's college. Will he look at both of those in the light of his answer and see whether some of the bottlenecks that we are facing can be ameliorated?

Mr. Hutton: I always try to be helpful to the right hon. Gentleman and I shall certainly look into the two matters that he has raised. The waiting times for child psychology to which he referred are totally unacceptable, and I shall bring my best endeavours to bear to sort them out for him.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is a shortage of occupational therapists in the NHS? That is certainly true in the Burnley area, where the shortage causes problems with social services and other organisations when decisions are being made about how dwellings should be adapted so that people can live at home rather than be forced to stay in hospital.

Mr. Hutton: I understand that occupational therapy faces particular recruitment difficulties, as my hon. Friend has noted. We have never claimed to have solved every capacity shortage in the NHS work force, but we are making significant progress towards improving the service's capacity in respect of allied health professionals. That is an important area, and we will do our best to make further progress in the years ahead.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Under the draft Mental Health Bill, the Government propose a new and extended role for approved allied medical professionals. That role would be similar to the one performed by approved social workers. What steps are the Government taking to plan for the recruitment and training of suitable staff when the Bill becomes law?

Mr. Hutton: My hon. Friend the Minister of State has published for consultation a draft work force plan that deals with the issues that the hon. Gentleman raises. We are still discussing those matters in the NHS.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): In my constituency, the local primary care sector has had considerable success in recruiting foreign physicians' assistants. What steps are being taken to recruit, train and give accreditation to our own, home-grown physicians' assistants?

Mr. Hutton: A significant amount of work is going on in the NHS to deal with the question that my hon. Friend raises. We all want the NHS to be more flexible, responsive and convenient, but that means we must make a significant investment in improving the skill mix in the work force. Much work needs to be done locally and nationally in relation to the activities of the professional bodies and groups such as the Nursing and Midwifery Council. However, it is right and proper that we make a concerted effort to make sure that the NHS catches up with many other developed health care systems, and especially the US, where assistant practitioners play a very expanded role.

I think that we can catch up. We are making good progress, and the traditional medical professions are not being dumbed down, as some have suggested. This is a sensible path to take, as it will allow the NHS to become more flexible and efficient. It is in the interests of everyone, both taxpayers and patients, that we make maximum progress in this area.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Is the Minister concerned that 82 per cent. of radiographers rejected the proposals in "Agenda for Change"? Why does he believe that increasing their working week from 35 to 37.5 hours—without a corresponding increase in hourly rates of pay—will improve morale, or encourage radiographers into the profession?

Mr. Hutton: Thirteen other professional groups—

Mr. Burns: I was talking about radiographers.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hutton: Thirteen other professional groups have voted to accept the increased hours for allied health professionals. I regret that the radiographers have rejected the deal, but we are still working with the Society of Radiographers to find a sensible way forward. We are keen to discuss a number of proposals, including the use of recruitment and retention premiums. Those discussions are under way.

I can tell the House that the maximum pay rate for basic-grade radiographers will rise by 15 per cent. under "Agenda for Change". That is a significant investment, and we are also making significant headway in recruiting more radiographers into the NHS. The vacancy rate for radiographers is falling and we have doubled the numbers coming into training. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is prepared to welcome those improvements at least.

Accident and Emergency

9. Mrs. Lorna Fitzsimons (Rochdale) (Lab): What plans he has to reduce waiting times in accident and emergency departments. [202210]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): Last month, 97 per cent. of patients were seen and diagnosed, and were able to begin treatment, within four hours. The NHS is on track to ensure that, by the end of this month, at least 98 per cent. of patients enjoy the same care. That is a world standard for the NHS.

Mrs. Fitzsimons: May I bring to my right hon. Friend's attention the spectacular turnaround in the accident and emergency department of Rochdale infirmary? Is he aware that the basic ingredients for that turnaround were already in place, although investment was gratefully received? In fact it was the team of clinicians—Don, David, Rip, Selim and Mark, who are the consultants, Ann Rhodes, who was the linchpin as manager and the nursing staff—that galvanised the whole hospital to work together. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that under "Agenda for Change" and with future investment, the key role of medical secretaries, medical record staff and their senior managers will be enhanced and appreciated, because without their pivotal role—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Lady has made her point. She has a very good hospital.

Dr. Reid: Yes, but no one could blame my hon. Friend for lauding and celebrating the success of the NHS in Rochdale infirmary and more widely. She is right that it is a team effort. It is composed of massive investment by the taxpayer, through the Government, and massive commitment by the team in Rochdale, and others throughout the country, to reach such a world standard of treatment. The whole of the NHS is finding new ways of working, with—I have to say—a degree of leadership at local and national level from managers and chief executives, as well as clinical and administrative staff. The idea that we should throw all that away by cutting the amount of investment or abandoning that leadership and those targets and objectives is crazy, but that is what is on offer from the Opposition.

Dr. Richard Taylor (Wyre Forest) (Ind): Does the Secretary of State agree that where there are still stresses on accident and emergency departments, one way to help would be to increase the range of work undertaken by neighbouring minor injuries units?

Dr. Reid: Yes, I do. The hon. Gentleman is learned in such matters and he appreciates the position. I visited a unit that is establishing a rapid response unit and going even further than providing fast and easy access to accident and emergency services by ensuring that people get a response in their own homes for minor injury. That is another way in which the new ways of working in the national health service are achieving better, more convenient and faster access to health care for everyone.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is right. The Staffordshire ambulance force is one of the best in the country, with the most rapid response times. My right hon. Friend will also be aware of the work that the London Ambulance Service is undertaking. It has a system of triage and sends out cars or motorcycles to attend some emergencies. As a result, it has cut tremendously the number of admittances by ambulance to emergency units. That is the way forward, coupled with the stationing of GPs in some accident and emergency departments to treat people who turn up on a Tuesday morning with an injury they suffered on the football field on Saturday. Will my right hon. Friend comment on the support that the Government have given to encourage innovative ways of introducing such systems?

Dr. Reid: My hon. Friend is right. I visited the service that he mentioned with him, and it has achieved astounding results. He is also right that systems are being tried and tested elsewhere in the country. Peter Bradley of the London Ambulance Service is involved in reviewing some of those procedures at the moment. The great thing about all that, which is often omitted from contributions by the Opposition and newspapers, is that huge benefits are bestowed by NHS staff who are prepared to work in ways in which they have never worked before and provide better quality and more convenient health care. A fantastic amount of work is being done to balance those things that do go wrong and the shortages and challenges that remain. I only wish we had more balanced reports on that in the public domain.

Hormone Replacement Therapy

10. Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): What guidance has been given to patients and general practitioners on the long-term use of hormone replacement therapy. [202211]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): Advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines is that the benefits of short-term treatment of menopausal symptoms outweigh the risks in most women. The lowest effective dose should be used for the shortest possible time.

Rev. Martin Smyth: I thank the Minister for her response. She will be aware that even the press has been ambiguous when reporting what should best be done. About 20 years ago, I buried a young woman who had been on HRT. Another young woman who was advised to take it at the time refused to do so; she is still living. Some clear guidance should be given to patients and doctors on how to use HRT.

Miss Johnson: I should like to reassure the hon. Gentleman that advice has been widely communicated to health professionals and patients to support informed choice. That advice it is available on the Medicines and Healthcare products Regulatory Agency website through the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Hospitals

12. Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): What the total investment in NHS hospitals was in (a) 2004–05 and (b) 1996–97. [202213]

The Secretary of State for Health (Dr. John Reid): We do not make a distinction between investment in hospitals and in other NHS facilities. However, in 1996–97, total NHS spend was £33 billion and in 2004–05 planned NHS expenditure is £69.4 billion. Between 1996–97 and 2004–05, capital investment has increased by 170 per cent.

Jonathan Shaw: That money has seen investment in our local hospitals in Kent, resulting, this month, in a reduction of the maximum waiting time for cataract operations to three months. Will he congratulate all the NHS staff who work in our facilities to ensure that that type of service is proving possible?

Dr. Reid: Yes, I am delighted to do so. I know of the distress and anguish caused, especially for elderly people, by waiting for cataract operations. Reductions in waiting times throughout the country—sometimes from 18 months or two years down to three months and, in some cases, weeks—show that people are receiving a fantastically improved NHS locally. Although we are using the same standard for judging waiting times that has been used for decades, and it is legitimate to talk about a vast improvement, that standard is not good enough, because it counts people only from the time after diagnosis. I fully intend—as do the Government, if re-elected—to get rid of hidden waits and to judge the time from the first time people see a GP right through to the treatment centre: in that case, for cataract operations. We shall make it an average of 10 weeks; not the years that people had to wait under the previous Government.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): I have almost lost track of the number of millions of pounds of new investment at my local hospital, the James Paget NHS trust. One of the best investments was £1 million in new accident and emergency facilities that have enabled my local trust not only to meet all the waiting-time reduction targets for A and E, but to achieve 100 per cent. on Sundays. Will my right hon. Friend congratulate the staff and management of the hospital on putting that extra investment to the best possible use?

Dr. Reid: I have no hesitation in doing so—[Laughter.] Nor, while Opposition Front Benchers laugh at the efforts of NHS staff, do I have any hesitation in saying that those improvements are to the credit of NHS staff; not politicians, pundits or commentators, but the staff themselves. I am delighted that the recent progress report from the national director for emergency access, Sir George Alberti, has been independently confirmed by the National Audit Office, which, in its report on improving emergency care in England, noted sustained and significant improvements over the past two years. That is due partly to the efforts of the staff, but partly to the investment put in by the taxpayer; the 170 per cent. increase in capital expenditure. It is also due to the fact that, under the Government, 16 hospital schemes of more than £50 million have already become operational; 16, in just seven years. In 18 years—almost three times that figure—of the last Conservative Government, only 10 hospital schemes of that nature were built. That is a significant difference between us. We shall continue to provide all that, free at the point of need, and there is no way that the Government will introduce charges for operations.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Despite all that extra money, the outlook for breast cancer sufferers and other cancer patients in Kent and East Sussex is far from rosy. When will the Secretary of State put in the necessary investment to the Maidstone oncology centre so that waiting times can start to come down again? They have been rising for the past year or more, up to 15 weeks.

Dr. Reid: I thank the hon. Gentleman for raising this issue, although I did not see him during the rest of Health questions. [HON. MEMBERS: "He was here."] In that case, I apologise, but he is wrong about cancer. In the first six years of this Government, there was a reduction of 12.2 per cent. in premature deaths from cancer, and one of the reasons is that 99 per cent. of people who are diagnosed as having a serious potential cancer are seen by a consultant within two weeks. I fully accept that there is a problem because the throughput of people seeing a consultant is now so fast that there is a bottleneck at the next stage, diagnostics. That is one of the reasons why we have just procured 600,000 extra scans—120,000 a year—from the independent sector. Every time we take a major step forward, other problems arise, but we will tackle them one by one, and the NHS is greatly improved overall.

Leeds Teaching Hospitals Trust

14. Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): What discussions his Department has had with Leeds Teaching Hospitals trust about its deficit. [202215]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Miss Melanie Johnson): The West Yorkshire strategic health authority is responsible for overseeing the Leeds trust's financial recovery plan. There have been no direct discussions between the Department and the trust management about this matter.

Mr. Challen: The deficit locally is generally described as historical—in other words, it dates from the period in the 1980s and early 1990s when the NHS in Leeds was underfunded—but it has been a perpetual millstone around our necks in Leeds. Is my hon. Friend willing to meet me and colleagues from Leeds to discuss a way to sort out that problem?

Miss Johnson: Of course; I am always happy to meet colleagues on matters of concern to them, but I should point out to my hon. Friend that our view is that the deficit has arisen entirely in-year and is not historical, as he suggests.

BILL PRESENTED

Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment

Secretary Margaret Beckett, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Blunkett, Secretary Tessa Jowell, Mr. Peter Hain and Alun Michael, presented a Bill to amend section 6 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998; to make provision for the gating of certain minor highways; to make provision in relation to vehicles parked on roads that are exposed for sale or being repaired; to make provision in relation to abandoned vehicles and the removal and disposal of vehicles; to make provision relating to litter and refuse, graffiti, fly-posting and the display of advertisements; to make provision relating to the transportation, collection, disposal and management of waste; to make provision relating to the control of dogs and to amend the law relating to stray dogs; to make provision in relation to noise; to provide for the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment and for the making of grants relating to the quality of the built environment; to amend the law relating to abandoned shopping and luggage trolleys; to amend the law relating to statutory nuisances; to amend section 78L of the Environmental Protection Act 1990; to amend the law relating to offences under Schedule 1 to the Pollution Prevention and Control Act 1999; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 11].

Point of Order

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Members on both sides of the House and, indeed, a number of national governing bodies for sport were expecting today a major announcement from the Government about the future of sport. It was trailed extensively on the Central Council for Physical Recreation website. Apparently, it has been pulled, and no explanation has been given. Have you any guidance to offer us on what has happened? Have the Government communicated to you any time when they might make that announcement in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: I have not had any contact with any Minister regarding this matter.

Orders of the Day

Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.32 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

When I spoke a week ago yesterday in the debate on the Queen's Speech, I indicated that much of the Bill will be non-controversial and have the support of the whole House. We are dealing in the main, therefore, with issues of detail, clarification and, in some cases, interpretation. There will undoubtedly be party political differences about some aspects of the Bill, particularly in Committee, but on the whole people agree that we are right to set up the Serious Organised Crime Agency and to underpin it with the changes in powers, thereby building on the reforms and modernisation that we have already put in place in relation to policing in this country and through the proposals in the police White Paper.

We published "One Step Ahead" as part of the consultation process on the Bill and on the Serious Organised Crime Agency. I remember that the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), the shadow Home Secretary, said a week ago yesterday that we were not always one step ahead in dealing with organised crime. He might be surprised to hear that I agree with him. There is a real problem in taking on the most sophisticated criminals in the world, who understand the tenets of capitalism a lot better than capitalists do. Their grasp of how to deal with a market internationally, how to change their methodology and how to use new techniques is breathtaking.

Although the massive increase in police numbers, the reduction in crime and the creation of community support officers, which are referred to in the Bill, are critical in building the infrastructure—I notice that Bill Bratton, the former commissioner of New York and now of Los Angeles police, referred this morning on the "Today" programme to the critical importance of interlinking neighbourhood policing and tackling antisocial behaviour in building confidence and then helping with organised crime—the challenge of the decade is undoubtedly to get grips with cross-border international crime.

All nations are considering the interrelationship between organised crime and terrorism and the relationship between trans-national travel and improved communication, by which I mean the use of satellite, the internet and mobile phones, as well as arrangements in terms of people's ease of communication when they travel. All of that has transformed, within the past few decades, the nature of criminality and the way in which people exploit the previous understanding of what was necessary.

If the methodology and the sophistication of techniques have changed, we need to change rapidly with them. That will be the case year on year. There will have to be changes in the way in which the service operates, even as a combined entity, linking investigation, intelligence and its work with the prosecution services. Of course, there must also be the methodology of developing the technology that matches that of the organised criminals.

Organised criminality costs our economy and commercial life at least £20 billion each year. Some £1.3 billion of that is the result of identity fraud alone, never mind the massive investment in hours that it takes to sort that out, not just in terms of policing and the criminal justice service, but of everyone else whose productivity and lives are affected by it.

We have been getting better at getting to grips with that. In the 18 months to the end of 2003, which are the latest figures, we have disrupted and confiscated 11 tonnes of heroin and 26 tonnes of cocaine. The sophistication of the work with other countries to disrupt the supply of cocaine from Colombia and the work that is taking place in the Caribbean is impressive. Just three weeks ago, I was talking to Dominique de Villepin, the Interior Minister in France, about how we might step up that work by sharing resources and by sharing the task across the Caribbean with the Americans in the light of what is happening in central and south America and the West Indies.

We have not been as successful in dealing with trafficking and organised criminality in terms of the poppy supply and heroin from Afghanistan, which is a primary concern for this country. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs spoke yesterday about getting to grips with the problem. On the day that President Karzai is inaugurated, I think that we would want to work with a new democratic and strong Afghanistan in taking additional steps to ensure that we get to grips with what is literally a disabler and sometimes a killer on our streets.

These days we have to think internationally about the way in which change takes place. I am proud that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development is on the Front Bench, because it emphasises the importance not only of tackling the causes of criminality and of putting in place preventive measures to give people alternative livelihoods but of clamping down on enforcement. Unless we do so, organised criminals will pay the subsistence farmers, whether in south America or Afghanistan, sums that they could never get by growing existing crops. Development aid, development of trade and tackling the causes of drug production are therefore critical.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): The Home Secretary makes an important point. I was at the UN last week with a cross-party group. The head of drug enforcement told us that the amount of land under opium cultivation in Afghanistan will rise by 64 per cent. this year. Given that NATO is in control there, why should we believe that things will get better next year when the situation has patently got a lot worse in the past 12 months?

Mr. Blunkett: The steps that are put in place take time to work. The installation of a democratic presidency and government in Afghanistan makes an enormous difference. I am sure that the meetings that the hon. Gentleman attended at the UN would have reinforced the long-term nature of what needs to be done. We are not going to solve this problem next year. We can start to tackle it, but it will be a decade before we see substantial change—not because we want it to take that long, but because enormous forces are against us.

I was about to move on to pay tribute to the work that has been done since the creation of the National Crime Squad and the National Criminal Intelligence Service, which are themselves quite new. Good work has also been done with the immigration service and part of Customs and Excise. Together, those organisations will form the new Serious Organised Crime Agency. We are grateful for the work that people have done in pulling together towards that goal.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): The Secretary of State mentioned work with the immigration services. The Bill contains some welcome provisions on witness protection in hideous people trafficking cases, but does he share my concern that there are very few safe houses for women who have been trafficked? According to a presentation in the House last week by Amnesty International, there are no safe houses for children who have been trafficked; the last two such places recently closed.

Mr. Blunkett: I am happy to look further into that as a matter of urgency, particularly in respect of the point about children. There are 6,000 young people under the age of 18 in this country who have been trafficked or, in some cases, sent dangerously by their families across the world in circumstances that none of us would wish to see. Safe accommodation here for those who are prepared to bear witness and help us follow the line in tracking organised criminals should also be matched by safe accommodation in the countries of origin so that people can be returned to their families. The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration and I are both looking into that as a matter of urgency.

In paying tribute to the organisations, I want to say how difficult it has been, even with good will, to exchange the necessary intelligence information and to link investigation, intelligence and prosecution. The added value of the Serious Organised Crime Agency will be measured by its ability to do just that and put together the different activities of the agency in order to produce materially improved results. The new chairman, Sir Stephen Lander, spelled out on the radio this morning the critical importance of getting that right. With his intelligence background, I believe that he will be able to provide a substantive guiding hand for the organisation.

In paying tribute to recent action, I want to mention two or three events over the past 18 months that have demonstrated how, before the agency comes into being on 1 April 2006 after the Bill's passage through both Houses of Parliament, we can and must step up the work to avoid any interregnum or pause in activity.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): The Home Secretary is right to say that there will not be much between us on many aspects of the Bill. One important thing that he must do is bring together the powers, as well as the intelligence, of the three different agencies comprising the Serious Organised Crime Agency. Those powers are different and sometimes intrusive. The excise powers, for example, are very intrusive: they have been designed that way over the course of a long time. The Bill will, however, amalgamate all the powers—police, immigration and excise—effectively under one man. Sir Stephen Lander is used to parliamentary scrutiny of his activities, but is the Home Secretary considering how best to keep an eye on the use of the powers in the first few years of the new agency?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes. That was a helpful intervention. Unlike the Intelligence and Security Committee, the Home Affairs Committee will have open access and scrutiny. The Cabinet Committee on Organised Crime will be responsible for determining overall priorities.

In a moment, boring though it may be, I intend to examine the Bill clause by clause to clarify issues before speeches are made, and I hope that that will help.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I want to be absolutely sure of what the Home Secretary has just said, because it is critical to our understanding. Will all the new agency's activities fall within the remit of the Home Affairs Committee, and will it examine the various aspects of the agency's work?

Mr. Blunkett: Substantially, yes. The Intelligence and Security Committee may ask to examine aspects of the intelligence work, but we do not intend that to be the norm. The agency is a non-departmental public body, so scrutiny will be conducted through the House in the normal way. I know that Sir Stephen Lander and Bill Hughes, the director general, will want to facilitate such scrutiny as readily as possible.

Briefly, 500 officers from the National Crime Squad raided drug dealers in London, Huddersfield and Jamaica a few months ago, which resulted in a large number of arrests and 10 convictions, including one individual who got 25 years. Under Project Reflex, work has taken place to deal with a Midlands-based gang that smuggled people in from India using routes through Ethiopia. Development and support, which involves my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for International Development, who is on the Front Bench, are crucial. That gang charged individuals £8,000 per person to facilitate their being smuggled into the country, which destroys the lives and well-being of those who are left behind. In deprived and growing countries, £8,000 is a massive investment that can transform the life chances of a family as a whole. Instead, it is being used to facilitate the well-being and profits of organised criminals. The current agency is doing a good job until the new agency takes over.

Linkage is so important. When we discuss cross-border agencies, we are talking about linking with colleagues in Scotland on drug administration and working with agencies in Northern Ireland, as well as working across Europe. A lot of work is now taking place in south-east Europe to disrupt organised crime in Bosnia, Kosovo and other south European countries.

New powers, which the shadow Home Secretary has referred to, and new ways of working are crucial. I promised to bore the bottom off the House.

David Davis: The Home Secretary said that he would do that last week.

Mr. Blunkett: I shall try harder this week. Clauses 1 to 4 are about the functions of the Serious Organised Crime Agency, and clause 5 concerns the general powers that underpin SOCA. Clauses 6 and 7 are about the annual report, which relates to the intervention by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) on accountability—as an NDPB, the new agency will be responsible to both the Home Secretary and parliamentary scrutiny in the normal way. I mentioned the Home Affairs Committee, but other mechanisms will also be used.

The co-ordination of the tasking, prioritisation and resourcing will take place through the Cabinet Committee, which will draw together a number of Departments. That will ensure that a balance is struck and that work is done with the Revenue, because none of us wants to undermine the Treasury's resources and income, not least in the lead-up to the Budget in March.

Clauses 8 to 17 set out the relationships involved in different forms of accountability between agencies. I stress the critical importance of keeping the link with activity by police authorities across the country on level 2 crime. If we lose that link, and confidence and focus are undermined at a local and regional level, that will in turn undermine the activities of the agency in operating primarily nationally and internationally but supporting and working with and behind the 43 forces in England and Wales and, where appropriate, the eight Scottish forces.

Mr. Russell Brown (Dumfries) (Lab): I have to tell my right hon. Friend that there appears to be a blurring around the edges. As he well knows, immigration is undoubtedly a reserved matter, yet crime in Scotland is a devolved issue. On issues such as serious organised immigration and Customs crime, the Bill seems to suggest that the lead agency will be the Serious Organised Crime Agency. Does that take away the devolved element of dealing with crime in Scotland?

Mr. Blunkett: The Scottish Drugs Enforcement Agency is to remain. As part of the protocol, the Serious Organised Crime Agency will have to work out its relationships with that agency and others to ensure that where overlaps occur there is a role for the Scottish Executive. I am happy to talk to Westminster Members of Parliament from Scotland, including my hon. Friend, about any concerns that they have. It is important to get things right in what is inevitably a situation requiring co-operation and good will. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and to the Executive for their co-operation on this matter.

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): Clause 11(4) provides that codes of practice should be laid before Parliament. Is it anticipated that there will be any form of affirmative procedure?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes. As my hon. and learned Friend is aware, where matters are technical and non-controversial we generally opt for the normal prayer. Where we are dealing with more controversial issues—I am happy for my hon. Friends to address this in Committee—I am willing to accept an affirmative procedure so that there can, where appropriate, be a debate on the Floor of the House in conjunction with the usual channels.

Clauses 22 to 30 deal with the operational responsibilities of the director general. The autonomy of the operation is absolutely crucial in providing the confidence that people are able to do the job properly in drawing together the various elements, including those who had the powers of the constable.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Home Secretary will be aware that concerns have been expressed in Scotland about clauses 24 and 25, which appear to mean that an officer from south of the border could be seconded to a Scottish police force and given the powers of a police constable in Scotland. The concern centres on the fact that, as the Home Secretary is aware, Scots law and procedure can differ in important respects from English procedure. Will any person so seconded be given proper training in Scots law and procedure beforehand?

Mr. Blunkett: It is important that people are able to work together through mutual support. For instance, we shall work with the French through Project Reflex. Let me put it as gently as I can: if we can demonstrate that we can work well with the French, we must surely be able to work even better with our Scottish colleagues. There is already common ground through working arrangements that allow for cross-border mutual support. I have assurances from Sir Stephen and Bill Hughes that that will be a priority in making things happen on the ground. The director general will be in charge of the operational side.

Clauses 31 to 34 deal with information sharing and the proper exchange of vital data. A year or two ago, there were problems in and between existing agencies. We must ensure that the Serious Organised Crime Agency is not subject to those problems. That is underpinned by recognising the importance of oversight, including by the Home Affairs Committee, of what is done in respect of data sharing and information. I wanted to put that on the record. Issues to do with gateways and information sharing are critical to doing the job, but also raise in all our minds issues that we must address.

Clauses 38 to 49 cover the conferment of the combination of powers held by the existing, separate offices that are to be brought together—as the shadow Home Secretary said—subject to the appropriate training and accreditation. Training and accreditation will be critical if people are to be able to take on the differing roles that have existed, from those in Customs to those of the constable, and will enable them to do the job, wherever they are and in whatever circumstances, much more effectively than has been possible in the past. The chairman and the director general of the new agency have been explicit in saying how crucial that will be and how vital it is that we reassure people about it. The Police Federation has expressed concern, so I want to reassure it that we are mindful of that and happy to continue the consultation.

Clause 50 is about agency staff being subject to the scrutiny and appeal mechanisms of the Independent Police Complaints Commission. During the consultation on the White Paper, concern was expressed that there would be no scrutiny and appeals mechanism where things go wrong. We want to be explicit about those procedures. In Northern Ireland, the Police Ombudsman will take on that role.

Mr. Heath: Will the Independent Police Complaints Commission be responsible for complaints only against officers of the agency who are acting in the role of constable, or will it take complaints in respect of any capacity in which an officer acts?

Mr. Blunkett: Once they have been designated with the powers that exist in all the agencies that are being drawn in, they will be subject to the mechanism of scrutiny by the Independent Police Complaints Commission. There is no other sensible way of doing it, and people will be reassured to know that no one can exceed or misuse their powers without being subject to that scrutiny.

Clauses 54 to 64 ensure that witnesses and others involved co-operate in the provision of documents. They extend to SOCA existing Serious Fraud Office powers that have been used sparingly by the SFO but are absolutely crucial to doing the job. Those powers will be available, in relation to organised crime only, to the police services. That will overcome the nonsense that has existed whereby agencies attempting to get to the truth by accessing documents, including those held on disk, have experienced enormous blockages when people are not prepared to hand over the information. These powers are exercised with the consent of the prosecutor and only where the evidence will be "of substantial value" to the investigation, and parameters and restrictions are in place to avoid their misuse. It will not be possible for someone to incriminate themselves. Moreover, there will be safeguards in relation to professionally privileged material; that will secure the confidence of the legal profession.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: I agree entirely with all the disclosure powers, but there is a provision in clause 56(2)(c) for the director to deliver a disclosure notice where "there are exceptional circumstances making it expedient to do so".

Those circumstances do not appear to be defined. Will they have a definition in due course?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, they will. If my hon. and learned Friend is lucky enough to be on the Committee—although I am not sure whether he would feel lucky to be there—we should value his contribution to getting this right.

Clauses 65 to 68 are about what we colloquially call turning Queen's evidence, and will put a common-law power on to a statutory footing. To give an example, similar powers are used in Australia in about 15 per cent. of convictions for drug trafficking, and in about a quarter of such convictions in the United States. In Britain, the figure is 1 per cent. There is therefore scope for us to look at this issue, with great care. I know that Members will want to examine in Committee how these provisions can operate without encouraging criminals to commit criminal acts to get themselves out of a spot. Obviously, we need to ensure that the proper powers are put in place to ensure that that does not happen.

Clauses 69 to 73 are about financial reporting orders. These measures will close the absurd loophole in which people are able to return to organised crime after they have served their sentence and, in some cases, pick up the assets that they have stashed away so that they can continue to fund and invest in their criminality. As with supervising those coming out after long sentences in other ways, the power will now be available to supervise the use of the resources still held by those individuals, including their bank accounts and other financial holdings, so that we can monitor what they are doing and link it to the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and any further activity can be dealt with and any resources obtained by criminal activity can be confiscated. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that this should have been done a long time ago. The Assets Recovery Agency will be intrinsically involved, and we shall also be able to use the new powers to undertake monitoring.

Clauses 74 to 86 are about witness protection. We need to put on a statutory footing provisions involving the duty to co-operate of agencies such as housing authorities, housing associations and education authorities—in terms of being able to place the children of families who have had to be rehoused, for example. Further provisions include measures to tackle the ridiculous situation involving the disclosure of names, addresses and whereabouts of witnesses, and to ensure that this is simply about witnesses and jurors, rather than about people who have been involved in criminality.

Clauses 89 to 100 are about amending the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, and about the faster disposal and execution of cases involving civil assets. These measures will get rid of a situation that we did not foresee—it has to be said—when the massive Proceeds of Crime Bill was going through Parliament. The situation arises when, if we have not released some of the assets that an individual had, we end up having to pay legal aid in order to be able to prosecute his or her case.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): The Home Secretary might not have realised that that situation would arise, but if he reads the Hansard report of the Committee stage of that Bill, he will see that I did gently point this out to the Government at the time.

Mr. Blunkett: I would not for a moment want to take away the hon. Gentleman's success in this regard. At about 11 o'clock tonight, I shall browse through Hansard and check the exact wording, just to make sure that that happened. I congratulate him on spotting that.

We must also deal with the issue of receivers, and with the fact that, in order to be able to get at someone's assets and to dispose of them, we need to be able to use some of the existing assets being held by the Assets Recovery Agency to pay them, rather than having to pay them from the agency and then trying to recover the cost afterwards. We shall make considerable use of these new powers, including those relating to low-value activity being dealt with through the magistrates courts and to dealing with other issues such as freezing orders, which are also contained in these clauses.

I shall touch on only the key elements of part 3—clauses 101 to 115. They include the extension of the police powers that clarify the powers of arrest. There was a very odd situation, in that certain people had to be facing a sentence of at least five years for the constable to be able to work out—through the police and criminal evidence code—whether they could engage in an arrest. In clarifying that issue, we have made the powers explicit and built in the necessary safeguards in terms of exercising them, including revisions of the PACE code and the clarification of the term "necessity" in relation to arrests. We will publish the revised PACE code on these practical issues shortly.

The Bill will also deal with the interesting issue of a criminal who moves from place to place, or who moves assets or documents from place to place, necessitating a warrant to be taken out for every single premise owned or used by that person. These measures will overcome that problem because the authorisation will relate to the purpose of the warrant, rather than to the premises.

Mr. Grieve: The Home Secretary intends, in proposed new section 24(a), to give powers of arrest without warrant to other persons. According to my reading of that, if I see my neighbour parking his car with a defective rear light and I know that he is about to fly off to Spain on holiday, I will have the power to arrest and detain him until I can summon a constable to the scene. Is that really what the Government intend to achieve?

Mr. Blunkett: After the hon. Gentleman's earlier demonstration of expertise, I shall be very careful about how I answer his question. If the provision could be interpreted in that way, we shall make sure that the wording rules out such an interpretation. There will be an interesting debate in Committee about citizen's arrest more broadly, whether the person involved is going to Spain or elsewhere—[Interruption.] I am just waiting for my learned Friends behind me to help me out on this issue. Perhaps the Committee would be a more appropriate place for that discussion, however.

We then come to the issue of police staff and civilianisation. We are introducing the sensible measure to allow civilian support staff to have a role in custody suites, freeing uniformed staff to perform their tasks more sensibly out in the community.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I am hugely enthusiastic about the use of civilian staff in custody suites, but will my right hon. Friend tell us what safeguards he will put in place if he extends that measure to cover the role of the custody sergeant? One of the huge gains of the past 10 years has been the fall in the number of deaths in custody suites. While we shall make many economic gains by using civilian staff in a general role in custody suites, is my right hon. Friend absolutely certain that now is the time to extend that role to cover the duties of the custody sergeant?

Mr. Blunkett: I am happy for us to explore this question. The issue here is the nature of the oversight involved, either by a uniformed sergeant or by the inspector based in the substantive station.

[Mr. Blunkett]

Obviously, there will not be a custody suite unless the place involved is a substantive police station, as opposed to one of the many outposts that have been developed in shopping centres, civic centres and elsewhere to oversee what is happening. My right hon. Friend, who has great knowledge of these matters, not least as a former police Minister, will be welcome in informing us about the safeguards that might be built in under such circumstances. It is true that there has been a fall in deaths and dangerous activity and in appeals in terms of how people are treated. We would want to retain that at all costs.

That brings me to police community support officers and the powers to be designated by a chief constable. These are about traffic offences and traffic direction, as well as the enforcement of licensing offences relating to antisocial behaviour driven by drink, and include being able to take details and the power of entry to off-licences. Where we are talking about pubs and clubs rather than off-licences, they would have to do this in conjunction with, and when accompanied by, a uniformed officer. Obviously, the issues involve what needs to be done to amend the law in other areas.

The Committee will want to deal with and introduce measures on the seizure of alcohol and tobacco. These relate to how we need to deal with the aftermath of Customs investigations. Furthermore, when drugs are found, we must empower police community support officers to do something about it, rather than merely note that fact, so that that can be incorporated as well.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): I welcome the measures in the Bill, particularly those that will stop the chilling impact on ordinary communities of the activities of local drug dealers and kingpins. Will the Home Secretary, not least in Committee, be cautious as we advance down the welcome road of PCSOs and neighbourhood wardens so that we do not throw the baby out with the bathwater—the beat officer should be the central pillar of neighbourhood policing in a constituency such as mine, where beat officers are not being replaced and vacancies are not being filled—and PCSOs and neighbourhood wardens are complementary to, not a substitute for, effective deployment of police officers on the beat?

Mr. Blunkett: It is absolutely crucial that PCSOs complement and work to support the neighbourhood beat teams. They are part of those teams. Where this has been shown to work best is precisely where we have a number of constables—often led by a sergeant—with the PCSOs as part of the team, undertaking the roles most appropriate to them. We can give that absolute reassurance.

Part 4—clauses 116 to 128—is about the critical area of getting the balance right. If I have learned anything over the past three and a half years—I like to think I have, although I hope I still have quite a lot to learn—it is that we must get the balance right. We must recognise that, where there are new threats, we need new forms of acceptable input to get acceptable behaviour. However, there also needs to be a balance in securing those powers.

Mr. Jon Owen Jones (Cardiff, Central) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend, in considering whether he has the balance right, look at the concerns of some of us about legislating on religious belief? Most organised religions claim that they have an exclusive truth that has been given to them. They usually say some pretty harsh things about other religions and there is a genuine danger that if one reads religious tracts one will find many reasons in the Bill to prosecute people for their religious beliefs.

Mr. Blunkett: I will return in a moment to clauses 116 to 118 on animal rights, which I was about to deal with, so that I can answer properly my hon. Friend and others who have intervened on this issue. It is absolutely not our intention to engage in preventing people from exercising free speech. On 19 November 2001, when we were debating a measure similar to clause 119, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), then shadow Home Secretary, said, quite rightly:

"I put it on record that Conservative Members recognise that the Home Secretary has a noble motive in introducing" part 5 of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Bill. It is not often that such wonderful terms as "noble motive" are used about me, so I savoured it at the time and I thought I would take the opportunity to repeat it. The right hon. Gentleman continued:

"He wants, as we want and as every Member of the House wants, to protect vulnerable religious communities. That is not an issue."—[Official Report, 19 November 2001; Vol. 375, c. 43.]

I hope it will not be an issue in Committee or when this Bill returns to the House.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Blunkett: I promise to give way in a moment to Members from both sides of the House, because this is an important issue. It is about reference to incitement, religious belief or lack of belief, and groups of persons defined by reference to religious belief. That is what we are seeking to deal with in extending what exists already in terms of those groups that can be defined in relation to their nationality.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way. I do not doubt that he has a worthy motive—now and in November 2001—but is there not a question of ensuring that we do not infringe legitimate freedom of speech? Can he confirm what appears to be the case from the notes on clauses, which is that this offence may be committed not just with intent, but without?

Mr. Blunkett: No, I do not think we can infer that. I have made a written statement to back up the debate on Second Reading, so that Members will have it for consideration in Committee. This is about the preservation of the right to legitimate freedom of speech and freedom of religion. It is also about and includes the right to engage in free and vigorous debate on religion, including the right to criticise religious beliefs and practices. It will not criminalise material just because it stirs up ridicule, prejudice, dislike, contempt, anger or similar causes. It is about inciting people in a way that will damage those individuals because of their religion, not because of their beliefs.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Blunkett: I promised to give way behind me.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I am still perplexed because there is no definition of religion. On the 2001 census form, 5,015 people in Sheffield gave Jedi knight as their religion. I hate "Star Wars", so should I be worried?

Mr. Blunkett: If someone incited people because of their love of "Star Wars", or against people with a love of "Star Wars", they would be caught under existing law, but not in terms of religion. That is the whole point—

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): That is the point!

Mr. Blunkett: No, that is the point of having to bring in the new measure to provide equity of treatment in relation to faith.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): I am grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way, but is there not a genuine risk that the courts will misinterpret an attack on someone's religion as an attack on the person who holds that religion? There is a real problem here as people have deeply held religious beliefs that some things, such as evil and some religions, should be hated.

Mr. Blunkett: Look, where there is mono-ethnicity in terms of faith and race, we apply these powers. We are attempting to ensure that the powers are available in cases where that is not the situation—that is, Muslims and Christians.

There is nothing sinister about this; people can crack jokes. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint) and I took a look at the jokes that appeared in the Evening Standard and The Guardian. Well, they might not have been very funny, but they would not be caught by this measure. People can ridicule for all they are worth, but if we genuinely want to address the issue sensibly—we need a sensible debate in Committee to ensure that we get it right—let us not have ridicule of a measure by silliness. It must be addressed philosophically, politically and practically.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): It is sometimes said that there are two things about which people should never argue: one is politics, and the other is religion. That might strike some of us dumb. Is not there some similarity between politics and religion, in that they consider belief systems, seek to interpret and are concerned with values? If there is to be a law against religious hatred, does it follow that there should be a law against political hatred? Does not that illustrate the danger of such a law in connection with religion?

Mr. Blunkett: The crucial issue is incitement. Incidentally, I agree with my hon. Friend about what we were taught when we were little: my grandfather and my mother instilled in me that I should never argue about politics and religion. I got involved with the Methodist Church and became a lay preacher, and argued so much that they said that I would be better in politics than in the pulpit. I am afraid that I am therefore inflicting myself on the House rather than on the Methodist Church.

It is crucial that we home in on incitement to attack, hurt or damage people because of their faith. We are talking about incitement to hate, which leads to that hate damaging those people. We are not talking about all the things that we would expect in a free society, which I read out a moment ago: criticising beliefs, criticising practices and having a really good argument. Three years ago, we discussed these matters and nearly reached an agreement—we were within a whisker of it. In the other place, the argument was that that Act was an inappropriate vehicle for passing this clause. [HON. MEMBERS: " It was."] People are saying that it was, and that is fine. This is another vehicle, so those who said that they objected to the vehicle as opposed to the principle will now be with us, and those who objected to the principle will need to be persuaded.

Mr. Gary Streeter (South-West Devon) (Con): To help me in my approach to clause 119, can the Home Secretary explain what menace he is seeking to address? What is happening in society today in the United Kingdom that he wants to stop happening? That is what he has not explained, and that is what I do not understand.

Mr. Blunkett: We are trying to stop groups of people who are prepared verbally, communicating through writing or the internet, to incite others to hate because of someone's faith. That does not relate to the argument about their faith. For instance, we will not stop anyone proselytising—I emphasise that point, because I met those of all parties, including those in the House who have both a political and religious role, about that. It is important that we do not make a mockery and a monkey of the law, and I would not want Parliament to engage in such debate. I just want to ensure that people out there who feel threatened, which they do, who feel that society is not embracing them, which they do, and who feel that the existing law relating to mono-faith, in terms of nationality and faith, protects such people—those who incite hatred—but does not protect them, are covered. That is why we are seeking to extend the law.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): I apologise to the Home Secretary as I have not heard all of his speech. On this point, however, is it not important that the clause puts right an injustice? No Muslims have available to them the present redress which members of other faiths have because their faith coincides with their ethnicity. Putting right that injustice is a fair reason for the clause.

Mr. Blunkett: That is exactly what we are attempting to do. I can feel the differences of opinion that will exist within political parties in the House as well as between them. [HON. MEMBERS: "This is cross-party."] That is what I have just said. I can hear the differences that exist within as well as between political parties.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Blunkett: I shall give way to the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley)—I was going to call him learned as well, although I do not think that he has a law degree. He came to see me and we had a vigorous conversation, which did me far more good than it did him.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): The Home Secretary is dealing with the issue of interpretation. Who will interpret whether a statement that is contrary to the views of people who think differently religiously is incitement? Were a Protestant to look at the Book of Common Prayer, he would see many things that would be absolutely anathema to a Roman Catholic. Are those things incitement? I advise Members to read the Book of Common Prayer and see that, because some people who think that they have read it have never done so. We must be careful that we do not put the courts into a position in which they must be interpreters of what is and is not incitement. I would think that incitement would be a clear call from a person to attack others if they had a certain belief, which is already covered in the law.

Mr. Blunkett: The issue is incitement to hate. The things to which the hon. Gentleman has referred would not be caught. I was thinking about this last night as I went to the Archbishop's Advent service. We were singing a hymn, which begins, "Thy Kingdom come, O God, Thy rule, O Christ, begin". That includes the verse,

"Men scorn Thy sacred Name,
And wolves devour Thy fold".

We are not talking about the issue of a particular faith's expression; we are talking about people using the faith of individuals to incite hate by others, so that they take actions that are unacceptable.

Mr. Grieve: We all agree that right-thinking people should express themselves in moderate terms about others, including individuals whom they might heartily dislike, but the Bill as drafted will cover devil worshippers' sects and satanists. Why should people not tell others that they should hate and dislike people who have cruel or depraved religious beliefs?

Mr. Blunkett: We can deal with satan worshippers quite easily through the law. What we would not want to do is to incite people to do something themselves against them—[Interruption.] This is about upholding the rule of law. It is about ensuring that where there are loopholes that exclude a particular group because they are a faith group, as opposed to a nationality, they can be included. I do not want people going out inciting others against devil worshippers: I want to deal with the devil worshipping in whatever form it takes.

It is probably best that we deal with the detail in Committee. [HON. MEMBERS: "The devil is in the detail."] The devil is in the detail. Game, set and match.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): For the avoidance of doubt, I respect absolutely the Home Secretary's integrity and good motives in relation to this clause. What my right hon. Friend the Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin), the former shadow Home Secretary, said on that subject is very sound indeed. We must be specific, however. Can I put it to the Home Secretary that were the offence narrowly defined in terms of incitement to hatred to practise violence, that would greatly assist matters? Narrowing down the matter in that way, which, periodically, sub-clauses of his sentences suggested, would aid us. If it is too broad and amorphous, however, it does not aid us at all.

Mr. Blunkett: The difficulty with that is that we are talking about incitement to hate, which causes others to take the action. If the action taken were the issue, the other clause that we passed in the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, which was about aggravation, would apply. It is incitement to taking the action that is the crucial issue.

I did not answer the hon. Member for North Antrim on the issue of the gateway or lock, and I should have done. As a filter, through the Director of Public Prosecutions, the Attorney-General will have a hand in determining the way in which this operates. Of course, we will test case law in the courts in any case, in relation to how it would operate, should the House pass the clause.

I have tried to respond directly to questions rather than simply going through the Bill, but I now wish to return to clauses 116 to 118. They will enable us to deal with an important issue on which I think there is unanimity: animal rights extremists, or rather the protection of those going about their lawful business—including commercial business—under the very strict licensing that we have. As we have said before, the issue of economic sabotage is under discussion. I have lumbered my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State with further meetings about it, which I am sure she has set in train.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): I welcome the measures to deal with animal extremism, which is very damaging to many of my constituents working in the biotech industry, but I was reassured by my right hon. Friend's statement that other measures would be considered. I do not think that the measures in the Bill will be sufficient to ensure that important medical advances will not be damaged by animal rights extremists.

Mr. Blunkett: We must not only consider what additional powers may be required, but use existing mechanisms, such as the national co-ordinator. We must not rely purely on changing the law; we need much more effective enforcement and immediate action. I think that there has already been a transformation.

I pay tribute to Members on both sides of the House with constituency interests, who have been extremely helpful in working with us, and to outside organisations, including the companies involved. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, who has worked extremely hard with my colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry. The experience of getting two Departments and their Ministers to work together has been very instructive.

Harassment, alarm or distress will be dealt with by directing protesters and banning them from the locality for up to three months. The Protection from Harassment Act 1997 will be amended to cover two or more connective persons. All that will make a big difference, and we look forward to discussing it in Committee.

Clauses 120 to 122 deal with trespass. They arise from the investigation that followed an intrusion in Windsor castle. Clauses 123 and 124 follow recommendations by the Procedure Committee. They have been described by some, including me, as a sledgehammer to crack a nut, but sometimes a sledgehammer is needed for that purpose, and this is a tough nut. It is important for people, including protesters, to be able to go about their business, and for people coming to our capital city to be able to enjoy the environment surrounding the Palace of Westminster. It is daft that we should have to pass a law for the purpose, but that is what happens when people make a monkey of the existing law.

Clauses 125 to 128 are an extension of work on antisocial behaviour. They allow local communities to be involved in the justice system by ensuring that breaches of antisocial behaviour orders can be publicised, so that people can see who is doing what and where it is being done. Proposals for civil compensation orders will be presented in Committee. Such orders will require parents to pay compensation when young children—children under 10, say—have deliberately committed criminal damage and caused harassment and damage to other people. At present nothing can be done in such cases. Our measures will reinforce parental responsibility and the importance of taking the consequences of one's actions.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Home Secretary ensure that the legislation can adapt to new information? That is relevant to the new community justice centre that is being established in my constituency.

Mr. Blunkett: Our proposals are very much concerned with ensuring that the community can not only monitor justice, but participate and be a positive force for justice. I hope that the new community justice centre, which I think will start functioning on Thursday, will prove to be an exemplar, showing that vigilante justice can be replaced by genuine neighbourhood and community justice. I saw that happening at Red Hook, and the Lord Chief Justice, who was enthusiastic about Red Hook when he saw it, agrees entirely with what we are doing. I believe that it will make a real difference to people's lives.

Mr. Allen: The clauses dealing with trespass and extending antisocial behaviour orders are welcome, but does either of them, or any other clause, constitute a peg for action to deal with something that concerns a great many members of all parties—the continuing difficulties caused by some Travellers when they alight in our constituencies? Is there any possibility that that could be dealt with by means of amendment or further Government proposals during the Bill's progress?

Mr. Blunkett: It falls under the auspices of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, but we are considering the unique situation that has arisen. As my hon. Friend knows, existing powers were extended in the antisocial behaviour legislation and the Housing Act 2004; but the purchase of land and the subsequent unauthorised encampment and building on it has been almost unique to the past two or three years, and has changed the perspective. I shall be happy to discuss ways of tackling it with the Deputy Prime Minister.

The miscellaneous measures in the Bill include powers to seize uninsured vehicles. It is a remarkable fact that one vehicle in 20 is uninsured, adding £30 to the premiums of other vehicle users. That is an absolute scandal. Our provision is linked with a Bill that will shortly be presented by the Department for Transport.

Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is being very generous in giving way. I am grateful to him.

I welcome this measure. My right hon. Friend will know of my campaign to bridge the gap between the offences of careless driving and causing death by dangerous driving. Would he consider introducing a new charge, such as causing death by driving, to achieve that, with the possibility of aggravated offences to apply to those driving without insurance or without having ever passed a driving test?

Mr. Blunkett: I want to link the review that we have been undertaking to further substantive consultation early in the new year, alongside the DfT's Bill, with the aim of securing a definition. I was pleased to be able to discuss the matter with my hon. Friend at length. Like a number of other Members on both sides of the House, he has been campaigning for a change in the law, and a revision is clearly necessary. However, as with so much to do with the Home Office, getting it right is not the same as having the right intention.

David Davis: The Home Secretary knows that I have a great deal of sympathy with what was said by the hon. Member for South Dorset (Jim Knight), but may I return him to the impounding of uninsured cars? It worries me that police authorities do not always pursue prosecution for non-insurance when other charges are pending, or when the associated bureaucracy seems onerous. Will the Home Secretary associate himself with a general condemnation of that approach? Police constables should prosecute in such cases, not just through impounding but through the full force of the law.

Mr. Blunkett: I am a great enthusiast for the picking up of all offenders. If it is possible for us to make the process of dealing with them through the prosecution service more sophisticated, and make it as easy as possible for the police to deal with prosecutions together rather than separately, we should try to do so. The right hon. Gentleman has made a very reasonable point.

The miscellaneous provisions also deal with the minimum information to be given to the public about their police authorities, and bring the royal parks into the Metropolitan police family.

All those measures bring together the necessary powers, local changes, the structures that oversee them, the new arrangements for accountability and the linking of the international with the neighbourhood. I believe that they will make a substantial difference in protecting us from organised criminality, engaging people positively with the criminal justice system and bringing confidence to everyone—

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Blunkett: Yes, even in the middle of a peroration.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the Home Secretary for giving way; I sensed his peroration and I wanted to ask him a final question. He has generously suggested that in considering this important Bill in Committee, many important debates should take place and many important matters should be considered in detail. Indeed, amendments might even be made to it; who knows? However, is he satisfied that the time allowed in the programme motion will be remotely sufficient to enable the taking place of the process that he himself has suggested should take place here in the House of Commons?

Mr. Blunkett: As far as I am aware, we reached an agreement on the Bill's programming, and we introduced Second Reading as quickly as was humanly possible. I am offering the opportunity for such debate, and where measures can be improved, we should do so. I make that offer in respect of consideration both in Committee and on Report.

I shall not go back to my peroration, in case someone else decides to intervene. This is a practical Bill with a practical application. It is about making a difference to people's lives, and I am very happy to recommend it to the House.

David Davis (Haltemprice and Howden) (Con): During last week's debate on the Queen's Speech, I told the Home Secretary that the Conservative party supports the establishment of the Serious Organised Crime Agency. I shall attempt to follow him as best I can, although not, the House will be happy to know, in considering every clause in the Bill.

The Opposition have advocated the creation of such an agency for a long time, so I repeat our support for it today, but the Government must not fudge this proposal as they have some other Conservative ones. The establishment of an effective agency is fundamental to Britain's ability to fight organised and serious crime. I am always concerned that a policy that enjoys all-party support might turn out very badly if it does not get rigorous scrutiny.

Mr. Forth: Hear, hear. It is true.

David Davis: I knew that I would get support from my right hon. Friend for that point, at least, which is particularly true where civil liberties are concerned. So although my party supports the establishment of SOCA, we will consider parts 1 and 2 of the Bill very carefully.

The agency takes up only some 50 per cent. of the Bill, and it is perhaps appropriate that a so-called SOCA Bill is a Bill of two halves. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] I knew the House would like that one. But we are pleased to see the inclusion of clauses aimed at stopping harassment by animal rights activists, and we hope to have a sensible discussion on them in Committee, and to add further to such provisions to ensure that communities, companies and individuals have adequate protection against pernicious activists.

But the rest of the Bill is an exercise in tidying-up Labour ideas that have failed to deliver the anticipated results. It also lumps together proposals that we support with some that we do not. It gives more power to community support officers, out-sources antisocial behaviour orders, attempts to stop the breaching of ASBOs, expands police powers, introduces new traffic and insurance offences, provides powers to stop and search for fireworks, introduces an offence of incitement to religious hatred, stops trespassing on a designated site, and—Members seem to be very interested in this one—directs behaviour in the vicinity of Parliament. There is more, but that shows the range of initiatives that the Government are trying to smuggle through in this Bill. The title of the Bill suggests a focus on organised crime and the police, but it does far more than that.

SOCA is much needed, but it is going to have its work cut out, as the Home Secretary himself seemed to recognise. Let us consider drug trafficking, which is one of its prime targets. An estimated 35 million tonnes of heroin and 45 million tonnes of cocaine are smuggled into the United Kingdom each year. The Bill may well attack the racketeers, but—at the risk of giving a Blairite sermon to the Home Secretary—it is an attack on the symptoms of crime, not the causes. The Home Secretary himself said that criminals are better capitalists than real capitalists. He will of course understand that I would not put it that way, but it is certainly true that the international trade in drugs is a fluid and fast-changing marketplace. It is therefore hard to stamp out the supply-chain: when one importation route closes, another opens. As The Economist recently said,

"against Mafia-style cartels, the police might have succeeded . . . they are less likely to prevail against the invisible hand of the market".

Again, that is not the phrase I would have picked, but it makes the point.

So although SOCA will be useful in breaking up the cartels, that by itself is not enough. That is why I raised with the Home Secretary on various occasions my concern at the Government's abject failure in eradicating Afghan opium crops. To stop the drugs trade, one has to disrupt supply as well as demand; however, that job will be made much harder as a result of our porous borders. Many of our points of entry currently lack the rigorous security measures that would make organised crime much harder to carry out. This issue has been raised with the Home Office, in the context of SOCA, by various senior police officers, so I hope that we will see more work on that front later this year.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Following decades of abject failure in Colombia—all the efforts there have not reduced the production of drugs; in fact, they have reduced that country to bloody chaos and permanent war—are we not doing the same thing in Afghanistan, where drug production has increased? Even if we were successful in decreasing production, it would then spread to Pakistan, Myanmar and Kazakhstan, just as production in Colombia has spread to Peru and Bolivia. Is not trying to solve the problems on the streets of Birmingham and Chicago by disrupting the economies of third-world countries futile, and is there not a grave danger that we are embarking on the "Colombia-isation" of much of central Asia?

David Davis: The hon. Gentleman has an honourable but very different view of drugs management from mine. He is a liberaliser, and he knows that I disagree with him, although I respect his view. I did not intend to dwell on this point, but the simple fact is that the British Government accepted responsibility for eradication of the drugs trade in Afghanistan, and having done so they should pursue that responsibility. However, I am told by American drug officers, among others, that last year, Afghan heroin flooded the British market and that this year, because of our lack of action, it is flooding the world market. That disastrous outcome is the result of the Government's taking responsibility but not carrying it through. If the hon. Gentleman believes in his argument, he should have made it to his own Government at the beginning of this process, so that somebody else could have taken responsibility for dealing with the problem.

People trafficking was described yesterday by Sir Stephen Lander as a bigger problem even than drug smuggling. In truth, that has been apparent for at least five years. He admits that the UK is at or near the top of the list of targets for people smugglers, as it is for drug smugglers. We all know of the vicious criminal networks that people traffickers feed, using illegal immigrants in the drugs trade, the sex trade and many other illegal activities. The Home Secretary doubtless does not disagree with that, although he admits to not knowing how many people are in the country illegally. Any number of initiatives, new organisations and schemes can be concocted, but the most effective measures would surely be 24-hour, fully manned surveillance and embarkation controls.

We are now told that SOCA will not be the British FBI that some feared, but as I pointed out to the Home Secretary during his speech, we are concerned about the rights and powers of those who will work for it. Civilians who work for it will be given police, Customs and immigration powers. Traditionally, Parliament has given police, Customs and immigration officers specific, often very intrusive, powers that are needed for their particular tasks. Now, they will all be under the direction of one man—the director-general—and in theory, under his control any agent can exercise any one of a wide range of powers.

I was going to ask the Home Secretary what guidance will be given in that regard, but he elaborated on the issue somewhat in his speech and discussed the restrictions with respect to accreditation. However, I hope that, in winding up, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), will explain whether civilian agents will have the same training as a police, Customs and immigration officer combined. That would be a pretty onerous load, but such training is implicit in what the Home Secretary said.

The Bill's provisions make the agency accountable to the Home Secretary, and in that regard my initial reading of the Bill was a little different from the Home Secretary's description in his speech. SOCA will be required to submit an annual report and will be inspected by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. But given the agency's range of powers and its importance, would it not be wise to have specific arrangements for parliamentary scrutiny—I am thinking beyond just scrutiny by the Home Affairs Committee, because in the first few years of SOCA's existence such a requirement will be fairly onerous—and to get Parliament to debate SOCA's work annually, at least for the first few years, so that we can see how this very important agency beds down?

We are still concerned about whether the agency will lead to a skills loss in the national police force. We share the Police Federation's concerns that SOCA might be considered an elite unit that creams off all the best policemen. There are a large number of extremely dedicated and talented people in conventional policing, and portraying them as second class would damage police morale. We will look in detail at the way in which SOCA co-ordinates its work with the police—the Home Secretary has recognised the importance of that. In particular, we will look at the impact of the new agency on the autonomy of chief constables, which is vital to the independence of our police forces.

The Home Secretary has previously pointed out in the House that organised crime plays an important role in feeding terrorism. I accept that the new agency does not have a specific role in relation to terrorism, but I should be grateful if, in her winding-up speech, the Under-Secretary provided more detail on its role. How, for example, will it work with the counter-terrorism agencies, which cover an enormous amount of the same ground? In connection with that, when the Home Secretary published the White Paper on SOCA earlier this year, there was much talk of changes to the intercept rules, which would make it possible to lift the ban on phone intercepts in court. That is as useful against organised crime as it is against terrorism. The House of Commons library notes that "a proposal to allow the use of intercept material is still under consideration. Ministers are expected to announce their conclusions on the findings of a Home Office review before the end of the year, which could make it possible to add new clauses".

I told the Home Secretary that we would support the use of intercepts as long as there was proper scrutiny of the measure to ensure that steps are taken to protect innocent people from being convicted on intelligence that turns out to be wrong. However, I warn him that we will not tolerate the insertion of clauses that pose a fundamental challenge to civil liberties at the last minute and without scrutiny. That is an extremely important point.

The Bill proposes an overhaul of police powers. It moves away from consent-based policing towards policing by discretion. Amendments to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 extend powers to search premises to seize evidence. Section 8 of PACE is changed to introduce a new all-premises search warrant in addition to the existing search warrant for specific premises, thus allowing constables to search all premises "occupied or controlled" by the person named on the warrant. That it is worth while, as it will clearly help to solve problems faced by the police when dealing with criminals with multiple premises, but are the Government not concerned that the measures put a great deal of discretionary power in the hands of the police? The Bill outlines plans for civilian staff to be designated as staff custody officers for the purposes of PACE. Subject to the obvious practical concerns about training and supervision, some of which the Home Secretary dealt with in his speech, I support the proposal. We need more police on the streets and less paperwork, and I believe that it will help to achieve that.

Moving on to measures to deal with illegal animal rights activism, the clauses themselves are not contested at all by the Conservative party. We welcome the fact that something is finally being done, even though it is a little late and is not enough. The Bill should include provisions to protect companies against a targeted campaign and to protect shareholders or names from publicity when a company is being targeted. We can make constructive proposals to tackle such problems. The legislation must be effective, and fighting against such offences requires determination, skill, and a proper range of powers. We believe that the provisions should be expanded, and we will table amendments to that effect.

There are some parts of the Bill with which do not entirely agree or with which we disagree. We are concerned about the increased powers for community support officers—a group of people whose effectiveness has yet to be assessed. In his contribution to our debate on the Queen's Speech, the Home Secretary admitted that assessments of CSOs are still under way, both within and outside the Home Office. It may be premature to provide CSOs with more powers, as that may put them into situations for which they are not prepared. The chairman of the Police Federation said:

> "The role of CSOs must be fully clarified before a national roll-out, and there must be national standards for their training, which is commensurate with their responsibilities".

I agree.

We respect and support the concept of visible policing, but with more power comes more responsibility along with more duty which, under this Government, means more paperwork, thus cutting the cost-effectiveness of CSOs—their primary attraction, it appears, to the Government so far. That "powers creep" is taking place at a time when forces such as Hampshire have turned down the extra CSOs ring-fenced for them. The chairman of Hampshire Police Authority said that > "we want properly-trained warrant holding police officers . . . we do not feel that these individuals are value for money".

Hampshire wanted the 13 police officers that that money would have provided. In Question Time last week—and I do not know whether the Home Secretary chastised him afterwards—the Prime Minister made an unusually interesting comment, when he said of policemen that > "we shall continue supplanting them with community support officers."—[Official Report, 1 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 628.]

That may have been a slip of the tongue, but it was certainly revealing. The public do not want policing on the cheap, which is precisely what the Bill is trying to encourage. They want fully trained police officers whom they can trust to cut crime.

Mr. Blunkett: The right hon. Gentleman quoted the Prime Minister correctly, but at the time we all took it—he clarified it for me afterwards—that he meant "supplementing". [Interruption.] Well, he did.

David Davis: I accept the Home Secretary's correction. He obviously chastised the Prime Minister, but he will forgive me for using the word that appears in Hansard, not the word that he was given later.

Mr. Peter Lilley (Hitchin and Harpenden) (Con): Was it not a Freudian slip, because as I recall, it was the policy of the Conservative Government to employ civilians to release police to go out on the beat? However, it appears to be the policy of the Labour Government to employ quasi-civilians to release police so that they can spend their time in offices doing paperwork.

David Davis: My right hon. Friend is partly right. One of our concerns about CSOs is that they should not be there to supplant but to supplement or complement police officers.

Mr. Bercow: Harking back momentarily to clauses 116 to 118, on the protection of individuals engaged in animal research, of course, the Government are absolutely right to act, and two of my constituents who work at Huntingdon Life Sciences will be delighted that the Home Secretary has done so. However, does my right hon. Friend not accept that his brief exchange about language underlines the important point that sometimes Governments should be concerned not simply to legislate, regulate and act but to speak out alongside legislation in support of valuable work? Animal research is not an evil to be tolerated—it is something of profound benefit to the country. The more speeches from the Home Secretary and his right hon. and hon. Friends in support of that proposition, the better.

David Davis: My hon. Friend is quite right, and puts it better than I could. As I have said, the Government need to show determination and resolution in public as often as possible. Indeed, this is probably the only occasion on which I shall encourage the Home Secretary to make more speeches rather than fewer.

Chris Bryant: Before the right hon. Gentleman leaves the issue of CSOs, could I entice him to south Wales, so that he could talk to police officers who, two years ago, were profoundly cynical and sceptical about the introduction of CSOs in areas such as the Rhondda, where there is a low level of crime but quite a high level of antisocial behaviour? Those officers are now universally in favour of CSOs.

David Davis: I am tempted to tell the hon. Gentleman that I will do so only if he comes with me to Hampshire, but I might be misunderstood. However, I told the Home Secretary that we need a full review, which will consider the sort of evidence that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. I do not object to CSOs, as long as they are additional to the police—that is the point that I was making about the word "supplanting". [Interruption.] Well, they are not. In Hampshire, for example, there is a ring-fenced funding for CSOs, and the force will not get police officers instead. We must look at the way in which CSOs work and identify their strengths and weaknesses before delivering change. In the run-up to an election, the Government appear to be in a devil of a hurry to make a series of changes that do not appear to be based on fact but on their wish to be seen as tough on crime, whatever the evidence of the past seven years.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

David Davis: I am afraid not, as I want to turn to the most contentious part of the Bill. The measure is about 220 pages long, but I have serious difficulty with two pages—the rest, one way or another, we can broadly support. As the Home Secretary knows, the part on which we fundamentally disagree is the provisions dealing with incitement to religious hatred. I understand and have considerable sympathy with the Government's aims in trying to prevent religious hatred. I associate myself at the Dispatch Box with my predecessor's comments, which were quoted by the Home Secretary, about his noble aims.

There is no dispute over the aims, but I sometimes wonder whether the Government understand the implications of their proposals. A simple change to previous legislation it may be, making it an offence to stir up religious hatred, but its impact will be profound, wide-reaching and not necessarily that intended. Indeed, the effect may be the opposite of that intended, as I shall explain.

For centuries the United Kingdom has had a tradition of religious tolerance, and at the same time a tradition of extremely robust religious disputation. That has produced a healthy society in which religious freedom and free speech have coexisted to the advantage of all. These joint freedoms have contributed in no small measure to the intellectual vigour of our society over those same centuries. They spawned the creativity that fostered a wealth of talent in many areas, from science to satire. Freedom of speech is one of the great virtues and simultaneously one of the great strengths of our society. The danger is that the Bill will curb that freedom of speech without any benefit being realised from the legislation.

The Bill curbs freedom of speech where free speech is entirely appropriate. Unlike race, religion is a matter of choice—choice of beliefs, values, practices and behaviour. It is quite proper that such things should be debated and contested, and the proposed curb is almost entirely unnecessary. Words intended to provoke violence or cause alarm, distress or harassment are all caught by existing laws. The Bill would sacrifice freedom of speech for little or no gain. The drafting is so ill defined that it is not even clear what is meant by religion. The provision is drafted so widely that any sect or cult could be covered by it.

Religion and race should not be put in the same category. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), the shadow Attorney-General, commented to the Home Secretary earlier, what if an individual made remarks about a sect, cult or religion such as satanism, attacking it for cruelty or deviance? Will such groups have a case against the individual? They would, so far as I can tell, under the Bill. The two examples cited in today's written ministerial statement would be covered by existing laws if they led to violence or harassment, so why do we need to introduce new provisions?

I am sure the Home Secretary is aware that similar—not identical—legislation was introduced in Victoria, Australia. At present two Christian pastors are on trial for holding a seminar on Islam. The seminar was designed to educate Christians about the concept of jihad. Three Muslims came to the seminar and afterwards filed a complaint against the pastors, saying that the seminar vilified Muslims. People who initially supported the law in Australia have now realised its disastrous consequences. The Government may say that the Bill states that cases will have to be approved by the Attorney-General, but does the Home Secretary not understand that in the highly politicised environment in which the decision to prosecute will have been made, the impartiality of the Attorney-General will be undermined?

There are many incalculable ramifications of the Bill. It might encourage hostile legal action between religions or even within a religion, between different sects. It might deter publication of controversial texts. It might even cause resentment against those whom it sets out to help. Worst of all, it starts from the wrong premise.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

David Davis: Not at this point.

The Bill starts from the wrong premise. Britain learned long ago the paradox that more freedom of speech leads to more vigorous debate, which leads to more tolerance. Evil ideas should be met with challenge. The best remedy for evil ideas is more speech, not less speech. We will support the Bill on Second Reading, but we do so on the understanding that we will seek to remove the relevant provisions from the Bill. We, too, oppose religious hatred, but we will do so by using our traditional freedoms, not by suppressing them.

2.4 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I was hoping to welcome the Bill, believing it to be a serious organised crime Bill, and I do welcome it, in large part. It is perhaps a reflection of the rather excessive personality of the Home Secretary that he could not leave it as a serious organised crime Bill. Introducing a seasonal note, if the Bill were a Christmas tree, it would be so overloaded with baubles that it would have fallen over long ago. At my count, it contains at least 22 measures in addition to the establishment of the Serious Organised Crime Agency.

We are given to understand that serious organised crime encompasses search on suspicion of harbouring a firework, the power of arrest for dropping a sweet paper, and dear Mr. Brian Haw in Parliament square. Those do not fall within my definition of serious organised crime, but I understand that we are nearing the end of a

[Mr. David Heath]

Parliament and the Home Secretary wishes to clear his filing cabinets of all the measures that he has not managed to introduce in any of the previous Bills that he has put before the House, so we must do what we can to subject them to proper scrutiny.

We have 155 clauses before us. On most of them, we broadly agree with the direction in which the Home Secretary is taking us. Some of them cover serious matters—disclosure in court procedure, for instance, is not a matter to be lightly dismissed and will need our scrutiny. Harassment in relation to animal experimentation is a matter of huge importance and I welcome the fact that the Government are taking it forward. We have already had a substantive debate on incitement to religious hatred, and I shall return to that.

My favourite clause, from my quick reading of the Bill in its initial stages, has not yet been mentioned, as it is not considered to be the most important clause. It is a quintessential piece of Home Office drafting. Clause 107, which deals with the photographing of suspects, states that a person may be photographed elsewhere than at a police station

"(a) with the appropriate consent; or

(b) if the appropriate consent is withheld or it is not practicable to obtain it, without it."

That seems to cover most circumstances, and I applaud the drafting for its comprehensiveness.

I shall deal first with the single agency. I do not often urge the Home Secretary to go further than he has done in any of the measures that he introduces, but in this case his proposals are modest. I support them because in the modern age of organised, international and national crime we need an agency capable of dealing with it. Our traditionally structured police forces cannot adequately meet those demands. That is why integrating the work of various agencies in a comprehensive way is the right way forward.

Other categories of crime that go well beyond police authority boundaries encompass different specialties and could probably, and could possibly in future, be incorporated into the working of the agency. I would support that, not because I want to establish a national police force under the Home Secretary's control, but because I want to free chief constables and local constabularies to deal with that which should be their first priority. At present, they have a large number of national and international distractions. Those are important and must be dealt with but, at the risk of sounding like the TV programme, "The League of Gentlemen", we sometimes forget that local police are there to deal with local crime for local people. That must be a key priority of local policing. The resources of chief constables are often under enormous pressure to deal with matters that go well beyond that definition. Therefore, I hope that the agency will prove to be a wider resource that enables our chief constables and police forces to crack down hard on crime in local neighbourhoods more effectively.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and I do not want this intervention to be regarded as evidence of an insatiable ambition to sit on the Standing Committee, as I entertain no such ambition. However, he said that the Bill covered almost everything but the kitchen sink. Will he enlighten me as to why we need clauses 129 to 131, which deal with vehicle registration and road traffic offences? The Vehicles (Crime) Act 2001, which passed through this House under the auspices of the Home Secretary's predecessor, the present Foreign Secretary, dealt with those matters, and I do not understand why they should need to be addressed in this Bill. I presume that they do need to be so addressed, but I should like to be enlightened.

Mr. Heath: I have no difficulty with those particular clauses, but one always wonders why the Home Office did not think of a particular provision in the last Bill that it presented to the House. Every Session, half a dozen Bills come from the Home Office. Another one is always due, and there is always plentiful opportunity for provisions to be attached to whichever legislative vehicle happens to be passing. That is the case here.

I want to return to SOCA. I pay tribute to its predecessor organisations in policing terms, the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad. I was involved with NCIS at an early stage in its genesis, as I sat on the standing committee—the predecessor of the service committee—that was set up by the previous Home Secretary to oversee the organisation. I believe that NCIS has done a tremendous job in providing and underpinning intelligence used by the police on a national basis. I hope that the lessons learned in the development of the two predecessor agencies will be incorporated in the ethos and context of the new agency.

However, some concerns remain. A principal concern affected the development of the regional crime squads and the National Crime Squad, and it has to do with the interface between national bodies and local constabularies. The feeling is that important areas of crime—and category 2 crimes are an obvious example—may slip between the two jurisdictions. In the early days of the NCS, there was a strong feeling of discontinuity in that respect, and it is possible that there may be a new discontinuity in terms of intelligence sharing. We have corrected one difficulty by creating the new agency, but we may also be developing another problem. It is very important that that turns out not to be the case.

Questions remain about the status of officers. The Home Secretary knows the views of the Police Federation on this matter, which has rightly stressed the important concept of the officer-constable. We discard that at our peril, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman listens very carefully to what the federation has to say. The problem has practical consequences if officers are dissuaded from joining the new agency simply because they do not like the status or conditions attached. That is a matter of serious concern.

There are proper concerns about the Bill's application in Scotland, which was touched on in an intervention. I do not think that we have got to the bottom of this matter, but I am grateful to the Home Secretary for the conciliatory nature of his response. It is clear that work is still in progress, but we do have to question what happens when an officer belonging to the new agency operates in Scotland. The Scottish judicial system and police arrangements are totally different from ours, and it is possible that difficulties will arise as a result.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): My hon. Friend visits a point that I consider to be of supreme importance in the context of this Bill. I have raised this matter in the House already. I am not sure that it needs to be dealt with in the Bill, but does my hon. Friend agree that training lies at the heart of the problem? To put it simply, does he agree that people must not take on the powers of a constable in Scotland unless they have been properly trained in Scots law and procedure?

Mr. Heath: That is absolutely right. For instance, familiarity with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which applies to England and Wales, would not be sufficient to allow an officer to operate in Scotland. Specific training needs to be given, and I hope that we will be able to explore that in Standing Committee.

My final point in respect of SOCA has to do with accountability. We have already touched on that to a certain extent, but I was glad to hear that the agency will fall within the remit of the Home Affairs Committee. That important fact was not clear before today, but why has the Home Secretary taken the view that the new agency should have no service authority? Both NCIS and the NCS had one. In effect the right hon. Gentleman has taken on direct responsibility for the new body. Presumably, strong arguments were made in respect of why service authorities were required for the predecessor bodies, and I expect that similarly strong arguments have been made to explain why no such authority is needed now.

Mr. Blunkett: I should like to take this opportunity to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman. We have put a majority of non-executives on the new strategic board because we believe that it will be more streamlined and effective as a result—including, of course, when it comes to holding the director general to account.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the Home Secretary, and that is another matter for exploration later.

I do not take issue with the Government on the new proposals for disclosure. The Bill's extension of existing powers will clearly be of value, but I am worried about how they will be safeguarded to ensure safe trial. I shall return to that question later.

As I understand it, the Bill puts on a statutory footing the current situation in respect of plea bargaining. I have no problem with that, although some reservations are inevitable when it comes to total immunity from prosecution, which is a major concession to make to a person. Will the fact that total immunity has been granted to a witness be made known to the jury that hears his or her evidence? It is possible that the granting of total immunity could affect the validity or credibility of the evidence that is provided.

The Bill's provisions with regard to the national witness protection scheme are sensible and necessary, and I look forward to supporting them.

Vera Baird: The national witness protection scheme appears excellent, but it defines a witness as a "witness in proceedings". Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that could exclude people compelled to give evidence under the terms of the disclosure notice? In serious fraud cases, there is probably no need to protect people in that position, but in other cases such witnesses are likely to come under threat from the Mr. Big involved as soon as the notice is served. Should not those witnesses be subsumed in the witness protection measures too?

Mr. Heath: The hon. and learned Lady is absolutely right, both in what she says and in her concern about what is not made explicit in the Bill. That is something that we can explore at greater length in Standing Committee. Also, I want to make certain that the same level of protection is provided for witnesses in failed prosecutions as in successful ones. That is essential to making sure that people are ready to come forward with appropriate information.

I think that the Government have got themselves into a bit of a pickle in connection with the general power of arrest. I do not understand why they have adopted the approach evident in the Bill. In this country, the problem is that there is no clear differentiation between misdemeanours and felonies, as there is in other jurisdictions. The police and criminal evidence review examined this matter in 2002, and it acknowledged that there was a difficulty of definition. We understand that, but the review explicitly rejected the removal of distinctions that the Government are now proposing. Why have the Government rejected the review's proposal? The review was explicit on that point:

> "The Review recommends creating a definitive list of powers to arrest, complemented by information on how they can and should be applied. This should link to more enhanced training."

I agree, and I would even accept the obverse of that suggestion—a comprehensive list of offences to which no power of arrest applied, which would be a different way to approach the same issue. Providing no distinction allows an officer to arrest for trivial reasons, which would take us dangerously close to the sus approach—and I thought that we had moved away from that. It worries me, and we need to consider it with much more care.

The benefit that the Home Secretary adduced for the change—that it removes the necessity for discretion—is not true. The police officer has to exercise discretion as to whether the offence that he thought he was arresting someone for fell within the definition. He will now have to exercise a different discretion, as outlined in the Bill. All it will do is substitute one discretion for another without improving clarity. That proposal needs more work.

We have been clear in our support for community support officers, not in supplanting but in supplementing the police service. We have also been clear that we do not want to see a steady accretion of power to community support officers so that they become indistinguishable in power, but not in training, from properly trained police officers. I fear that we are moving towards that situation. It makes sense for CSOs to have some of the traffic powers they will be given, but the powers of arrest could create difficulties. They could also put CSOs at risk unnecessarily and we should draw back from granting them those powers.

[Mr. Heath]

I strongly support the harassment clauses. The House must stand up and be counted by saying clearly that those who engage in animal research do so with our blessing, for the betterment of mankind. They deserve to be protected from people who take a contrary view. Those people are entitled to take a contrary view, but they are not entitled to harass or threaten physical violence. We have already made huge changes in our approach to animal experimentation. When I was at university, I was issued with a vivisection licence as an undergraduate on matriculation. That does not happen now and I am glad, because there was no justification for me to undertake animal experiments as a first-year undergraduate. Things have changed and we should recognise that. We should be aware of the need to take a sensitive view of animal experimentation, but violence against individuals on that basis cannot be condoned.

The most difficult issue addressed by the Bill is incitement to religious hatred. No one in the House wishes to allow or promote incitement to religious hatred and I do not doubt the intentions of the Home Secretary in introducing this legislation. It is unacceptable for people to promote hatred against any group of people defined on the basis of their religion, which is often a cipher for racial hatred. Let us be clear about that. However, that does not stop me having serious doubts about the form in which the Government have chosen to bring forward this legislation.

I accept the difficulties involved, but the dialogue has not been sufficiently conclusive to allay the genuine concerns of a strange alliance between evangelicals and comedians. That alliance suggests that the Government have not got it right. We must be explicit about regarding incitement to religious hatred as unacceptable, but it is equally unacceptable for our law to prevent the expression of any religious belief or none. We should also accept the sensible expression of satiric intent or humour. We must strike that balance. There are genuine concerns about the present proposals and we will need to explore them in Committee and on Report. Unless we get them right, they will not be acceptable to the House or to the other place. It is incumbent on us to get them right, if we possibly can.

The Home Secretary is eager to help some faith groups through this measure, but there are more important issues, such as ensuring no discrimination in the provision of goods or services. In practical terms, that is more important than the measure before us today. Let us have a sensible debate, without ascribing motives that do not exist.

It is hard to compress one's remarks on the Bill because it covers so many issues. However, I cannot finish without mentioning the specific proposals for Parliament square. Members on both sides of the House will have varying views about the almost permanent demonstration in Parliament square, but I reject the introduction of new criminal legislation to deal with what is essentially an ad hominem problem that can be dealt with by civil sanction. If there is a nuisance, let us use an injunction to deal with it, but we should not introduce a new criminal offence that is indiscriminate and will—I predict—be used in inappropriate circumstances in the future.

Mr. Carmichael: Hard cases make bad law.

Mr. Heath: My hon. Friend is a lawyer and he has to say that, but I entirely agree with him.

This is a very large Bill that addresses serious issues, many of which it will be necessary to debate in detail, but I have serious concerns about the timetable for debate. If we do not do justice to the Bill in Committee and do not have the opportunity to deal with matters on Report, justice will be done in the other place. Therefore, it is in Ministers' interest to arrange matters so that we have a sensible amount of time to debate matters in this House; otherwise, great difficulties in timetabling may arise in the future.

By my estimate, we have had nearly 50 Home Office law and order Bills from this Government. More than 700 new offences have been put on the statute book. Sometimes the new offences repeal offences that have not even been implemented. I doubt whether incessant activity is a substitute for effectiveness. My argument has always been that talking tough is cheap, in every sense of the word, and it is far more difficult to be effective. Elements in the Bill will increase the effectiveness of our policing and security services and those are the elements that I shall support. However, I shall seek to reject those that are simply Christmas decorations—the baubles.

2.29 pm

Mr. Robert Marshall-Andrews (Medway) (Lab): It is a great, profound and rare joy to be able to congratulate the Government on what is for the most part a measured, effective and necessary piece of legislation. However, no pleasure is unalloyed, so having got over that, it is possible to be curmudgeonly about one or two general and specific parts of the Bill—so I will indeed curmudgeon about them.

It is not surprising that the Bill has almost unanimous general support, as one can see by looking round the Chamber. I have been instructed by the Whip to speak as slowly as possible—an instruction that I shall uncharacteristically ignore.

The first matter of general importance that I want to raise is the way in which the Bill began its introduction to the House. As a criminal lawyer—by that, of course, I mean a lawyer who has dealt with crime for most of my professional life—I have a small plea: let us stop talking up professional crime and professional criminals. Let us, as a matter of practice, stop telling each other, and the people, how good those criminals are, and how effective, big and dangerous they are. It is an unhappy fact that many law enforcement agencies, and, indeed, many politicians, have a vested interest in so doing. The more powerful one's enemy, the greater the plaudits when one succeeds and the greater the mitigation when one fails.

It has been my happy, or unhappy, task many times in my life to prosecute or defend those who are engaged in major professional national and international crime, and it is a plain fact that they, like all criminals, are cut and bleed just like everybody else; they all whinge and whine in precisely the same way when they are caught, and beside the power of the state they are pygmies, in precisely the same way as all criminals are pygmies. Adulating serious crime—glorifying it—is a matter for the media, not for us, and we serve no purpose by doing so. We must treat it as a criminal enterprise; it is something to be dealt with, and we can indeed deal with it. The Bill, as it is right immediately to say, makes a considerable contribution to doing that.

I shall expend a little time on the other two controversial elements of the Bill. The first is the incitement to religious hatred. I have to say that the law will have difficulty with that. The job of the law is to interpret legislation, and the better the legislation, the easier it is to interpret. But juries and magistrates will have a problem with that element. The Attorney-General will have a problem in deciding what is and what is not to be prosecuted.

At root, the matter is philosophical; there is a profound difference between hatred based on race, sex or age—all of which are thrust upon us; we have no choice—and on religion, which is not thrust upon us. Religion is a matter of choice; it is a matter of what we do. It is intolerable, and should be criminal, to incite hatred of a man or woman because of what they are, but I have grave doubts whether it should be criminal, as opposed to merely socially unacceptable, to incite hatred of someone because of what they do. Religion is what we do, not what we are. We shall have grave difficulties with those proposals.

I join with ease in the plaudits to the Home Secretary for his motives, but motives must be thought about carefully. They pave not only the route to hell but the route to extreme difficulties in enforcing the law in society.

Mr. Brazier: The hon. and learned Gentleman is making some strong points, based on his years of legal experience. As it is already a criminal offence to incite violence, what possible interpretation, even in principle, could a court put on the Bill as adding to the existing law? What else could it possibly mean, except people objecting to other people's beliefs? What innocent interpretation could a court put on the measure, given that there is an existing law against incitement to violence?

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: The truth, which goes to the core of the argument, is that there is no interpretation. The fact is that the Attorney-General will interpret the Act in a way that is not written in statute, and bring prosecutions only when incitement is not only to hatred but also likely to cause serious violence. That is not in the Bill, but that is how it will be interpreted and it is not a happy state of affairs. I take the hon. Gentleman's point, which is well founded.

Dr. Evan Harris (Oxford, West and Abingdon) (LD): In the light of the concerns that the hon. and learned Gentleman has expressed about the difference between religion and race, what does he make of the Government's decision, following a review, not to repeal the blasphemy laws, which, had they done so, would have made it clear to people that the Bill, which they are, rightly or wrongly, introducing, was not about the protection of ideology and ideas? Is not that a missed opportunity, and would he support a measure to repeal the blasphemy laws in the context of the Bill?

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: To the first of the hon. Gentleman's questions, my answer is: incomprehensible; and to the second: yes.

I turn to the third matter that I want briefly to deal with: the missed opportunity in the Bill in relation to plea bargaining. What is contained in the Bill is not plea bargaining; it enshrines what is already practice in the courts to provide either immunity or a diminution in sentence for those who turn Queen's evidence. That is not plea bargaining, which has a specific, largely American, cognisance and is an absolute direct bargain between plea and sentence. That is anathema to our law, because in the past it has been felt that defendants have said that they were, at least, misled, sometimes grievously, by their lawyers, or by their lawyers in conjunction with prosecution lawyers or even with the judge, and that they entered pleas on a basis that they did not understand. The purpose of our law, which is anathema to plea bargaining, is to protect the defendant.

The same is not the case in offences of serious fraud. I have spoken to the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), about this matter, and hoped that we could take this opportunity to put into statute a provision to allow for plea bargaining in offences of serious fraud. This may seem a tributary, but it is not, because we spend a great deal of courts' and jurors' time on it—far more than on anything else. Our arguments about inconvenience to jurors would largely be negated if we were to allow a simple amendment.

Serious fraudsters do not require protection from their own lawyers; the reverse is more often the case. In those circumstances, there is no reason why for such offences, carefully regulated and tabulated direct plea bargaining—a sentence known in advance in respect of a plea—could not properly be introduced in the Bill. Will the Minister give that matter her consideration? If necessary, rather than being sentenced to the honour of serving on the Committee, I should be delighted to discuss that perfectly reasonable, small but effective provision, which could be added to an otherwise admirable Bill.

2.39 pm

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): When the apostle Peter instituted the Christian Church, he said in his great sermon:

> "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved."

He declared a principle of Christianity: that salvation and everlasting life is vested solely and only in the Saviour. It has been rightly said in the House today that every religion must have a dogmatic objective; religions must say something confidently that they believe, and that, of course, rules out other beliefs.

I am not accusing the Home Secretary of having something sinister in what he is doing. We all know him, and the time that I spent with him in his office was quite pleasant, as well as straight. I am not lining him up and saying that I believe that there is an ulterior motive. However, we must say that in the argument that we have heard in the House from him today, he seems to suggest that he can lean on the link between racism and hatred of people because of their race, and religious belief. That does not hold water in argument because, as the hon. and learned Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) has said already, religion is a matter of choice. If a person happens to be a Jew and becomes converted, he does not change his race, and still he is a Christian—but if a Christian becomes a Muslim, for instance, he ceases to be a Christian, because that is a matter of religion. That is a different issue from hatred because of race. What we have then is the interpretation, and I referred to that in my questions.

People should read the Book of Common Prayer that lies on the Table, and with which the House opens in prayer every day. A man said to me the other day, "Parts of the Bible should be cut out because I don't like them." I said, "Yes, we may come to a day when we'll be back to pre-Reformation times, when people were burned because they believed in the whole Bible." So we are on very dangerous territory when we ask the Attorney-General to do more than all the cardinals of Rome can do, and interpret something in that way. His interpretation may lead to a prosecution, and the poor jurors will be called on to ground of which they may have no knowledge, and they will have to make their decision. I say to the House today that that needs to be very carefully considered indeed.

Across the board, people may disagree vehemently with my religious beliefs, and people may disagree vehemently about my defence of what I believe is the very heart of the nation—the Christian family—yet those people will have the same problem with this matter. This is not a sectarian objection; this is something that takes in all religion and all peoples, and there is very serious worry. It is no use saying that people who say things in the pulpit will be exempt. According to the Bill, they will not be exempt. Even a preacher in his Sunday morning service—if he has a Sunday morning sermon; some preachers do not have that today—would be open to prosecution if he said something that would cause offence to a person in his congregation.

Now that the Bill has come to the House, it is time to apply our minds to the fact that we cannot link such issues merely with hatred because of race. There have been cases, even here in this country, where people have been brought to court because of the placards that they held. One man held up a placard denouncing homosexuality, and he was brought to court, found guilty and fined very heavily. In all fairness I must add that Peter Tatchell, who would take an opposite view, said that it was ridiculous and shameful that a man of that character was taken to court, tried and found guilty. Such matters could be accelerated if we do not remedy this matter.

I shall not detain the House because I have other duties elsewhere today, as hon. Members know, but I came to speak because I felt that, on behalf of the Democratic Unionist party in this House, I must put up our marker on this matter.

Brian White (Milton Keynes, North-East) (Lab): I do not normally speak on home affairs. Having grown up in Belfast, I shall avoid the subject that the person whose Church I went to as a child has just touched on. I want to concentrate on a number of other issues, including the Serious Organised Crime Agency.

When SOCA is set up, the way in which its powers—whether customs powers, constabulary powers or immigration powers—are allocated is crucial, and a bureaucratic pre-allocation route will not be flexible enough to tackle some of the serious issues that the agency will face. One of the key things is that the agency's officers should have the ability to select powers appropriate to their task and to be accountable for those powers, rather than having a pre-allocation of powers, as is envisaged in the Bill. I hope that Minister will look again at that issue, because getting it right is crucial.

Getting the culture of the organisation right at the beginning is very important. We have learned the lessons of the Regulation of Investigatory Powers Act 2000, under which we did not get such things right at the beginning. The relationships between SOCA and local constabularies and international forces are important, and we must get them right at the outset.

For generations, the Home Office's immediate reaction to any problem has been to introduce legislation. Despite the universal welcome for the Bill, which contains a lot of good things, I fear that there is still a tendency in the Home Office to think that legislation is the only thing that matters. It is much more important to consider enforcement and the international co-operation that is required, both of which will determine whether SOCA is a success far more than the legislation itself.

A number of technological changes are taking place that will have a direct impact on SOCA. Again, we must consider those aspects, which are not touched on in the Bill. Education also has a role to play. We often forget when passing Home Office legislation how to educate people about the aspects that we need to tackle, and how we can prevent serious organised crime.

The Minister will be aware of the relevance of the proceeds of crime. I have tackled that issue with her in the past. If an agency seizes assets under the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 and central Government are the prosecuting authority, the Department involved is reimbursed for the cost of the prosecution. Counterfeiting and piracy are major problems in this country—they represent a lot of organised crime activity—and local government trading standards officers are often involved in those prosecutions.

One prosecution for piracy and counterfeiting in Waltham Forest cost £90,000. The court confiscated the assets of the people who were found guilty, but there was no money to pay for the local authority's prosecution costs. I urge Ministers to take on board an amendment that has been discussed with the Department of Trade and Industry to allow agencies outside the Government to have their prosecution costs reimbursed. As we are amending the Proceeds of Crime Act, there is an opportunity for the Government to deal with that issue.

If SOCA is to work, its relationship with the private sector—particularly with banks, internet service providers and other companies—is critical. Again, the Bill is too traditional in its approach and does not use the private sector to tackle serious organised crime. I would advocate that the directors of security of our banks and internet service providers be made special constables, so that they have the powers to collect the evidence to present to the prosecution authorities. Ministers have heard that argument, but we should consider innovative ways to tackle some serious organised crime. I hope that when it is up and running, the agency tackles those issues, rather than simply continuing down the traditional route.

It is vital that we have the resources and capacity to deal with international co-operation. One country recently gave a list of 500 paedophiles to us, but it overwhelmed the agencies that were supposed to deal with it because they did not have the capacity to cope. Having the right skills and the capacity to deal with such problems is important. I urge the Minister to consider not only how powers are allocated to SOCA, but the resources and training that will make it a success. If we do not have the skills or the resources both inside and outside the agency—that relates to linkages with other constabularies—we put it at a disadvantage.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that because of issues relating to the status of the new agency, many people in the National Crime Squad have said that they will not be happy to transfer to it, thereby denying it a source of expertise and skills? Does that cause him concern?

Brian White: If that were the case, I would be concerned. I appreciate that a number of issues need to be resolved, and those are being discussed. My understanding is that those people will happily transfer to SOCA, because it is the right way forward. We would expect uncertainties in any reorganisation. One of the important things about reorganisation is to get the culture right at the beginning. The director will have to get that right when SOCA is set up. If the hon. Gentleman's fears were well founded, I would be worried, but discussions are ongoing, as I hope the Minister will confirm when she responds.

We need to ensure that people in other forces understand what the agency is doing. There is still confusion in some police forces about what they can and cannot do under RIPA. Again, it is important that local police forces understand SOCA's remit and where it is going.

I regret that Ministers have missed an opportunity. The all-party group on the internet recently examined the Computer Misuse Act 1990 and made several recommendations, including upping the tariff set out in part I of that Act to two years, which would allow us to extradite people such as the members of the organised crime groups in Florida who are putting viruses into the internet. The problem with part I is that the tariff is only six months, so the offences are not extraditable.

The police will have the power the seize vehicles. Given the experience of Customs and Excise in doing that, and the problems that that has caused many of our constituents, I hope that Ministers will consider that power before police forces implement the measure. There is a difference between those who are actively engaged in fraud, whose cars should be taken, and those who are without insurance, tax or documentation because of incompetence or chaotic lifestyles. There is a fundamental difference between those who set out deliberately to act fraudulently and those who end up in a similar situation through their own incompetence. I am a great believer in the cock-up theory of life as opposed to the conspiracy theory, and when we consider clause 131, we need to examine the safeguards that can be built in to ensure that those whose lifestyles cause the situation are not penalised to the same extent as those who act deliberately.

The Bill contains much that is good, and it will be generally welcomed. It is a major step forward in tackling crime. The bringing together of functions under SOCA is important. We need to get the culture and the way in which SOCA is established right. I hope that when we discuss those aspects in Committee, the Government take on board some of the suggestions that will make it work more effectively, and that they learn the lessons of past agencies.

2.56 pm

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): I have a difficulty with Home Office Bills. As the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said, the Home Secretary is now up to about 50 Bills. Nearly two weeks ago, I tabled a question to the Prime Minister on how many Home Office Bills had been enacted since he became Prime Minister. Wisely, he promptly shifted it over to the Home Secretary's office, and of course there has not been a reply as I imagine that they are still weighing up the import of the question.

Brian White: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the Home Office in previous Governments has been equally bad?

Mr. Shepherd: The hon. Gentleman is launching himself on a hopeful exposition of ignorance on my part. There has never been a Government like this one. They have showered a confetti of legislation in home affairs matters on the House. It has not even been considered in Committee here, but it has had to be looked at seriously in the House of Lords. It is absurd to suggest that this Government are modest and timid in introducing Home Office measures. They flaunt them. They shout them from the top of every roof in the hope that no one will inspect them or understand that they are often ineffectual and contradict certain serious purposes that this House and this country have.

Bob Spink: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Shepherd: Not right now. I am beginning to address the very thought that the hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) set out.

It has been rightly pointed out that this is a compendium Bill. It is a portmanteau. The Home Office can stick anything into it that it wants. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman wanted something else stuck in it. Heaven forbid!

First, the Bill creates the Serious Organised Crime Agency. Secondly, it contains powers to compel people to co-operate with an investigation by producing documents and answering questions. Thirdly, it provides for defendants to plead guilty and offer Queen's evidence in return for a discounted sentence. Fourthly, it introduces changes to police powers contained in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and confers a number of new powers on the police. Fifthly, it extends the powers of community support officers and other police support staff. Sixthly, it provides for all criminal offences to be "arrestable offences", subject to a test of necessity. Seventhly, it provides for an offence of incitement to religious hatred. Eighthly, it creates a new offence of harassment of a person in his home. Ninthly, it create a new arrestable offence of trespass on sites designated by the Secretary of State. Tenthly, it gives the police new powers to control protests that hinder access to, or are disruptive of the workings of, Parliament, or which spoil the visual aspect of Parliament square.

Eleventhly, the Bill lifts the automatic reporting restrictions in youth courts in relation to proceedings for a breach of an antisocial behaviour order. Twelfthly, it extends the range of law enforcement agencies from which non-conviction information may be obtained. Thirteenthly, it enables the Criminal Records Bureau and its equivalent in Scotland to access passport, driving licence and national insurance number data in order to identify the identity of applicants for a criminal record disclosure.

I have listed only some of the propositions in the Bill, but many of them have, I would suggest, very significant human rights implications. Indeed, they engage a wide range of human rights, including the right to liberty under article 5; the right to a fair trial and the privilege against self-incrimination under article 6(1); the right to respect for private and family life, home and correspondence under article 8; the right to freedom of religion and conscience under article 9; the right to freedom of expression under article 10; freedom of association under article 11; and the right to be free from discrimination in the enjoyment of convention rights under article 14. That is quite a little coup, striking at the very heart of the Government's own Home Office flagship legislation, the Human Rights Act.

I do not know whether any Committee scrutinising the Bill or any judge who comes into contact with the Government's new proposals will find that they are in conflict with the range of rights that I mentioned. However, I would point out that this touches on something that is important to all of us—the balance between security and liberty, about which the Government are casual and careless.

Many people's minds have been concentrated by the new offence—or the replay of an offence that the Home Office tried to slip into a previous Bill, but did not get away with—relating to incitement to religious hatred. I come from a background, in Scotland and England, in which freedom of expression was the ultimate way of finding our liberty. It provides the way in which we assault the conscience of others.

James I of England, who was James VI of Scotland, said: "The business of state is mine; let no man meddle in it," and his authority for such a sweeping assertion was something called the divine right of kings. I might take exception to that concept, though I see that new Labour increasingly toys with it. Am I not assaulting a religious belief when I say that James I had no such divine right? What crime could I have committed under the Bill?—[Interruption.] It is a religious faith and belief. Having absolute power came from his belief and faith in the church. It may be an old argument about new Labour, but it knows nothing about the time before it was born. The struggle that I referred to was an expression of freedom, and it was a long march that enabled us to respect the premises on which our liberty was built.

The Home Secretary has found it necessary to invoke a derogation from the Human Rights Act and the convention on human rights, asserting that the very life of this nation is threatened. It is something to which the House has acceded, and the consequence has been the diminution of traditional liberties and freedoms. That is the thread that runs through the present Home Secretary's administration of one of our great offices of state. I do not acquiesce easily to those propositions, but I notice that on the front of the Bill, the Home Secretary asserts:

"In my view the provisions of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill are compatible with the Convention rights."

I do not think that he is right in that judgment and I am sure that he will be found not to be right. I would argue that the House should treat with great caution a Bill which the Home Secretary says should be debated in detail in Committee, when we have on the Order Paper, immediately after our present business, a programme motion that insists on the Bill's being returned from Committee on 25 January. Christmas lies between. Traditionally, at this stage of the Session, before a Bill goes into Committee we would barely have a Committee stage, if at all, before Christmas. We are looking at no more than four or five sittings for examining the Bill.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): Eight.

Mr. Shepherd: My hon. Friend on the Front Bench has clearly negotiated eight sittings. Hallelujah. Yet this is a 220-page Bill with many contentious schedules and provisions. I imagine that the Liberal Democrats and, I hope, my own side will examine those provisions carefully. However, our experience of Home Office Bills, with all the knives and reductions, suggests that the House will not have the opportunity to debate the detail of the Bill. That is why I am cautious about it. I do not accept the general roll against our liberties and freedoms and I do not accept that everything is merely a technical advance.

It is the aggregation that matters. If we stand back and look at the architecture of new Labour's new police and security state, it looks unattractive. If we take little step by little step, it may not be obvious that we have moved, but I ask those listening to our debates to cast an eye over the sequence of these Bills that make up Labour's defence of our liberty. I suggest that they are not only ineffectual in many ways, but a real step back from the essential liberties that this country worked and fought long and hard to achieve.

3.7 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): It is clear that we need the Serious Organised Crime Agency that is established in the Bill, because we have not seen the reductions in harms caused by organised crime that we have seen in those caused by volume crime. The harms of organised crime that damage people most are those associated with people trafficking: charging people to be trafficked to what they think will be a new life, which in fact leads them to be sold into slavery—usually sexual slavery, irrespective of gender—to feed the amazing capacity of men to buy women and children and young men, even though they know that those people are ill treated and live in appalling circumstances.

The second huge harm that befalls people from serious organised crime relates to drugs. I do not have to list the huge ramifications such crime has in our constituencies and the huge economic impact that it makes. I note that the aim of setting up SOCA, as explained in the White Paper "One Step Ahead", is rightly threefold. First, it is to disrupt criminal activities, including by adding to their costs and seizing assets. Secondly and rightly, it is to increase the risk for criminals—the Mr. Bigs—who must be more successfully targeted, arrested and prosecuted. That explains the need for procedural and evidential changes. Thirdly, and also rightly, there is the intention to reduce the market, among other ways, by reducing demand.

I can see how drugs education, treatments and initiatives can reduce demand for the massive importation of cocaine and heroin coming into this and pretty much every other western country on a weekly basis. Those initiatives must be supported, but have we not missed a trick when it comes to the question of people trafficking and disrupting the demand for it? Where are the measures to disrupt the desire for trafficked people? Where are the measures to reduce demand for ripe young people, who are sold off like fresh fruit to degenerates to be used for sex? Where are the measures to educate and treat those who behave in that way?

Education and treatment may be the wrong words. Hon. Members might think that I support social engineering, but we must face the fact that a market exists in this country for young people. If the recipients of sexual favours from those young people thought about it, they would realise that those young people have been abused and enslaved and are still being used in a framework of fear and oppression, but they disregard that in the interests of a brief physical sensation. We are missing a trick if we do not start seriously to recognise that disrupting demand for trafficked people is an urgent need. It is time to understand, recognise and think through that urgent need and to work out ways in which we can try to disrupt that unequivocally evil demand.

As the Home Secretary said—I agree with him—this is a practical Bill. I also agree with the White Paper that we should aim to make the UK one of the least attractive places in the world for organised crime. After we have implemented those measures, we must strengthen international co-operation to widen and disperse the measures that prove most effective.

I hope and think that SOCA will work. I never understood why intelligence and investigation were run by two separate bodies, and I am pleased that such incomprehension was not solely my own. Even in their modern incarnations, each body had a separate service authority, administration, internal rules, operational remit and complaints system, and it seemed to me that that was pointless. One authority that unites some skills and that calls by secondment on other skills from related groups such as the police, Customs and forensic scientists should be effective on first principles. Its focus on serious and organised crime should make that body more than the sum of its parts.

The concerns are easily and quickly listed, and I imagine that they are not profound. Accountability is still not 100 per cent. clear. Service authorities were attached to the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad, but the exact status of the board that will replace them is unclear. How will the new board compare and contrast with those service authorities?

On resourcing, little new cash appears to be available for SOCA. I know that the intention is that SOCA should be self-financing quite early in its life, but that may create concerns, which need allaying, for local police forces. For instance, people who are seconded to SOCA will leave a gap, which local police forces must fill. Rather than being properly financed at the top, SOCA will impose a down-line cost on the police, perhaps putting at risk their capacity, especially if their leading staff are seconded. That point has been made before, because it is a real risk. In police terms, SOCA will be a glamorous new body for which people will want to work and to which people will want to be seconded. We must ensure that the built-in protections are there, so that local police forces are not denuded of their high-flying staff.

The complaints route is not entirely clear. I saw the Home Secretary respond on that matter, but I did not follow 100 per cent. of his explanation. It seems that when somebody is designated to SOCA as a constable, a Customs officer or an immigration officer, they will be subject to the Independent Police Complaints Commission.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint) indicated assent.

Vera Baird: In a way, that pleases me, because the route is clear and the model is well tested—the IPCC has been good in the short time in which it has existed. However, the system is peculiar, because if somebody is seconded from Customs and Excise, where they were subject to their own complaints procedure, they will be subject to an entirely different procedure whose rules they did not know when they volunteered. The issue is not straightforward, but the Minister can see why I retain a little bit of residual concern about the complaints situation.

The possibility of a two-tier work force is also a concern. In the grass roots in my constituency, I have heard it expressed that people will be seconded at their particular level, seniority and pay from both the police and civilian organisations such as Forensic Science Service, Customs and Excise and the immigration service. It is possible to imagine an operation in which two people from completely different backgrounds do the same job for a year on radically different pay and conditions, which, in due course, might interfere with the cohesion that is essential for that body. That is another concern that must be thrashed out.

I shall quickly discuss two powers in the Bill relating to serious organised crime and two other police powers that concern me. We have heard a bit about disclosure notices, which have been taken from the model in the Serious Fraud Office. The model has been around since 1987 and works pretty well. However, it has a small compass of use and is used in few cases. The SFO is small, and it is governed by its lawyers, who are the only people who can use those notices. SOCA is a much bigger affair than the SFO ever has been or is ever likely to be, and it will deal with much higher levels of crime and much bigger gangs.

[Vera Baird]

The power in clause 56(3) worries me. It allows an "appropriate person" to have the power delegated to them to use a disclosure notice. We all know that disclosure notices compel people to give evidence, not against themselves but against others, or to produce documents or other kinds of information. The power is strong, and it needs to be used in a sophisticated way. Although the caveat is that the power can be used only in exceptional circumstances, and following the intervention from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews), who will define those circumstances?

Concerns exist about when such exceptional circumstances will occur, and, taking the SFO model, the power to use disclosure notices might be delegated to low-level people in SOCA. It will not be easy to control the use of those powers, because SOCA is much bigger. What would the remedy be if those powers were wrongly used, particularly granted that is an offence punishable by imprisonment not to obey the application of those powers?

Mr. Heath: What is the hon. and learned Lady's view about maintaining a distinction between the SFO and the new agency in the first instance? When the Solicitor-General was questioned about that matter, she advanced the argument that because of the combined prosecution and investigatory role of the SFO, it must be a separate body. However, I was not entirely convinced and would welcome the hon. and learned Lady's view.

Vera Baird: That is a rather broad issue to raise in connection solely with this power. I agree with the hon. Gentleman to the extent that I am not convinced that that justification is one that would necessarily make for permanent separation. Irrespective of whether one merges the two, however, it is more or less inevitable that the use of disclosure notices will be much more frequent than it ever has been under the Serious Fraud Office. I am worried about its being delegated too far down and about the huge consequences of refusing to comply with a notice, whether rightly or wrongly imposed.

I have two more concerns about disclosure notices. First, whatever the person says under the pressure of such a notice cannot rightly be used in evidence against them, but assuming that what they have said is, in the ordinary course of events, disclosed to anybody who is a defendant in a case that follows, it will be impossible to put the person who is the subject of the disclosure notice on trial with those defendants. Although the Crown will not be able to put to the person who is the subject of the notice what they have said, the co-accused most certainly will, and they will use it to discredit that individual and to put the blame on to him if there is the slightest inconsistency between what he says in court in his defence and what he has said under the pressure of the disclosure notice. I fear that the information that emerges from the use of these disclosure notices will be used in evidence and weigh on guilt and innocence, and that that will give people second thoughts about complying with them.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. and learned Friend vouchsafe to me her expertise on whether the procedure in clauses 56 and 57 might compromise the situation of journalists; or are they excepted by the provisions governing privileged information later in the Bill?

Vera Baird: My understanding is that they do not need to fall within the ambit of privilege, because the Bill contains a specific exception for journalistic material which means that they will not be troubled by the provisions.

Secondly—I raised this with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath)—disclosure notices will usually be issued against minor players; that is what they are for. When officers are trying to unravel a gang, they will be conscious of who is at the outside edges doing small amounts and want to put pressure on them, in the form of an incentive or a compulsion, to talk about what is going on further inside, so that they can gradually peel off the layers, as it were, to get to the Mr. Bigs. We must face the fact that as soon as the disclosure notice is issued that minor player will come under threat from the Mr. Bigs whom their silence protects. That does not happen in relation to the SFO; we are talking about a completely different kind of crime involving extraordinarily large criminal empires buttressed by the regular use of violence, intimidation and threats to sustain them. These people will undoubtedly face intimidation, threats to injure, and even threats to and attempts to kill.

As I said before—I hope that I am not in error—new section 74, which establishes long-overdue national witness protection measures, does not include in its ambit somebody who is the subject of a disclosure notice, because its definition of "witness" relates to someone who is miles further on in the process, giving evidence in proceedings. That will not take away the problem.

We want this to work, and it will do so only if people who are served with notices know that they are safe in responding. I would much rather go to prison for a couple of years, which is the maximum sentence, than face the wrath of a Mr. Big who is determined to silence me one way or another. That is a big burden that the authorities will have to recognise straight away by putting in place provisions to protect people.

Mr. Marshall-Andrews: Before my hon. and learned Friend moves on, I want to ask her about the sanction for not complying with a disclosure notice. She will have noticed that the defence to such a charge is that they have not acted "wilfully". As she will know, that word causes more difficulty in criminal law than anything else. If she is on the Committee that steers the Bill through, as I am sure that she will be, will she contemplate at least attempting to amend it to the far more useful and reasonable term, "without reasonable excuse"?

Vera Baird: As ever, my hon. and learned Friend makes a good point, and whoever is on the Committee should consider it. I entirely agree that the word "wilfully" is slightly outdated, very hard to define, and causes more problems than it solves in criminal law.

Formalising the giving of Queen's evidence is obviously a good idea. It should not be carried on in an under-the-counter, ad hoc or arbitrary way; it should be done in a systematic way. However, this will not produce a straightforward benefit to the criminal justice system. It is extremely difficult to get juries to rely on the word of someone who is pleading guilty to get a soft sentence, when the only way in which he can save himself from a 30 or 40-year sentence is to talk about what he has done with his co-accused. Of course, in those circumstances, he would have every interest in piling on to his co-accused offences of which he himself might well be guilty. It would be very clear to the jury that that was going on, and that would make it difficult for him to be believed. It would be impossible to keep it from the jury that it was going on without perverting the course of justice, because it has to be clear to the defence that the individual has a motive for giving that particular evidence, whether it is true or not. It is important that both parties know what is going on.

The Criminal Justice Act 2003 allowed the introduction of previous convictions and all sorts and shades of past villainy to be put against the person giving evidence, just as they can be put against a defendant. However, it would be easy to undermine a jury's ability to give any credence to what such an individual said, given that he could easily be discredited because he is almost certain to have previous convictions and because all the material that will come from the defendants about the way in which he has previously conducted himself will show him to be a terrible villain.

The definition of what is [illegible]ful in such circumstances will clearly involve [illegible] will get a conviction. The individual will have been told to tell the truth, and the Crown will rely on him to do so, but his way out of his dilemma is to get the people in the dock convicted. That is a difficult situation for the authorities to handle. The individual could be sentenced before he gave his evidence. That would look better, but the authorities would then be hooked by him, because if he reneged on his agreement, he would already have his sentence and it would be hard to unpick it. There could well be grey areas in terms of whether he had told the truth.

On the other hand, if he were sentenced after giving his evidence, it would be as clear as day that he had an incentive to tell the truth—that is, to get the Mr. Bigs off the streets, as the prosecution wanted. Both options look slightly corrupt, and it is easy to mix up the legitimate use of a criminal who has turned his face against crime and decided to go legit with the corrupt use of people who are just trying to save their necks. If, in any trial in which a person is in the dodgy position of giving such evidence, there were in addition any dodgy police evidence that called into question their motives, such a prosecution would be doomed to failure. We can only hope that this procedure will become more familiar to us so that juries will learn better to rely on what is said by supergrasses, or whatever they are to be called. However, I would suggest that, in the short term, these measures are not going to make a huge difference.

By way of a footnote, I must point out that there is no provision in the Bill for the person entering into an agreement to give Queen's evidence to get legal advice during the negotiations. He will be subject to the terms of a detailed agreement that will be incapable of being revoked. Indeed, as I understand the Bill, his discounted sentence could be revoked if he did not tell the truth. It is hugely important that a person entering into such a contract should do so only if he has had its terms properly explained to him and understood them. I also wish the authorities luck in deciding whether someone has told the truth in a situation involving such an agreement, because that concept could become extraordinarily hazy.

The Bill is pretty clear and focused when it is targeted in those ways, notwithstanding the reservations that I have stated. However, when it is not targeted against serious organised crime, it seems to lack focus and to raise certain concerns. I am particularly worried about the amendment to the power of arrest. Clause 101 will amend the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 by effectively making every offence arrestable, from parking on a yellow line or not having a light on a bicycle to murder, subject to a test of "necessity". That will be very difficult, I think.

Currently, when a policeman summonses someone, he must decide whether he suspects that person of committing a non-arrestable offence, an arrestable offence or a serious arrestable offence. The powers follow from that decision, but it is a fairly clear one to make, as he can see what is going on in front of him and what the offence is or is not.

It is said that that is a confusing position for officers to be in because there is no straightforward universal framework. The intention is that this should be the straightforward universal framework, with powers of arrest extended to every offence. I would have thought that if police officers find difficulty in deciding whether they are looking at a non-arrestable, arrestable or serious arrestable offence—granted, they have been trained to do that—they will find it bewildering to apply the test of necessity to everything that comes their way.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome referred to the 2002 review of PACE, which considered the problems of confusions over arrest powers but rejected this solution. I agree that it is right to reject it. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) referred, almost in passing, to this change representing a move from consent-based policing towards policing by discretion. In my view, it represents exactly that, which is not something that should be mentioned only in passing.

We are considering saying to police officers one of two things: either sort out some complicated principles of the Human Rights Act 1998 on the spot and make the decision accurately or—I think this is what we are saying—officers have all the powers they need and those should be used only when they think it necessary.

Mr. Heath: I am most grateful to the hon. and learned Lady for giving way. She is making an extremely important point, which she knows I agree with. Does she agree that, at the point of arrest, a lot of other powers flow from that in our statute law? If that arrest becomes entirely discretionary on the part of the officer for any offence, so will all the other powers that flow from arrest when that person is taken back to the police station.

Vera Baird: The hon. Gentleman is exactly right. There are a number of serious powers—searching, searching premises, use of force—that flow from a decision to arrest, all of which will become the subject of what is bound to be a highly individualised decision that is likely to be, therefore, almost by definition, an arbitrary way of deciding who is arrested and who is not.

This "necessity" has to be a subjective term, has it not? It will mean what the officer in that situation thinks is necessary. There will never be some black and white rule whereby it can be said, "It is necessary in this situation, but not in that." Necessity will be in the mind of the individual. What better definition is there than an arbitrary power of arrest? The decision to use it is in the mind of the individual.

Either that is the real position or we are asking officers—in the absence of any rules about what is a necessity and in the absence of the definitions of which offences can and cannot be arrested for—to fall back on their individual judgment. So if we decide to look for some rules, what will we find? We can look only to the human rights convention.

The individual involved—either in the heat of the moment, on the roadside or in the middle of a field where he had apprehended someone who may or may not be a burglar—would have to decide whether he was justified, given the exigencies of the situation, in interfering with the individual's rights under article 5, which refers to arbitrary detention, while bearing in mind the rights under article 8, which refers to the right to privacy.

Are we are expecting—pretty soon we will be, I think—a community support officer, or in any event a trainee constable, to reach such a conclusion in the heat of the moment? That is just not going to happen. I am afraid that this will be an arbitrary test, and I am concerned about arbitrary powers of arrest.

I do not mind confessing that a few weeks ago I had something of a ruck with a police officer who asserted, utterly incorrectly, that I had gone through a red light and turned left, and who roared up behind me in his vehicle, clearly seeing that I was a weak and feeble middle-aged woman and thinking that he would get out and rough me up a little verbally. So, when he got out he told me I had gone through the light. I said that I had not and proposed to move off. He stopped me. He proposed to lecture me. I got cross with him. One can just imagine that the necessity to arrest me could not have been far from his mind, if he had that power. I am afraid that that is what will go wrong. Perhaps we do not have to worry—although I am worried about the arbitrariness of it all—but a situation that gets heated over a small matter will lead to misuse of this power.

Mr. McWalter: I have little doubt that, in the exchange to which my hon. and learned Friend refers, it was not the policeman who came off best. She is raising this issue partly because she will know that one of the great difficulties that police officers have is that somebody who seeks to evade their attentions often conceals their real identity. Consequently, a large number of offenders get away with relatively trivial offences, such as fare dodging on a train. If a police officer suspects that a false identity has been given, that creates major difficulties for effective policing.

Vera Baird: I appreciate that point entirely. Currently, however, section 25 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 allows a power of arrest, not for that level of offence but for slightly higher ones, when we would be seriously concerned that people might be able to get away with the offence by using false names. If a police officer asks for a name and address, and has reasonable cause to suspect that a false one has been given, he then has a power of arrest under section 25. Such a problem—not for the ticket dodge, but for a higher level of crime—is therefore not present, and this provision is not required to meet it.

I have said all that there is to say about that proposal. It is very worrying, and it needs consideration in Committee. Perhaps it can be realistically explored in the way in which the Home Secretary appeared to be offering himself as ready to explore issues about which others might have real reservations.

Lastly, I am very concerned about civilianising the custody officer. The custody officer is usually called a custody sergeant, and he must indeed be a sergeant of police. By definition, he will be an experienced officer who has been in the force for a number of years. He is not a jailer—he is not just the person who locks up an individual. He has a responsibility for the civil liberties of that individual and to ensure that all the procedures, under the extensive PACE codes of practice, are put in place. He must keep a custody record, which he must open at the outset and which must be kept systematically. He is in charge of decisions as diverse as when the individual will or will not be entitled to see his family, how long they will need to be detained for, and when it is necessary to call a more senior officer to consider events that might have arisen in the police station. He will also have to make decisions about whether someone gets bail. As I understand it, those duties will be devolved down to a civilian, which causes me some concern.

The custody sergeant has additional jobs, which occur every day. When someone is arrested, the officers responsible are obliged to present the facts of why the person has been arrested to the custody sergeant. A senior police officer, as the sergeant usually is respective to those bringing in the individual, will have the power, authority and independence to say to those bringing in the individual that he does not accept that those facts amount to the alleged offence, if that is the case. Will a civilian employee be able to do that?

In addition, the custody sergeant has the responsibility of ensuring that interviewing is done fairly, that it is done for only as long as it should occur, and not longer, and that it is done only when it should occur. Will a civilian be able to resist the personalities, the force and the seniority of senior detectives who may want to interview again someone who has already been interviewed two or three times, because something new has arisen in the case? What is required is a person who has a full understanding of all the implications of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and of the codes, and who is totally independent of the inquiry and the officers involved, senior enough to be taken notice of, and able to take responsible decisions. That person will not be a civilian employee who, like community support officers, is of lower status than the police; he will have to be a civilian employee of higher status than the police with whom he deals. Why can he not be a police officer—the obvious person for the job?

What will we gain by releasing a custody sergeant to do whatever is intended on the beat? That is a rather unusual notion. The person concerned will generally be an officer involved in administrative roles in the police station, so no front-line troops will be released. The price will be a very high level of risk for the rights of those who are detained. Let us leave the job with a police officer, or else understand more fully why the change should be made. Are there not better ways of releasing troops on to the street?

Where it targets serious organised crime, the Bill seems very good and very focused. Arguably, some elements are not strong enough. For instance, I do not know why the definition of serious crime for the purposes of the extra powers does not include paedophile rings. There are respects in which that part of the Bill ought to be made tougher, and I hope that that can be done in Committee. Where the Bill is less targeted, it seems less focused—a bit of a Christmas tree—and I think it will require careful scrutiny.

3.41 pm

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). I echo her point about the omission of paedophile rings, and I will shortly return to another point that she made.

I know from the many letters I receive from constituents that crime is the No. 1 fear. Violent crime and antisocial behaviour are in danger of becoming an epidemic, blighting the lives of numerous law-abiding, hard-working families throughout the country. The breakdown of law and order and respect for wider authority is arguably the most serious domestic problem in Britain today.

In Kent we are blessed with one of the best police forces in the country—in my view, one of the best in the world—but I am sorry to say that the Government, with their plethora of crime Bills, have done little to turn the tide back. Despite unbelievable, unprecedented amounts of legislation, violent crime is rising. The horrifying recent incidents—three murders by burglars, of which we have read in the press in the last week or two—underpin the bleak statistics.

Rather than dealing with the full scope of the Bill, I shall focus almost entirely on those who suffer terrible, degrading, inhuman treatment at the hands of international organised criminal gangs engaged in people smuggling. They have no voice. We are nowhere near winning the battle against drugs, and we now have a whole new war to fight. One of SOCA's most important roles must be to tackle the disgusting traffic in people—the vile trade in women and children.

Estimates of the worldwide value of migrant smuggling and trafficking vary. According to Der Spiegel, the German secret service has estimated that revenue for international criminal gangs operating in Europe alone amounted to €5 billion a year, of which about two thirds was collected by Chinese criminal gangs, three or four years ago. Some organisations now estimate the total value of the trade to be anything up to €30 billion a year. The Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe believes that it has now replaced the drugs trade as the world's most profitable illegal industry. That is a truly staggering fact.

The International Organisation for Migration has estimated that between 700,000 and 2 million women and children are trafficked across international borders each year. It observes that "in most countries there are few statistics on the scale of trafficking."

Unfortunately, Britain is one of the most affected countries. The Home Office has no information on the number of women trafficked into the UK for the purpose of exploitation. Indeed, one official described the whole illegal immigrant population as a "knowledge black hole".

At a Home Office seminar five years ago, workers in health projects estimated that, even back then, 50 per cent. of those employed in London's sex industry's so-called brothels were immigrants. A more recent investigation by the Metropolitan police found that 76 per cent. of Soho brothels were staffed by foreign prostitutes, with Albania and Lithuania being the most common sources. Every year, more than 6,000 children aged between 12 and 16 are smuggled into Europe to work as prostitutes. An estimated 80 per cent. of people trafficked from Albania are teenage girls under the age of 18, according to a report in The Guardian.

Behind these grim statistics lie literally thousands of horrific individual cases. Typically, the victims describe how they are repeatedly raped until their resistance is completely broken. By the time that they reach this country, they are completely in the hands of their captors. Indeed, even if they do escape, they are in a foreign country. Frequently, they do not speak the language and have no idea to whom to turn. In many cases, the police in their country of origin are the very last people to whom they would go for help; they have no way of knowing that the situation here is very different.

The Bill does contain some welcome measures—in particular, chapter 4 of part 2 puts witness protection on to a statutory footing—but it is very important to provide safe houses for victims who have only just escaped their tormentors. The Home Secretary gave me a fairly conciliatory answer earlier in this regard; however, the anti-slavery coalition and Amnesty International pointed out in a joint presentation in the House last week that there are very few safe houses in this country for such women, and that there are now no safe houses at all for children, the only two having closed. It is vital that women, and particularly children, have safe places to go to, where they are beyond the reach of these remorseless criminal groups.

Amnesty International and others have also called for medical care, counselling and other aid before deportation. I have been involved in the campaign concerning the treatment of child victims in this country—a campaign that has been run for the past 15 years. There has been a transformation in their treatment, but how much worse has the plight become of these young girls, who have been abused for months, and in some cases, for years? They know nothing about this country, yet they are receiving the same sort of treatment here. If we do not provide the resources to protect them and to encourage those who are brave enough to testify, the chances of penetrating the dark and murky underworld in which these rings operate is nil.

When this Government came to power seven years ago, we were told that we would be treated to joined-up government. This Bill is trumpeted as an example, and we all welcome the bringing together of the various agencies. However, in other fields relating to crime and disorder, measures have been implemented that conflict directly with each other. The Government have a professed desire to tackle binge drinking; yet licensing legislation prevents local authorities from considering police intelligence on licence applicants' previous conduct. It also prevents them from taking into account serious time-expired offences, and it creates a charter for previously illegal raves. At the same time, in the name of healthy living, the Government are waging war against smokers, fat people and anybody enjoying a Big Mac, while at the same time downgrading the classification of cannabis and presiding over an explosion in sexually transmitted diseases.

Sadly, my concern today—people trafficking—is no exception in this regard. Please let me be clear: I do not buy the argument of those well-meaning non-governmental organisations that say that the vile trade of people trafficking can somehow be separated from wider immigration policy. That is complete nonsense. The organisations that specialise in people trafficking started out in the business of people smuggling, and their profits grew when they expanded into this vile new sector. Bringing successful prosecutions against people traffickers through the testimony of courageous witnesses will help to close down people smuggling and vice versa. If we make it harder for people smugglers to succeed, we will help to deter people traffickers.

People trafficking is a symptom of the wider breakdown of immigration controls. A report by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in July 2000 on the trafficking and smuggling of refugees states that much of existing policy making by European Governments is "part of the problem and not the solution."

A passage in a migration paper published by the widely respected Brussels-based "Migration News Sheet" sums up the position perfectly:

"Through their severe short-sightedness and inclination to rush through emergency measures without reflecting on the consequences . . . EU states have helped to create the ingredients of a very lucrative form of international criminality which top Mafia bosses never even dreamed of, namely trafficking in human beings."

Our borders and internal enforcement procedures are undermanned. The Triad and Snakehead groups that operate women's prostitution were behind the Morecambe bay disaster. As long ago as June of the previous year, the Home Office were warned about the exploitation of vulnerable migrants by ruthless gangmasters. The warning was noted, but ignored, as a clear decision was made to do nothing. In a letter to the hon. Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Geraldine Smith), the Home Office said that the immigration service could not intervene because of "resource issues". It said that "little useful purpose would have been served by sending officers to assist."

What were immigration officers doing that could have served a greater purpose?

The lack of specific anti-trafficking legislation to deal with perpetrators has often resulted in charges being brought under the Sexual Offences Act 1956. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar was right that we are far too short of tools. This is one of the few areas where we would benefit from having more Home Office laws, as we need much sharper measures to prosecute both the traffickers and the perpetrators. As a parallel—I am not suggesting that this could be directly imposed in British law—when we were discussing legislation to deal with sex tourism, we discovered that the Philippines had passed a law under which a prima facie offence is committed if a tourist is alone with a Filipino child without being able to show good reason. It takes a great deal of courage for women and young girls to testify, but once they have done so, the criminals often get away with short prison sentences. Sentences should reflect the nature of crimes that often result in the destruction of young lives. Indeed, those lives are often ended by sexually transmitted disease.

As always on immigration, the Government are sending out the wrong signals. Only one in five failed asylum seekers are removed from the UK, and more than 250,000 asylum seekers live here. Asylum applications are still much higher than they were in 1997, having peaked at more than double the number in that year. The Government are taking virtually no action against legal advisers who exploit legal loopholes for use by people smugglers, whose business helps to sustain people trafficking. If memory serves, in Home Office questions, I was told that there were only 12 cases in the previous year in which legal advisers were prosecuted. Interestingly, none of those cases related to work permits. We had a discussion on the subject in Westminster Hall. It is obviously true that most people traffickers do not go anywhere near the work permit system, but a system that has quadrupled the number of people already in the country who apply successfully for work permits serves as a pull factor that is of huge use to people smugglers. Incidentally, can someone explain to me what has happened to the 1,160 young women admitted last year, allegedly to take up jobs as dancers? Do we really think that none of them is being exploited?

The wider breakdown in immigration policy is creating an underclass of people who, at the more moderate end of the scale, are working in the UK illegally, subject to low health and safety standards and so on, through to the extreme example of those enslaved in child brothels. Hundreds of thousands of people continue to circulate illegally in this country, many of them to a greater or lesser degree in the hands of the people who originally smuggled them here. I sincerely hope that the creation of SOCA will help to eradicate this vile crime, and that the misery of the thousands of exploited and tormented women and children will be brought to an end.

The Bill on its own will not achieve that. Successful action against illegal exploitation must involve other factors, a number of which I have mentioned—safe houses for witnesses, more counselling and support for them so that they are more likely to be willing to testify, much tougher penalties in courts, and an effective overall immigration policy.

My final point relates to another topic. There was a tremendous cross-current of discussion on the introduction of the new crime of inciting religious hatred. Before the eloquent testimony of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) on the subject, the Home Secretary was generous in giving way to about 10 Members in various parts of the House who were deeply concerned about the matter. I should like to leave hon. Members in all parts of the House with one thought on that—the point that I put to the hon. and learned Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews), with whom I frequently disagree, although he is my near neighbour in Canterbury.

I ask hon. Members to think about this: the law is already perfectly firm and clear on incitement to violence. We have a panoply of measures to deal with it. If Parliament passes an Act, the courts and the Attorney-General must look at it and say, "This is supposed to extend a power in a new direction. There must be some new dimension to this." What is this new dimension of incitement to religious hatred? How does it differ from incitement to violence? The only possible answer comes back to arguing about beliefs. If we go down that route, we have given up on free speech. I urge the Government to think again about these provisions, although I support the rest of the Bill and argue that it needs strengthening in a number of areas with regard to the vile trade in women and children.

3.58 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): I shall begin where the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) left off and speak briefly on clause 119 and schedule 10. I have misgivings about the new offence that we are creating—that of stirring up religious hatred. It is being introduced for a noble purpose, as the Home Secretary acknowledged earlier, and for the best of reasons, but it still makes me feel a little uncomfortable. There is no consensus among the public that calls for the introduction of this new offence. When Lord Avebury looked at the matter in detail in the Special Select Committee, one of the conclusions was that there should be a degree of protection of faith but that there was no consensus as to the precise form that that might take.

That is still the position. Religions are belief systems, and all belief systems should be open to challenge, ridicule, satire and debate. In a free society, it should be possible to contest them.

Paragraph 305 of the explanatory notes states:

"Of themselves, criticism or expressions of antipathy or dislike of particular religions or their adherents will not be caught by the offence."

However, those are just the notes, not the terms of the Bill itself. Eminent jurists and lawyers say that the Bill would have that very effect.

The Bill contains no definition of religion, and that is amazing. There will be an offence of stirring up religious hatred, but we will not know what constitutes a religion. Apparently, the Government are content to leave that for the courts to decide.

Mr. McWalter: Does my hon. Friend accept that the expression of antipathy towards a creed might be okay in a conversation, but that schedule 10(11)(3) means that broadcasting such a view on the radio or in an interview on television or in the newspapers would render it likely to be seen or heard? As a result, strong antipathy expressed in that way would fall within the scope of the Bill.

Mr. Prentice: I shall come to that very point, but first I want to deal with the fundamental question of what constitutes a religion. I was about to say that this question will test the most eminent jurists and the finest legal brains in the land. In an intervention on the Home Secretary, I said that there were 5,015 Jedi knights in Sheffield. They belong to a religion that was listed in the 2001 census. Across the country, there are—amazingly!—390,000 Jedi knights. I suppose that they must worship Darth Vader, or something.

That is astonishing, so I took a closer look at the 2001 census and its list of religions. The list includes mysticism—well, why not?—paganism, new age beliefs, and Vodun. I confess that I have not heard of the latter, and I should be pleased to take an intervention from any colleague who might be able to help me out. The list goes on to cite the Wicca religion, Tin Tao, ancestor worship and Cooneyism. It mentions satanism too, and about 200 other religions. They all have adherents somewhere in the UK. The religions listed range from the bizarre to the absolutely mainstream. It will be left to the lawyers and the courts to interpret which religions will be caught by the new offence that is being created.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): Schedule 10(3) also refers to people who lack religious beliefs. That means that we are talking about inciting religious hatred among lots of our fellow citizens who do not believe in anything at all.

Mr Prentice: Atheism is included in the list, and I think that gnosticism is too. The list can be accessed on the web. As the hon. Gentleman says, the Bill captures those who believe in a religion and those who, conversely, do not. That is a little perverse.

What do we mean by hatred? I suppose it means a really intense dislike. How would Christians feel about satanists? I imagine that they would feel an intense dislike for the Antichrist—perhaps that is another one for the lawyers. After all, we have a satanist in the Royal Navy now: he got some publicity a couple of months ago.

I am not an expert in these matters, unlike some colleagues, but there is an ambiguity about where the line will be drawn on what is and is not acceptable. It all seems very subjective at the moment and, of course, one person's meat is another's poison. I have heard it said that the new legislation could be used by coreligionists—a fundamentalist Muslim against a more mainstream Muslim or an ultra-orthodox Jew against a liberal Jew. It might be felt that the liberal Jew was in some way selling out the religion.

[Mr Prentice]

Intention is not included in the Bill, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) pointed out. Intention is not required for the offence to be committed. It must be shown only that the action had the effect of stirring up religious hatred. The hon. Member for Canterbury pointed out that the statute book is very thick and there must be any number of ways in which the police and the prosecuting authorities could successfully bring to book someone who incites violence.

In fact, Lord Desai made that point when he said that we do not need a new law, because the existing provisions should be sufficient. That point was amplified last night by an eminent academic lawyer, Professor Jowell, speaking in the Jubilee Room. He said that, for an offence to be committed, "the words, behaviour, written material, programmes or recordings must be threatening, abusive or insulting".

He said that the provisions were very vague and he was not sure whether they covered something that was offensive. He also said that the provisions set a very low threshold and he was not sure what sort of statement would cross the threshold and be liable to prosecution.

The Home Secretary told us earlier that the person of the Attorney-General provided a lock or failsafe, because he would make the decision on prosecution. However, in deciding whether or not to prosecute, the Attorney-General would be establishing a benchmark of what was and was not acceptable. Is that a proper safeguard? Who knows what kind of religious beliefs a future Attorney-General might hold. We might end up with a really fired-up, souped-up, born-again Christian: we do not know.

The final worry is that the Bill may encourage self-censorship. People may be wary of saying anything that could be taken out of context and cause offence. The people who say that most passionately are those who work in the creative world—journalists, writers, comedians and performers. The comedian, Rowan Atkinson, who attended the meeting in the Jubilee Room last night, said that he believed that the Bill would lead to a "chilling of the climate of free expression".

He went on to say that it was incredible that in future he might crack an illegal joke. That is astonishing and not very funny, so I hope that the measure will be considered exhaustively in Committee, because many people out there, as well as Members on both sides of the House, have big reservations about the new offence that we are about to enact.

4.10 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): I do not always entirely agree with the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), but he spoke eloquently and I agreed with every word he said. I am grateful to him for giving us the benefit of his sound advice.

The Bill is like the curate's egg—good in parts. In fact, it is good in most parts. There are 155 clauses and more than 200 pages. I agree with most of them, although there are one or two bits that I want to pick over, if I get the opportunity. There are obviously some easy political points to be scored here, if we wanted to try to do so, but today is not the time for that.

There is one serious and fatal problem with the Bill: the religious hatred provisions, which are ill-conceived, idiotic and an offence against freedom and common sense. They may damage mainstream religions, and they will certainly damage tolerance in our society, and will benefit only the worst type of extremists. They will also benefit the law industry, which stands to trade heavily and expensively on the uncertainties and lack of definition in the Bill.

Like many other pieces of legislation introduced by the Government, the Bill transgresses the law of unintended consequences. I accept that the Government are introducing it with good intentions, but it will deliver unintended consequences. It will reduce tolerance, and that is a major problem. Just as the Hunting Act 2004 will damage the overall welfare of our fox population, and the Gambling Bill will create super-casinos that will increase the damage done to individuals, families and society by excessive gambling, so the religious hatred provisions in this Bill will attack society's freedoms; they will damage tolerance, and may bring extremist right-wing responses that damage religions themselves.

I want to start on a positive note, however, and whistle quickly through one or two of the Bill's main provisions. On balance, the new agency—SOCA—is necessary to respond to greater co-ordination in international organised crime, such as people trafficking, drug trafficking and money laundering. I welcome the move to set up the agency, but I want to address two issues. First, the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad, which, with some help from Customs and Excise, will form part of the new force, have generally served the country well. They have good management and administrative support and their officers are dedicated and professional. We should not forget to thank them and give them recognition for their achievements, dedication and professionalism.

Bob Spink: I am glad to see that the Minister agrees.

My second point about SOCA is that the agency will be close to sinister organised crime, and although there must be no crossover, that danger is always present in such organisations. We shall give the agency many new and powerful tools, so we must also have procedures for complaints about and regulation of the agency that command public respect and confidence.

The Home Secretary said today that accountability would be provided by the Home Affairs Committee. I do not quite understand how that will work, and I remain to be convinced about it. Clearly, there must be a strong independent element in the complaints channels, which must be publicly accountable and transparent, and it is not clear to me that the Independent Police Complaints Commission will work well.

The single co-ordinated and integrated agency—SOCA—will take the fight to those involved in serious crime. We should all welcome that, but we need to look carefully at the status of SOCA's officers, who will lose their status as officers of the Crown. The Police Federation has serious concerns about that, and we must listen carefully to those concerns, not least because the vast majority of current National Crime Squad officers are unwilling to submit to transferring to SOCA, which may represent a great loss of skills for tackling serious crime.

I come now to a raft of technical police powers that I broadly welcome. The extension of investigative powers, which will enable the police to collect evidence and compulsorily question those who can help to solve serious crimes, particularly while the crime is hot, is an important measure. Used sensibly, it can help. I broadly welcome the extension of powers of arrest to all offences, but we must define limits to that, of course. I have great concerns about citizens' arrests, as will most hon. Members.

I welcome the super-warrants that will empower the police to act quickly against villains who are now much more organised and cleverer. They will give the police increased power and flexibility while the chase is on and the evidence is still available. I also welcome the police power to test for drugs at the point of arrest. The increased power for the police to take forensic evidence at the earliest possible moment must also be greatly welcomed. At a much lower level, the power to deal with incorrectly registered and uninsured vehicles is long overdue.

The powers to tackle animal rights extremists and to protect people from serious harassment are also long overdue, although I do not know why we did not simply extend the powers in the Protection from Harassment Act 1997 to do just that. That would have been a much easier way to deal with the matter, and it could have been done years ago. However, the power to remove protesters or to put onerous conditions on them, particularly as we are taking that power to deal with the problem outside Parliament now, gives me deep cause for concern. As someone said, hard cases make bad law. That is absolutely true, and we must be careful not to over-respond to the situation in front of Parliament. We must do nothing to stop fair and decent protesting in this country.

All those powers will enable us to make society safer and to bring more villains to justice—we all want to do that—but they will also enable us to establish people's innocence earlier. If we are taking evidence and testing earlier, we can establish people's innocence earlier. That must not be forgotten, and it is a very good thing. People who are innocent would not object to those powers being used on them, as that would establish their innocence.

These measures will help us to improve detection rates and therefore to increase convictions. Detection and conviction are the best ways to deter serious and organised crime. These measures will tip the scales of justice back towards the innocent victim and society, and against the serious villain. Some of the measures may offend the legal profession, but hon. Members must act in the best interests of society, not in the best interests of the Law Society—although I thank it for its excellent briefing on the Bill. It is high time we took tough action to catch and convict villains and to support the victims, especially if they have protected themselves, their families and their property against burglars, intruders and other attackers. We must also make the punishment of convicted people much tougher.

The Bill makes changes to the judicial system and increases police powers. I wait to see how Queen's evidence—plea bargaining—will be designed and work in practice. It offers clear administrative advantages, and I am not necessarily against that. I stress again, however, that when a sentence is given it must be appropriate, even after a plea bargain. We must not give slaps across the wrist to serious criminals. The punishment must be so tough that they and others are seriously deterred, and must also strongly promote and enable the rehabilitation of criminals while they are in prison. Bad people can and do reform to become good people, but not often enough under our politically correct wimpish systems of punishment.

Tough and harsh action at the start of a career in crime can and does deflect many away from crime. A constituent from Hadleigh e-mailed me yesterday to ask me to raise that with the Home Secretary. My constituent knows full well that tough action at the start of a career in crime can save not just society from crime, but the life of someone who gets involved in crime. Sadly, the Bill does not address punishment in any way. We need a Bill to do that.

We can all welcome the witness protection proposals and the improved money laundering provisions, but we must not forget low-level offences such as credit card crime and cheque fraud. Pound by pound, those crimes can feed through into serious crime and fund terrorism, on the old IRA model. I hope that SOCA will bear that in mind, especially while we suffer from the threat of terrorism, which on the international scale is largely from Muslim sources—and although that is a fact, I might be at risk under the religious hate crime provisions for saying it. That would be wrong.

The religious incitement measures will damage freedom of expression and religious liberty. They will prevent fair comment about religious beliefs and cults and enable them to silence their critics. Some cults are off the wall, some are downright nasty, some are dangerous and some are just silly—we have heard about the Jedi knights twice already, I think. Some cults are corrosive to society, especially Christian society, which is still broadly the society that we enjoy in this country—and I do not want anyone ever to be at risk of being prosecuted for saying that.

The law will be brought into disrepute by this measure. The Attorney-General and the courts will find it impossible to interpret the proposals consistently. How will we select a jury to deliberate on such charges? Will the jurors' religion be taken into account when the jury is formed? What relevance would that have to the decision that they made, depending on whose religious beliefs were being offended?

The Bill could even prevent comedians from poking fun at religions. It is a measure of how civilised we are that we can tolerate and withstand fun, jokes, jibes and criticism. The Bill is a move backwards to a less tolerant society. I can just imagine the thought police dragging Dawn French, under arrest and in handcuffs, off to prison after a particularly challenging episode of "The Vicar of Dibley"—[Interruption.] It might take several police to do that job, but where would the outrageous alternative comic stand in the face of the Bill, and who would like to see Billy Connolly thrown in jail?

Mr. Weir: Yes.

Bob Spink: I see a few nods around the Chamber, but I think that that would be a bad move.

The incitement to religious hatred proposal of 2001 provoked widespread criticism from many groups—not only Christians, but Muslims, atheists, humanists and gay rights activists. After two defeats in the other place, the Government dropped their proposals—yet another example of the other place doing a better job for the country than we are able to do in this House now. No wonder the Prime Minister wants to destroy the other place.

Existing criminal law already protects religious believers from criminal acts or incitement to commit such acts. We already have protection against religiously aggravated offences under legislation of 2001. It provided increased safeguards and much tougher sentences where a religiously provoked crime was committed. At the moment, the Crown Prosecution Service is monitoring 70 or 80 religiously aggravated cases, so it is working well. As I said, the laws to provide protection are already in place.

The new proposal is a step too far. It will prevent good organisations from fighting for human rights freedoms and religious freedoms around the world. I deal weekly, if not daily, with such matters, with the help of the great campaigner, Wilfred Wong. In Westminster Hall tomorrow, if I can catch the eye of whoever is in the Chair, I hope to speak up for Christians in Iraq. The Christian Institute does excellent work, dealing with cases of individuals who are mistreated because of their beliefs, but that clause in the Bill could prevent it from doing its job in the future.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): Will the hon. Gentleman please explain how a prohibition of religious hatred against people—equivalent to the present prohibition of inciting racial hatred—that protects Jews on the basis of their faith, would stop the quite proper activities that he is describing on the part of Christian organisations? I think that the hon. Gentleman is misled, and he has not explained how the consequences that he fears will be brought about under the Bill.

Bob Spink: The Christian Institute certainly believes that there are dangers in the Bill as drafted. It is worried, for example, about dealing with the actions that Muslims sometimes take against people who convert from Islam to Christianity, in case that is regarded as incitement to religious hatred. That is the point. If the Minister believes that the Bill should go further than the current protection that the law provides against incitement to violence or any criminal acts, perhaps she will explain why she believes that it is necessary.

Fiona Mactaggart: Present law protects people not only against incitement to violence, but against incitement to racial hatred. The courts decided that two religious groups, the Jews and Sikhs, were covered by that protection, though it has to be said that that law has not stopped some of our comedians from making pretty florid racist jokes, so the hon. Gentleman's charge that humour would be silenced seems ill founded. Currently, only Jews and Sikhs are protected against incitement to hatred on the basis of their faith; Christians and Muslims are not protected in that way, and they deserve the same protection.

Bob Spink: It is my belief that the current law provides protection to anyone in this country, whatever their race or religion, from incitement to commit criminal acts. Is that not a fact?

Fiona Mactaggart: For the last time, it is true that the law protects people against incitement to commit a criminal act, and it also provides further protection against incitement to racial hatred. In a secretly filmed documentary, the British National party leader, Nick Griffin, said that he could not say the things that he said about Muslims about black people, because that would contravene the law on incitement to racial hatred, but he could say them about Muslims, because that was not illegal.

Bob Spink: The Minister makes my case for me. She says that people are protected from incitement to criminal acts, so why do we need this law?

Fiona Mactaggart: Hating people on the basis of their race is not a criminal act; inciting someone to hate people on the basis of their race is.

Bob Spink: The Minister makes my point for me.

I shall move on. We must be free to tell the truth to expose human rights abuses, and others must have the right to criticise us for what we do and how we do it. In any event, the religious hatred proposal is technically flawed. Paragraph 3 of schedule 10 does not even define what constitutes a religious belief or a lack of religious belief. Everyone, from atheists to animists and from humanists to Hindus, has cause to worry about the uncertainty within the proposals. Only lawyers are celebrating the Bill, because they will benefit greatly in wealth and in work from its great uncertainties.

As Matthew Parris pointed out in The Times:

"Glenn Hoddle's remark that the disabled may be being punished for sin in a former life was silly, but should it be criminal? It's a point of view. A few hundred million adherents to reincarnationalist faiths hold it. May I not mock the fallacy of reincarnationism? The new law will lead to trouble and confusion. Leave it alone, Mr. Blunkett."

Chris Bryant: Is it not ironic that the same journalist argued that Buttiglione should not remain as a commissioner, because of his views? At one moment Matthew Parris wants tolerance; at another, he does not.

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman has made his point—no doubt he will meet Matthew Parris in the newspapers on that issue. Some people think that Matthew Parris should be locked up. I do not happen to think so, but surely he should not be at risk of being locked up for expressing his opinion about somebody's belief. Incidentally, Glenn Hoddle was today appointed the manager of Wolverhampton Wanderers, and we all wish him well.

Let us examine the Australian law on religious vilification, dating from 2001. On 9 November, The Times law page revealed that two Christian pastors were being prosecuted for criticising Islam by drawing attention to the teachings of the Koran and questioning Islam's compatibility with western democracy. Those pastors read out quotations from the Koran at a seminar, and were reported to the Islamic Council of Victoria, which took the case to court. The court sat for three days, and the case ran for almost eight months. Indeed, it may still be running—no doubt Matthew Parris will tell us tomorrow. On the back of that case, however, another similar case has been launched. That is, of course, nonsense, which we do not need in this country. We should not corrupt a good Bill with an ill-thought-out measure. The religious hatred provision should be dropped.

Finally, the Law Society's excellent briefing on the Queen's Speech states:

> "The Government's aim is to strengthen the link between the police and the community, increase the accountability and responsiveness of the police service and build the confidence and awareness of the community."

I agree with those words, but the trouble is that they are only words. To our cost, we know that the Government are all talk and no action, and it is by their actions that we shall know them. How will they act to improve the 999 call service, which has become a joke in many areas? When will they stop closing our police stations and making them part-time? In Castle Point we now have only two, part-time, police stations—one in Benfleet and one on Canvey Island. I want those to remain open, and open for longer if possible. Canvey Island police station was closed at one stage last year; I fought to get it reopened, with the help of the excellent Councillor Ray Howard, and we succeeded. We want to ensure that both police stations stay open.

In Castle Point we are lucky to have a very good police force with dedicated professional constables and officers and excellent leadership from Chief Superintendent John Mauger. Local detection rates are increasing; our local crime levels, having risen for some time, are falling; and our dedicated and tough antisocial behaviour order team has made a great start, with some 35 arrests in recent weeks. We now have in place six or so ASBOs, which have dramatically reduced street crime. I welcome the measures in the Bill to extend ASBO powers and to give triggers to local councillors, but we need to take much tougher action when ASBOs are breached if they are not to fall into disrepute. The Government must deal with that problem.

I congratulate our local police. They need more help, not less, but the Government gave them a rise of only a 3.75 per cent. this year, although they needed 5.75 per cent.—an additional £2 million—simply to stand still. They must get that if they are to make use of the powers in the Bill.

Mr. McWalter: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that although the current penalties for breaching ASBOs are quite severe, the probability of someone who does so having those penalties visited on them is too low? The problem is not the sentence, but the probability of its being applied.

Bob Spink: The hon. Gentleman speaks wisely; he is absolutely right. The courts are not taking breaches of ASBOs seriously enough. I can cite a specific case. A police team in my constituency did 120 hours' work to bring a case involving a very serious breach of an ASBO, but the person concerned got only 20 hours' community service. That is complete nonsense. ASBOs will be brought into disrepute if the courts do not take appropriate action.

Labour is targeting Castle Point for 4,000 more houses, but reducing our police funding in real terms. It is also targeting Castle Point as a seat that it wants to win in the general election. It will be judged, as I will, on actions, hard work and commitment to local people. I am very happy to submit myself to them, and I think that they will speak for me at the next election.

4.37 pm

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead) (Lab/Co-op): It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink), particularly since the vast majority of his speech was taken up with the virtues of the Bill. Given that he welcomes its overall drift, even though he takes exception to certain provisions—as, indeed, do I—I hope that he, as well as many of his hon. Friends, will vote for its Second Reading.

In some ways, the Bill seeks to combat a "Dixon of Dock Green" approach to policing and crime. Huge numbers of people in our society would find that approach amusing and easily avoided when they contemplate nefarious behaviour.

The Bill brings together several agencies in order to take serious crime really seriously. That is welcome. As we have heard, it includes provisions relating to people who have been caught up in illegal immigration and are effectively imprisoned in brothels. Having come from another country, they are forced to perform sexual acts for their miserable living.

I recently graduated from the police service parliamentary scheme, and during my time with it we carried out a joint raid on one such house. There was an extremely young girl there—she could only have been about 14—who had been taken from Thailand and placed in the house. When the police arrived, she was overcome with joy that she had been rescued from her desperate servitude. When she was told that she would be on a plane the very next morning and that she was to be reunited with her family, she was ecstatic. She cried tears of joy at being liberated from her miserable circumstances.

That was a joint operation between the immigration service and the police service, but I had a sense that it was partly a show being put on for me as a Member of Parliament. I felt that such joint operations were not conducted frequently enough, and that the barriers between the operational systems of the two services seemed to be sufficiently high that, although that particular success was welcome, such successes were not being achieved regularly enough.

The Bill tries to link the operations of all the different services. It also tries to attack the gangs involved in those activities and the financing operations that lie behind the gangs. The extension of provisions relating to the proceeds of crime is also an extremely welcome part of the Bill. I look forward to all those proposals receiving strong support.

I should like to add a footnote to an exchange that I had earlier with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) about clause 58. I queried whether, in her understanding, the clause would exempt journalists from the provisions on disclosure notices. I was worried that there was no explicit reference to journalists in the clause and, having taken other advice, I am still not clear about that. I know that the explanatory notes to the Bill say that the intention is to ensure that journalists cannot be subject to those processes, but I am not sure whether the wording of the Bill has quite achieved that purpose. If I am selected to serve on the Committee, I shall look forward to working out a way of making it more explicit that a clear exemption for journalists exists in this regard.

Like most hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), I remain as entirely unconvinced by the provisions governing incitement to religious hatred as I was when these matters last came before us. I voted against them at that time. I suppose that, if that debars me from serving on the Committee, I shall not have the opportunity to raise the issue at that stage, but I give notice to the Whips and the Minister that I fully intend to raise it on Report, if that is the earliest opportunity I have to do so.

A number of fundamental matters are at issue concerning the kind of country that we have and the kind of provisions that we make to manage the extraordinary diversity of views within it. People have suggested that we are simply extending to Muslims and Christians provision that is already available for Sikhs and Jews, but that is not what the Bill says. It says some specific things about those of some religion, or indeed none. Anybody expressing a creed is to be protected from other people inciting others to hatred of those people who are held to be professors of that creed.

A good thing about creeds—a bad thing about them, perhaps—is that people who say what they believe in have a positive agenda on their values, the kind of society they wish our society to be, the kind of person they want to be, the kind of families they think are the best structured and so on. They profess a range of positive things.

Let us consider certain aspects of a creed. For example, it is etched strongly into Britain that all people should have the right to develop and subscribe to whatever creed they want. The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) claimed that Labour Members have, apparently, no sense of history and he quoted a bit of history to illustrate his credentials. The truth is that the notion that everybody has the right to profess their creed is strongly etched into our constitution, courtesy of the work of John Locke in his essay "A Letter Concerning Toleration" and in "The Second Treatise of Civil Government" of 1689, which consolidated a view of our society that was put in place by the so-called Glorious Revolution.

Chris Bryant: If that was all established at such an early date, how come the Catholic emancipation Act did not happen until 1829?

Mr. McWalter: My hon. Friend raises a good point. Interestingly, even at that stage, "A Letter Concerning Toleration", which is in many ways a foundation of our society's view on what is to be accepted, stopped short of tolerating Catholics. It did so because although the principle behind Locke's thinking was that we must never seek to criminalise what someone thinks, we can criminalise what someone overtly does.

At that stage, as my hon. Friend knows, some held the strong view that those who went to a Catholic mass were showing deference to a foreign power. That foreign power was in conflict with the monarch. Hence, there was a sense in which someone who professed such a view might, by that act as opposed to what they thought, be deemed to be acting treasonably.

I have mentioned that a creed has a positive agenda, but most creeds also have not simply a set of positives—lights by which one might live one's life—but a theory about where darkness lies. That involves the things that are deemed by that creed to be opposed to it, odious or even worthy of there being visited on those who profess those beliefs a sentence of death, or perhaps eternal death, which is damnation. That is the dark side of creed.

Historically—I do not have to go to Darth Vader for my religions—if we consider the rise of Protestantism, we see that Calvinism professed many of the same positive aspects as Lutheranism. What was etched much more clearly into its fabric, however, was a theory about how odious, contemptible and disgusting the Catholic faith was. That was not merely in words in Calvinistic articles. As the hon. Member for Castle Point said, such beliefs can sometimes be corrosive of society, and Calvinism was constitutive of the society and character of Switzerland in the 16th century and later.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is making an interesting contribution to the debate. He talks about the dark side of creeds, but is he not really talking about the nature of tolerance? Tolerance is not indivisible. We exercise tolerance in the context of a wider range of ethical considerations. Of course we do not tolerate cruelty, wickedness or hatred. He is not talking about creeds so much as the nature of the human condition, in all its imperfection.

Mr. McWalter: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. First, there is a small distinction between toleration and tolerance. One of the things that got built into our system was toleration. That was saying not that every creed had the same value—clearly, some creeds had better value than others—but that we would at least not seek to gainsay the practices of those who profess other ideas.

The crucial point is that a kind of anodised version of religion characterises the Government's view both in this debate and the previous debate. That anodised view thinks only about religions in terms of the light side—in terms of what they enjoin positively and the extent to which families, cultures and people are bound together by that set of beliefs. That is why we want to tolerate different belief systems—people have the right to conduct their lives in that way. We must be vigilant, however, about the extent to which people sometimes profess creeds that express deep, vengeful and murderous intolerance. Sixteenth-century Calvinism was such a belief. Incidentally, I do not know the extent to which these remarks will be seen as negative by large numbers of my constituents. It was such a belief, however, and from what little I know about it now, it may still be.

One of the reasons why Calvinism was such a vengeful and murderous creed, and why its state wished to extirpate anyone who did not profess it, was that there had been a Catholic inquisition 40 years before. Calvinists therefore saw the people whom they were vilifying as destroying the lives of dissenters. Some might say that their extreme hostility to Catholicism, which is etched into Calvin's work, had the justification of those earlier events.

Within the notion of a creed, we have a right to be vigilant about whether there are people in our society who profess a creed that has a capacity for an intense negative and dark side.

I think that, as leaders of the nation, we owe it to the nation to be vigilant. We are the custodians of John Locke's views, although they were expressed imperfectly at the time. My right hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) was right about that. We are the custodians of that tradition, and it is right for us to be vigilant in ensuring that the beliefs people express do not go beyond the bounds of what is acceptable to society.

Mr. Hayes: The conflict, or at least contrast, between dark and light that the hon. Gentleman is describing lies at the heart of almost every major religion. Nearly every religion I can think of—although this may not be true of all of them—marks a journey from darkness to light, and redemption depends on that journey. Surely legislating against that would fly in the face of all the principal faiths in the country.

Mr. McWalter: I am not suggesting that we should legislate against it. I am saying that it is right for a society to be vigilant—in its education system, for instance—about making people aware of some of the beliefs to which they subscribe. If people emerge from our education system with an anodised version of religion, that may not do the history of religion much justice. Ideas, creeds and beliefs are forces for good, for integration and the structuring of decent life, but they can also be forces of destruction, capable of exerting pressure on people to behave in all sorts of unacceptable ways.

I have a particular reason for raising this issue: 3 per cent. of my constituents are Muslim. I have met them on the doorstep and elsewhere, and I am particularly concerned about some of the younger adherents to their creed—and, indeed, younger adherents to other creeds as well. They often express their views in a particularly harsh and stark way. Perhaps as we get older we start to become more mellow, and less inclined to see those who are not with us as being against us; but some of the views expressed by some of my more excitable Muslim constituents give me cause for concern. Opinions on the status of heretics and, in particular, the status of apostates who turn against the religion into which they were born are expressed very crudely by some younger Muslims, and could easily get them into trouble. I agree with the Islamic Human Rights Commission, which fears that their religion could well be used against Muslim communities. Muslim representatives themselves express contrasting views, but the evidence I have seen strongly suggests that that could happen.

Many other people also profess their beliefs very stridently. It is much easier to hear about what and whom they dislike and hate than about what their positive message might be. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle that the proposal in the Bill is well-intentioned, that we all know that it would not be there if the British National party had not decided to attack Muslims rather than, say, people who are black. That is the origin of this measure, which will factor in this anodised version of religion. If there are still Calvinists of the sort that I mentioned, or even Torquemada Catholics, it will be impossible for us to say, "Those people have a creed that is hateful, and we must do what we can to ensure that it is extinguished."

Andrew Selous: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we currently have a law that protects Muslims, but not one that protects Islam? The two are different.

Mr. McWalter: Members of any religion are much more likely to take offence than those who hold less strong views. Most people in our society are fairly ignorant of such matters, myself included. I do not know enough about Sikhism to be able to delineate its dark side. But through education, we perhaps manage to convince all people that they should try to look honestly at their beliefs, reflect on them and see whether they have a tendency to conduce to bad behaviour in certain circumstances in a multiracial, multi-religious society. That is one of our society's values, and we bring it to those of different religious persuasions.

It is unlikely that the Government will rein back on this provision, but I reiterate what I said at the beginning of this short speech— [Interruption.] It is not so short now. This is a good Bill that contains lots of valuable things, but schedule 10 is not of value and I hope that the Government will resile from pushing it through on Report and Third Reading.

5.2 pm

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): On listening to the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) go on at length about the dark side, it struck me that the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) perhaps had a point in mentioning the Jedi knights. He will doubtless now have a huge mailbag from obsessive science fiction fans, explaining the true place of Darth Vader in the Jedi religion. Fortunately or otherwise, the part of the Bill in question does not apply to Scotland, so I shall quietly side-step this issue, leave it to the Scottish Parliament to deal with its own version of that provision, and address instead the nitty-gritty issues relating to the Serious Organised Crime Agency.

[Mr. Michael Weir]

I should say at the outset that we in the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru acknowledge that there is merit in the idea of cross-border co-operation in dealing with serious organised crime. We are not opposed to the Bill and we recognise the need for an organisation such as SOCA, but we have some serious reservations about the detail and, so far as the SNP is concerned, particular aspects relating to Scotland. SOCA's creation is a further indication of a move away from crime fighting on the ground and towards a more intelligence-led system. The hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead spoke of the "Dixon of Dock Green" approach, but there is a balance to be struck between such a traditional approach and a completely technological one. I fully appreciate that a great deal of intelligence information is required to deal with organised crime successfully, but it is also essential to have people on the ground.

SOCA will deal with many of the aspects of organised crime previously dealt with by Customs and Excise, which has moved toward intelligence-led operations. The Scottish Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, examined the operation of the Customs service in Scotland, and it is fair to say that we were less than impressed with the impact of this intelligence-led service. Many of our smaller ports do not have adequate Customs cover, and there is some evidence that many of those involved in the drugs trade regard the smaller ports as an easy route to getting illegal drugs into the UK. I suspect that that is increasingly true of people smuggling and other organised crime activities.

I refer the Under-Secretary to the final paragraph of the fourth report by the Scottish Affairs Committee:

"We support an intelligence-led Customs service, but not at the expense of all else. Accordingly, we recommend that HMCE should seek to supplement its approach to law enforcement in Scotland by increasing the number of occasions on which staff are on duty at strategic points. An important weapon in the fight against contraband should involve the strategy of anticipating likely avenues which traffickers might seek to explore next and putting into place appropriate procedures to deter them. We believe that prevention is better than cure. A frequent high profile Customs presence should be apparent in parts of Scotland where discernible risks of smuggling activity can be demonstrated."

Those concerns remain, and they probably apply to other parts of the UK. Indeed, the hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) made a similar point about his constituency. If SOCA is to be truly successful in defeating trafficking and other obnoxious organised crime, it must have sufficient officers on the ground throughout the UK, and should not rely entirely on remote intelligence. This morning, Sir Stephen Lander, the designated head of SOCA, noted on the "Today" programme that much organised crime in the UK originates abroad, so points of entry into the UK would be of essential interest to the agency. At many smaller ports, however, there is not even a fisheries protection officer, let alone a representative from Customs and Excise, so many of them could be used as points of entry for the import of illegal substances and for other obnoxious trades.

The Public and Commercial Services Union has expressed concern about the resourcing of SOCA, as there appears to be little new money to set up the agency, which is expected to be cost-neutral in its first two years. Are cuts in other crime fighting agencies inevitable if it is to be fully financed? The concern expressed by the Scottish Affairs Committee comes into even sharper focus, as there is likely to be a reduction in the provision for many remote and rural areas. If smaller-scale drug smuggling is not deemed a sufficiently serious problem, it could be overlooked. SOCA's objective should be to stop the drugs trade and other such activities, not shift the focus on to larger operators.

In preparing for our debate, I asked a parliamentary question to ascertain how many Customs officers were employed in Scotland. I was told:

"HM Customs and Excise has 85 Law Enforcement investigation staff based in Scotland including two officers seconded to the Crown Office, Financial Crime Unit and Civil Recovery Unit to support the Lord Advocate's Proceeds of Crime Act strategy."—[Official Report, 30 November 2004; Vol. 428, c. 89W.]

I would be grateful if the Minister clarified SOCA's intentions regarding the number of staff to be based in Scotland. Presumably, some Customs officers would be transferred or seconded, but how many officers will undertake other SOCA duties in Scotland?

We are concerned about the annual plan and strategic priorities that are to be set by the Home Secretary. Under the Bill, he is required to consult Scottish Ministers, but it is not clear what will happen if they disagree. Scottish Ministers do not have the power to veto the way in which the agency operates in Scotland. Indeed, there is confusion about the Home Secretary's role in relation to the operation of SOCA in Scotland. Under clauses 8 and 9, which deal with the annual plan and strategic priorities, he must consult, but under clause 24, which deals with the power to give direction to a police authority, he must secure the agreement of Scottish Ministers. If the Home Secretary can set SOCA's priorities, effectively he has the power to give direction to police authorities, irrespective of clause 24. Will the Under-Secretary clarify that that is the case, and that by using those powers the Home Secretary will have the right to direct the operation of police in Scotland, at least within the ambit of SOCA's investigations? If that interpretation is correct, it is unacceptable and I shall seek a strengthening of the power of the Scottish Minister so that there is more than consultation. As perhaps envisaged in clause 24, there should be agreement on the operation of SOCA in Scotland, as crime is a devolved matter. I am surprised that Scottish Ministers did not insist on that. The same applies to the code of practice in clause 11, where again there is only a requirement to consult.

On the Bill more generally, there appears to be a lack of a clear definition of serious organised crime. The original White Paper provided a definition, albeit a somewhat woolly one. It could be argued that one would know serious organised crime when one saw it, but that might not necessarily be so, especially at the outset of an investigation. There seems to be no brake on what the Home Secretary decides is serious organised crime. There has already been discussion today about Travellers, for example. One hon. Member spoke about computer viruses, which may be organised crime if used, for example, to undermine computer systems for the purpose of stealing money, although that may not be the work of a single hacker. Another hon. Member assumed that paedophilia would not be within the scope of the Bill, but the activities of such rings—on the internet, for example—could be defined as serious organised crime. Some effort must be made to decide what serious organised crime is.

Given the absence of a definition and the fact that the Home Secretary can determine priorities, there is no long-term plan for the agency. That is fundamental to dealing with serious organised crime, however it is eventually defined. As the Bill is drafted, the agency could be subject to changing political priorities as Governments change.

From a Scottish perspective, the greatest concern relates to operational matters in clauses 23 to 25. Clauses 24 and 25 in particular cause us severe problems, as they relate to officers being seconded from police forces to SOCA, and vice versa. The most serious difficulty is that a civilian member of SOCA with no training in or understanding of Scots law and procedure could act with the powers of a police constable in Scotland. That raises serious questions not only about undermining police forces, but about the potentially disastrous consequences of not acting in accordance with Scots law or procedure, which could allow those caught in a SOCA investigation to get off on a technicality.

I raised the matter earlier in an intervention, but in his usual manner the Home Secretary brushed it off as not being of any great importance. He mentioned that officers had operated successfully with the French authorities on immigration. That may well be true, but I am sure they did not act independently of the French authorities on French soil, which effectively could happen in the agency. It is not a trivial or purely legalistic point. If the proper procedures are not carried out, there could be serious consequences for the whole investigation. After the investigation and charge stage, the Lord Advocate and the Procurator Fiscal Service in Scotland take over the case and it would go through the Scottish procedure thereafter, so there is the potential for huge difficulty.

It would be unacceptable if SOCA could authorise any officer in its employment to operate with the powers of a police constable in Scotland without any knowledge of the difference between English and Scots law and procedure. I urge the Minister to reconsider the provision and ensure that proper training is provided. I accept that it might be necessary for a SOCA officer from south of the border to be seconded to an investigation in Scotland, but only with proper training.

Interestingly, the Police Federation of England and Wales also raised concerns about the clause, from the opposite point of view, arguing that if a police officer transfers to SOCA, he could lose his status as an officer of the Crown. That problem has also been raised before, and deserves more consideration.

The Law Society of Scotland has raised another point in relation to clause 46, which deals with the assault and obstruction of SOCA officers. There appears to be a discrepancy that could result in there being a variation in the maximum sentence for that crime. The society says that the maximum sentence that can be imposed in Scotland under the clause is 12 months in prison, but that the maximum for the analogous crime under section 41 of the Police (Scotland) Act 2002 is nine months.

The maximum sentence possible for assaulting police officers or other emergency workers under the new Emergency Workers (Scotland) Bill, which is currently before the Scottish Parliament, is also nine months. It would seem illogical to have different sentences for the same crime. I appreciate that the Scottish Parliament might want to consider increasing the maximum sentence that it allows, rather than the other way around, and that that would probably be the best way to deal with the problem.

As the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) noted earlier, the PCS union has raised concerns about the resources available to SOCA to employ its own staff at competitive terms and conditions. If staff are to be seconded from other departments on better terms and conditions than those available to full-time SOCA staff—and given that staff may be coming from various agencies, there is a clear danger that that might happen—and if they are doing the same work, that could create a two-tier work force and all the resentment and problems that go with that. If SOCA is to be the success that we all want it to be, it must be properly resourced to avoid those problems.

In conclusion, I repeat that we support SOCA in principle and can see the logic behind it. It will have an important part to play in dealing with organised crime which, by its very nature, tends to be cross-border. However, there are serious concerns about the aspects of the Bill that I have mentioned. I hope that the Minister will take some of them on board. We do not oppose the measure and hope to see SOCA in operation, but we hope that Scots law and procedure are properly protected in the final version of the Bill.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): This has been a fascinating debate. I feel that I have never learned so much in a speech, short or long, as I did when I listened to the contribution about the dark side from my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter).

I welcome the Bill, in the broadest sense. I suspect that it contains many provisions on which most hon. Members will be able to agree when the time comes to vote. I shall say something about two particular measures, and then touch on the issue that has exercised so many contributors to the debate this afternoon—the incitement to religious hatred.

First, I welcome the provisions in respect of uninsured drivers and the powers that the police will have to take their cars away. Clause 131 amends the Road Traffic Act 1988. On June 10, I parked my car in Clydach vale while I waited to drive people to the polling station. Unfortunately, somebody drove into the side of my car. I was stationary at the time and it took three months before we discovered that the other driver was uninsured. I am therefore as aware as anyone else of the hassle that is caused to innocent drivers, and of the problems that arise in terms of increased premiums in subsequent years. The problem of uninsured drivers affects an increasing number of people, and the Bill will go some way to helping with that.However, in none of the Bills presented by the Government this autumn is there any measure to ensure that cars are insured. That problem will remain as long as we ensure only that a car is insured on the single day that it takes to tax it. I hope that the Government will bear in mind the campaign undertaken by many hon. Members to ensure that all cars are insured.

Some redrafting may be required, however. According to clause 131, the constable is allowed to stop a car and demand insurance details under section 165 of the Road Traffic Act 1988. However, clause 131(5) states:

"If the constable is unable to seize the vehicle immediately because the person driving the vehicle has failed to stop as requested or has driven off, he may seize it at any time within the period of 24 hours beginning with the time at which the conditions in subsection (1) or (2) are first met."

My hon. Friend the Minister may wish to reflect that it might be difficult for a police constable to ask the driver of a car for the required information if the car has not stopped. It may be necessary to redraft that provision. In any event, I welcome the intent.

I also welcome the provisions on fireworks, which will tighten up legislation on which we started work last year. I know that many of my constituents have been relieved that this year has been a better year than last in terms of the number of youngsters carrying fireworks around and of fireworks being thrown in the streets, because we have tightened up the law on the sale of fireworks. However, clause 106 is welcome because it will give the police power to stop and search under-18s who might be in possession of a firework in a public place, as well as adults who are not firework professionals but who might be carrying category 4 fireworks, which are demonstration fireworks and—to all intents and purposes—are not much different from a bomb. That provision is welcome and I know that my constituents will be grateful.

While listening to some of the debate this afternoon on the provisions on incitement to religious hatred, I have felt that some of the arguments posed have been overstated and hyperbolic. Some hon. Members have created Aunt Sallies, suggesting that the legislation will do something that it patently is not intended to do nor has any likelihood of doing. It is a question of righting a simple injustice. Public order legislation already provides for the prevention of incitement to racial hatred. As has already been explained this afternoon, the courts have determined that that applies to Jews and Sikhs, for whom their ethnicity and their faith are intimately connected. In fact, that is true for many people of many different faiths. Many of those who are brought up as Catholics remain cultural Catholics whether they maintain that faith or renounce it. Even those who have become "notorious apostates", in the words of the Catholic Church, are none the less Catholics. Many people in Northern Ireland and other areas of the country with a serious sectarian divide will know that it is difficult to differentiate somebody's faith from their personal circumstances.

Those who have argued this afternoon that faith is always a choice are wrong both in fact and in Christian doctrine, which has always described faith as a gift, not a choice. The other reason it is important to right the injustice—that Jews, Sikhs and others are protected from hatred, but Muslims are not—is because there is significant Islamophobia in this land.

Mr. McWalter: On the theological point that my hon. Friend has raised, it should be borne in mind that faith is a gift offered that one has the right to reject or accept through the exercise of free will. It is still a choice.

Chris Bryant: My hon. Friend entices me into an area of theological debate in which the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Goodman) and others might wish to participate. We might talk about prevenient grace and double predestination, to which my hon. Friend effectively referred when he mentioned Calvinism. However, now is probably not the time to debate such issues as you might call me to order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Islamophobia is a serious issue that affects many communities, not only those with a large congregation of Muslims, in cities such as Bradford or in the east end of London, but those with small numbers of Muslims. Where there are only two or three Muslims in a community, they can often feel far more isolated and can be subject to quite sustained personal vilification and harassment on the basis partly of their colour, but often, too, of their religion. This country should not countenance that. Far from the accusation that the clause will be intolerant towards religious expression, I believe it to be a statement of Britain's inclusiveness and its acceptance and toleration of different faiths.

Islamophobia is sometimes deliberate and sometimes casual. It is a great shame that so few people in this country understand the basic tenets of Islam. Remarkably few of us, even in the House, properly understand what jihad is. We completely fail to understand it when we describe it as a crusade; the concept is very different from that.

It is a shame that most religious studies courses in our universities are entirely confessional and vocational, for all sorts of historical reasons. I am an external adviser for the Oxford MA degree in theology and it saddens me that, for that degree, although one can study many of the Calvinist teachers of the 18th, 19th and 20th centuries, one is still unable to study many of the great Jewish or Islamic teachers. Only when we can turn that around will we have a chance of understanding Islam properly and of binding that community fully into the heart of British society.

We need to make a move because the existing loophole has been regularly and deliberately used by those who want to foster racial and religious unrest—those who dislike people who do not fit into their white perception of how Britain should be. I am talking primarily of the British National party but people in other organisations have deliberately used the loophole, too. Earlier, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), referred to a BBC television programme that showed how the BNP are doing so.

Violence of any kind towards any person, whatever their religion, is obviously wrong. Setting fire to people's homes, attacking synagogues, gurdwaras or mosques, sending horrible literature or putting excrement through people's front doors because of their race or religion is wrong and it is already covered by the law. However, while we allow a culture of hatred towards different religions to exist in this country, we enable that violence to grow in society. That is the menace I want to prevent by bringing the clause into law.

Some false arguments have been made this afternoon. We have heard much of the argument that the clause will harm freedom of religious expression, yet half the time the piece of religious expression that people seem to want to have the freedom to exercise is the freedom to hate other people. That is so distant from my understanding of any religion that I have come across that I find it rather difficult to comprehend.

As we heard when we debated this matter the first time around in 2001, there is an argument that people should have the freedom to make the Westminster confession. The Westminster confession is robust in its attack on the Roman Catholic Church or the Catholic Church—or the whore of Babylon as it is referred to in some of the documentation that was produced at the time. I agree that people should have the right to make the Westminster confession. They should have a perfect right to criticise the views of the Pope and to disagree with Cardinal Ratzinger and the congregation for the doctrine of the faith. There are large areas of theological dispute that I could have with them, but it is not a limit to freedom of expression to say that one should not incite people to hate Catholics.

Similarly, in the 19th century, when Christmas trees came into fashion in this country, many Calvinists believed that they were a terrible thing and that Britain was going back to its pagan roots as well as adopting Catholic symbols because people were celebrating Christmas. Some people may argue forcefully that all such celebration is wrong, which is fine. What is unacceptable is then to argue that those people who have Christmas trees in their windows or who celebrate Christmas are lesser people in society than anyone else and to foster hatred against those people, because out of hatred comes violence. I believe that it is perfectly possible in law to draw a distinction between incitement to religious hatred and forcefully holding a different theological position.

Another argument that has been advanced this afternoon—by some hon. Members of considerable standing in the House, so I am slightly surprised—is that there is no need to prove the intent to incite religious hatred and that that goes a step further than the Public Order Act 1986. In fact, that Act contains no provision to prove intent to incite racial hatred. The provision relates to intent, to provoking a breach of the peace or to the likelihood of such a breach of the peace being created. There is an exact parallel with incitement to religious hatred.

The shadow Home Secretary said in a rather curious speech, which ended extremely abruptly, that the United Kingdom had always been tolerant of other religions. That is profoundly untrue. We do not need to take a great lesson in the religious history of the United Kingdom to know that the Jews in York and in many other parts of this country, such as the east end of London, have suffered serious attacks throughout the centuries. The United State of America was founded in large measure on the back of religious dissidents who left this country because they found it intolerant.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: Nevertheless, the hon. Gentleman does my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) an injustice in that he was making the point that, unlike most European countries that sadly experienced conflict through religious wars, this country has generally avoided them.

Chris Bryant: This country has avoided religious wars, but we are straying again into the area of history. Many Catholics left this country at one point because they were fearful for their lives and many Protestants left when there was a change of dispensation—hence, not so much the vicar of Dibley, but the vicar of Bray, who changed his view on bishops according to whichever King came to power.

Mr. Mitchell: Nevertheless, the important point and the flaw in the hon. Gentleman's argument is that, although the vicar of Bray may have changed his religion, he did not lose his head.

Chris Bryant: There seemed to be a slight sigh in the House then and there is a slight sigh in my heart at being enticed further down that route, although I admit that I started it off.

Mr. Heath: I shall entice the hon. Gentleman down a different route. He is making an interesting speech in defence of the Home Secretary's proposals and many hon. Members share a lot of the concerns that he has expressed, but we still retain a nervousness about the way that the law will work in practice. I wonder whether he will comment on something. I do not expect a plethora of prosecutions because they must be agreed by the Attorney-General. Indeed, there have been few prosecutions for incitement to racial hatred. However, there will be an awful lot of complaints to the police and investigating authorities about people who are simply exercising their right to profess their faith. That will cause a great deal of unhappiness, discomfort and useless activity by Christian groups and many others.

Chris Bryant: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for moving me on to a different tack. I suspect that there will be remarkably few complaints, unless some of the hon. Members who spoke today are suddenly going to declare themselves. Once the few vexatious cases that are brought in the first months are dealt with robustly, we will have seen off the problem. I honestly do not believe that the measure is likely to produce a plethora of complaints over a long time. In fact, the gain to be had from being able to say to the British Muslim community that it is considered to be a resident part of our community, with the same protections under the law as other racial and faith groups, represents a significant benefit to all our society.

I am aware that Rowan Atkinson has advanced a counter-argument. I think he once played the Bishop of Bath and Wells in "Blackadder", and he has always been interested in religion as a ripe source of comedy. I remember watching the hilarious moment when many

[Chris Bryant]

Muslims were shown bowing down to pray and someone said, "The Ayatollah Khomeini has lost his contact lens." Rowan Atkinson said yesterday that it was important that he should not be prevented from cracking that kind of joke. Similarly, I remember Robert Runcie and David Jenkins being heartily lampooned in "Spitting Image". I knew David Jenkins at the time, and he enormously enjoyed the idea of having achieved such prominence. It may be that Anglicans are used to being lampooned because we have had centuries of it.

The truth of the matter is that I do not believe for a single instance that anybody is likely to use the Bill to prevent comedians from cracking decent jokes or from satirising, lampooning or holding up for jolly abuse clerics of any particular religion. The spiritual pride and hubris shown by any cleric who chose to use the Bill to prevent the mickey being taken out of him would be his undoing. The argument of those who think that we will lose the ability to satirise religion is overblown and misplaced. For that matter, I do not believe that theological disputes will come to an end just because we have instituted a law on incitement to religious hatred.

Mr. McWalter: If I understand my hon. Friend correctly, he is saying that the law will justify a significant number of actions, but they will not happen in practice, so it is all right. Is that it?

Chris Bryant: No. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me an opportunity to clarify my argument, which is that there is an injustice in the law. Many groups in society are protected from incitement to hatred against them, but those who are not include those of particular religions, most notably those who subscribe to the Islamic faith. They should have that injustice seen to in law. I am almost certain that some cases will be vexatious, but there will not be many of them. Once they have been dealt with robustly by the Attorney-General, it is unlikely that such vexatious cases will be brought again. If there is real incitement to religious hatred, however, the law should be used to tackle the problem, not least because Islamophobia is rife. It leads to an increasing sense of danger for many young Muslims in particular, and we should give them every protection that the law can afford.

The version of religion that I have heard today is not the version that I have grown used to, neither through my schooling in Cheltenham nor, for that matter, through my theological training at Oxford. I do not believe that all religions hold as their fundamental tenet that they are unique. Indeed, many religions expressly declare that there is truth in other religions. All three of the main world religions declare that the others have some truth in them.

It reminds me of the classic story of the Welshman from the valleys who is lost on a desert island. When he is rescued, having been there for 10 years, his rescuer says, "I see you have built two chapels. I can understand why you have built one chapel, but why build two?". The Welshman responds by saying, "It is simple. That is the chapel I go to; and that is the chapel I don't go to." It is all too easy, after the crusades and centuries of battles between different expressions of faith, to subscribe to the view that every religion is always a problem in society because it preaches hatred. I do not subscribe to the tenets of the dark side, which my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead mentioned earlier, and I do not believe that we should be encapsulating in law what the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) said earlier—that he reserved his right as a Christian to hate other people.

My final point to Ministers is that although the Bill is a good measure, we could make it better by abolishing the blasphemy laws and, for that matter, by removing the Church of England's privileges in terms of its seats on the Bishops' Bench in the House of Lords.

5.41 pm

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): First, I apologise for not having been in my place to hear the conclusion of the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis). It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), who made one of his typically robust defences of Government policy to the House. I would also like to highlight the speech of the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter). In characteristically thoughtful style and with philosophical and historical sweep, he drew attention to the issues surrounding clause 119 and schedule 10, to which I too want to speak. I suspect that when he hears my speech, he may find some pale echoes of his own thoughts.

There is much in the Bill to agree with and support. The Home Secretary described it in his peroration as a practical Bill with practical applications. Most of the Bill might meet that stricture, but I am not entirely sure that clause 119 does. I do not believe that that clause and its associated schedule are practical in their application in tackling the problem that the Home Secretary outlined.

I shall suggest a few reasons why I believe that clause 119 will not work. First, there is a great deal of confusion between race and religion. The Bill seeks to draw together religious and racial hatred in the context of the legislation that first brought the crime of inciting racial hatred into force in 1986. It is right that people of every race should receive special protection from discrimination and hatred. There comes a point, however, when certain religious groups—we have talked about the Jews and Sikhs—are regarded in case law as being ethnic groups in their own right. They receive protection, as was made clear in a particular legal case, not necessarily on account of their religion, but because of their ethnic group.

I believe that we should distinguish between people's race and their religion. To exaggerate to make a point, a person's religion is, on the whole, a matter of choice, conscience or conversion, whereas a person's race is not. Speaking as a cradle Catholic, I can happily say that there may be cultural or family reasons why someone embraces a faith, and that those reasons may change over time in accordance with the exercise of conscience, but religion remains largely a matter of choice. As the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead said, some people reject the gift that is offered to them through their lives.

whereas some would argue, "Once a Catholic, always a Catholic"—I am not convinced that that is necessarily so, although in my case it may be.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): The hon. Gentleman has made an interesting point. Logically, is he not arguing that somebody who accepts one faith rather than another should accept a lesser degree of protection in law? I do not think that that should be the case.

Mr. Hoban: Because certain ethnic groups are categorised in relation to their religion, there is an imbalance in the protection that they receive, which is an important issue to consider and bear in mind. My concern is that the Bill will be impractical to enforce, which will not help the current situation in which people express views hostile to a range of religions. There is an imbalance in the situation, and the hon. Gentleman is right to highlight it. However, I am not sure whether the Bill will resolve that imbalance to the satisfaction of people who want to express a view, or no view at all, on religious matters.

The second problem with the provision is the definition of religion. The Bill defines religious hatred as "hatred against a group of persons defined by reference to religious belief or lack of religious belief."

It does not protect religion per se, and it does not extend the powers of the law of blasphemy. It protects people because they subscribe to a religious belief, rather than religious belief itself.

It will fall to the courts to decide whether a religion or belief falls within the definition in the Bill. That is drawn widely and, as the explanatory notes state, it includes:

"Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Judaism, Buddhism, Sikhism, Rastafarianism", a range of branches within those religions, and groups defined by a lack of religious belief. There is a concern that that protection will extend to groups that express dangerous views.

I do not know how many hon. Members heard the exchange on the "Today" programme on Friday morning between the representative of a group called Catalyst, which helps people who have joined cults and who wish to leave, and a representative of an organisation called The Family, which was known as the Children of God a few years ago. The representative from Catalyst argued that some cults are dangerous, because they create problems between people and their families and because of some of the views that they express.

If one starts to go down the route of accepting cults as religions, organisations such as Catalyst may find it difficult to do their work challenging cults' beliefs and the practices that they adopt in propagating those beliefs. The issue is one of definition, and the courts will have to decide an issue—what religion actually is—that philosophers have failed to resolve over centuries. We may provide protection that should not be extended to such groups, particularly when they express dangerous views.

Religion is a matter for debate and discussion—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Rhondda is itching to intervene.

Chris Bryant: I used to be a youth officer for the diocese of Peterborough, where we often dealt with youngsters who had been bruised and abused by cults in Northamptonshire. I wholly agree with the hon. Gentleman that we should not advance protection for many of the things that cults may want to do. However, to incite religious hatred against people who subscribe to a particular set of religious views is surely always wrong.

Mr. Hoban: I will address that point in a second, because I want to discuss the dividing line between religious expression, freedom and activity, and actions that might lead to incitement of religious hatred, which is the third issue about which I am concerned.

Religion is a matter for debate and discussion. A wide range of activities would constitute religious activity. Where is the line drawn in debate and discussion between free expression, fair comment, causing offence—although it would not fall within the scope of the Bill's offence of inciting religious hatred—and statements that might lead to, or be deemed to lead to, inciting religious hatred? The explanatory notes define what hatred is not—

"The offences will not encompass material that just stirs up ridicule or prejudice or causes offence"— but do not go on to define what it is.

Let me give an example of where the issue may arise. As a practising Catholic, I am called upon to bear witness to Christ through my adherence to the values set out in the Gospel. I do not think that that is controversial or would in any way incite religious hatred. But I am also called upon to be a missionary—to evangelise by taking the Church's message out to others. If I seek to engage somebody in a debate about my faith, where do I draw the line between legitimate discussion and debate, and what some may deem an incitement to hatred? If there was a chance of converting somebody to my faith, I would stress the positive, or light, side of religion, to echo the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead. I do not believe that I would be inciting anyone to religious hatred. If I go further than that by emphasising the negative in other faiths instead of the positive in my own, where does that take me? Where does one draw the line between discussing the negative aspects of other faiths and inciting religious hatred? I might not intend to incite hatred, but my words could be interpreted in that way.

That is where the grey area starts to appear. What activities are to be defined as inciting religious hatred or deemed possibly to be doing so? It is difficult to define what constitutes an offence under the Bill. Different people might draw in different places the very fine line between emphasising the negative aspects of somebody else's faith and moving towards inciting religious hatred.

Let me make a more practical, less theoretical point that echoes remarks made by the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead. Some people hold the view that Catholics' loyalty to the state and to the country is compromised by their need to follow the Church's teachings, set in Rome, and that where conflicts arise between the Church's teachings and our country's accepted morality, we are meant to follow the views of Rome because they take precedence. One might characterise that as, "Rome's orders are to be followed." Most reasonable people would agree that that is a matter of religious belief and a matter for vigorous debate.

What happens if one goes beyond the theological argument about to whom one owes obedience, to discuss the consequences of those beliefs for the actions of Catholics? The Bill is to do with inciting religious hatred against people who are defined by their religion. What happens if one starts to criticise the loyalty of Catholics to the state or to the Government? What happens if the Catholic Church decides that a war that the British Government seek to prosecute is not a just war?

Chris Bryant: Like Iraq.

Mr. Hoban: In some cases, the Catholic Church gave people the opportunity to exercise their own consciences to decide whether the war in Iraq was just.

If a soldier was serving in the armed forces when the Catholic Church had said that the war was unjust and the soldier should not be fighting in it, what would happen if his colleagues started to question his loyalty, commitment, dedication and willingness to carry out orders? The Minister has suggested that that would not be inciting hatred, but it would not need to provoke hatred or to have any physical manifestation to be interpreted by some people as inciting hatred.

The further we go into this religious debate, the more strident and vitriolic the argument becomes, and the more the loyalty of people serving Queen and country is questioned, for example, the closer we get to what might be deemed a grey area. The Bill is not clear about exactly what constitutes incitement to religious hatred. Could its provisions actually set one soldier or sailor against another? We also need to be aware that if they were applied to certain groups of people engaged in religious activity, those people might be deemed to have fulfilled some of its criteria. The Bill is very quiet about what constitutes hatred. People might think that this is somewhat fanciful, but it is not that long since we heard the slogan, "Home rule is Rome rule," and some of those sentiments might still be around today.

There is also the issue of intent. In the context of the existing offence of incitement to racial hatred, "Halsbury's Law Direct" says:

> "It is merely required that the defendant should intend to stir up racial hatred by his conduct or that such hatred is likely, having regard to the circumstance, to be stirred up thereby (whether or not the defendant realised this would be likely)".

So someone could, for example, create an art work that they felt was a powerful polemic against religion, but they could be caught under the provisions of the Bill if that art work were deemed by others to incite religious hatred, even if there had been no intention to do so.

There are many grey areas involved in trying to determine how the provisions should be applied to religious activity. There is also a broader point, however. Where does this leave freedom of speech? How do we reconcile freedom of expression with laws that prevent incitement to religious hatred? Religion is a legitimate area for public debate. My concern is that, consciously or unconsciously, legislation of this nature would curb the freedom of speech. The threat of being prosecuted, of vexatious litigation or of the police being summoned to investigate a religious meeting or the activities at a stall where religious literature was being handed out, for example, could be enough to make people think again, and stop them undertaking the legitimate expression of their views.

The Home Secretary referred to the Salman Rushdie test: would Salman Rushdie's book be banned under the terms of the Bill? He was clear that it would not. However, one man's free speech might be another man's legitimate debate, or another's incitement to religious hatred. This is a matter of perception and perspective. Not everyone sees these issues from the same liberal perspective that judges them on their merits and sees them as intellectual arguments. Certain writing, for example, might be intended to provoke and stimulate debate, or even to cause offence. However, we do not all share the common starting point of that liberal perspective, and some people will seek to use this law to curb freedom of expression. Although a number of Church groups have supported this legislation, other voices have been raised in opposition to it, expressing concern about its impact on freedom of expression.

This is an important and sensitive issue that we need to consider carefully. We cannot divorce it from existing legislation on religiously aggravated crimes in terms of blasphemy. We ought to consider such legislation separately rather than as an add-on to an important Bill, so that we could have proper and full debate—not just on the Floor of the House but in Committee—on how to give proper protection both to religion and to freedom of expression.

Clause 119 and schedule 10 will not help to promote that free religious debate. I believe that they will be used to curb freedom of speech and to undermine much of what is already said in this country that represents matters of religious debate, about religions and creeds of all types.

6.1 pm

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome this wide-ranging Bill. I must admit that even when I realised how wide-ranging it is, I did not think that the debate on it would encompass issues so far afield as 16th-century Calvinists and 21st-century Jedi warriors, but so be it.

It is perhaps unfortunate that much of the debate has concentrated on the one major contentious issue, although that is the nature of debate. Before I make my contribution on that issue, I shall draw out other aspects of the Bill that will be enormously welcome. My first thought on reading the Bill was that it contains a huge range of measures. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), who led for the Opposition, commented that there are strategic elements and a whole lot that has just been thrown in. However, all the provisions have a commonality of aim.

The Bill is designed to put the law, those who support it and law-abiding citizens one step ahead of the criminals so that their values prevail over those of the criminal. The Home Secretary, when introducing the Bill, commented on the effectiveness of many criminals as capitalists. When I consider the ingenuity of major criminals, and indeed of some of the most antisocial young people causing havoc on local streets, I cannot but feel that we and they would all be immeasurably better off if they only turned their effort to socially productive purposes. In many ways, the legislation is designed to make their preferences and preferred lifestyles more difficult to achieve and perhaps to give them and society a greater incentive to abide by the law.

The Bill will change the balance of advantage of behaviour in favour of the law-abiding citizen. It might not seem obvious why one piece of legislation should deal with a strategic organisation and the collection of strategic information, which are designed to curb the activities of the super-gangs, drug smugglers and people smugglers, while also giving local community support officers and local legislative bodies the right to combat localised crime in the form of antisocial behaviour, but there is a common theme that is designed to reinforce the Bill's ultimate objective.

This Bill is about giving confidence in the law. Every time a crime goes unsolved and every time a person indulges in antisocial behaviour but is not apprehended, it reflects badly on the law, law agencies and public agencies, and reinforces the intent of those who want to disregard them.

I want to single out one or two elements in the Bill that are worthy of particular mention. First, on financial reporting orders, I and other members of the Northern Ireland Committee did quite a lot of work examining the effectiveness of the Criminal Assets Bureau in the Republic of Ireland, and made a number of recommendations on the Assets Recovery Agency in the Proceeds of Crime Bill. Certainly, assets recovery is an essential weapon in the fight against organised crime, and financial reporting orders are a logical extension of the principles that underpinned the proceeds of crime legislation.

I have a query, however, which I hope that the Minister will clarify. While financial reporting orders relate to convicted criminals, who, having finished their sentence, might readopt their lifestyle and criminal activity and seek to regain the assets that they lost previously, it is not mentioned whether they will apply to someone who has been subject to the Assets Recovery Agency procedures, which require a lower standard of proof and may not involve a prison sentence. If we are to curb crime, particularly highly organised and lucrative crime, we must make it clear that crime does not pay at all, and not just if someone has been to prison. It must be clear that once a process has been implemented to recover ill-gotten gains, that process will continue throughout the person's life if they do not curb their lifestyle. That is an important element in law enforcement.

Secondly, there is the issue of impounding uninsured cars, about which my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant), who has unfortunately left the Chamber, made some valuable points. It is symbolic to those 19 out of 20 motorists who do pay their car insurance and accept all the responsibilities of motoring that action is taken against those who drive uninsured. Many people on local estates know who is driving around uninsured, and seeing them get away with it day in, day out, with all the danger that that involves for other motorists and the expense that it generates for law-abiding motorists in terms of higher premiums, is infuriating. It is important that this legislation deals with that issue. Seeing people who engage in such antisocial behaviour losing out as a result, even if the full panoply of the law is not implemented in terms of court appearances and sentencing, will give local communities a degree of reassurance.

Another element that will be extremely popular is the additional power to search for illegal fireworks. Perhaps that was an omission from the previous fireworks legislation, and like my hon Friend the Member for Rhondda, my experience was that the antisocial use of fireworks was not as bad this year as in previous years. Anecdotally, however, I have still had complaints about people using fireworks which had noise levels that would appear to be illegal. We would welcome any move that gave increased powers locally to stop and search people, including retailers who are selling such fireworks.

The issue of incitement to religious hatred has exercised many Members today. We had a mini-debate about it earlier, in the form of interventions on the Home Secretary. I must confess that I am old enough to remember our debates on race relations legislation in the 1970s. Although I was not here then, I read a great deal about it, and many of the arguments and statements that I have heard over the past couple of days reawakened vague memories of the arguments and statements that were produced then.

Although some of the issues may be slightly different, looking back on that race relations legislation and its implementation I feel that a number of things must be said. First, it should be said that despite all that was said in the 1970s, the implementation of the legislation has been proportionate and there have been few prosecutions. Secondly, I think it can be said that most would agree that although there has been little recourse to prosecution, the existence of the legislation and the climate of opinion created by it have made a valuable contribution to race relations and to more moderate debate on the issue. Notwithstanding the foreboding expressed by some in the 1970s, I think that the legislation can be described as a success. I certainly do not know of many people who would advocate its withdrawal.

It is obvious from the debate that I have heard so far that there are party differences on this issue, and differences within parties. I have heard some robust statements, and some interesting points have been made. I feel that if we can make race relations legislation work, there is no reason why we cannot make religious relations legislation work.

Mr. McWalter: All human beings are equal, which is why we have race relations legislation. Not all beliefs are equal, which is why this proposal is inappropriate.

Mr. Bailey: My hon. Friend tempts me down a philosophical path that I will not follow. I want to talk about the application of religious relations legislation that concerns me, as a practical politician dealing with community problems in my area.

Some groups and political parties with specifically racist agendas are undoubtedly using the present lack of legislation on religion as a way of fulfilling those agendas. Attacks on Muslims that are designed for specifically racist purposes have nothing to do with a religious debate. I do not believe it is beyond the wit of man, woman or lawyer to create a legislative framework to prevent that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) made a valid reference to the attitudes of disaffected young Muslims, and that concerns me just as much; but I am chiefly concerned about the people who teach them and feed them those attitudes. It should not be beyond our wit to devise legislation to prevent that as well. We can talk about anti-terrorist legislation and the like, but there is still an area that it does not cover.

There will be a substantial debate on this issue in Committee and during the Bill's subsequent stages, and if I am satisfied that the provision meets the relevant requirements, I will be happy to back it. Nobody in this House would condone people who deliberately try to provoke interracial or inter-religious hatred, or one community's hatred of another. The acid test will be whether the provision fulfils its objective, which is why I am not inclined to be tempted into philosophical or theosophical debates on it.

I shall listen to the forthcoming debate with great interest. I am anxious that this important legislation work, and I shall reserve my judgment until the debate develops. The Bill deals with a range of issues that the public expect the Government to deal with. It will help us in our fight against organised crime and antisocial behaviour, and it will shift the balance of power towards communities and away from criminals. In particular, I hope that the religious relations provisions will lead to a climate of greater tolerance and understanding, and that in 25 years, Members of this House will wonder what the fuss was about, all those years ago when we introduced this legislation, just as Members today look back and wonder what the fuss was in the 1970s, when we introduced race relations legislation.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I want to begin by apologising to the House for not being present for some of this afternoon's debate; I was speaking in a Westminster Hall debate that was taking place at the same time.

It is the proper function of a responsible Opposition to applaud the Government when they get things right, as well as criticising them and suggesting alternative proposals when they get things wrong. It is acknowledged in all parts of the House that almost everything in the Bill is welcome, and quite properly so. I do not intend to go through all its provisions, but I should point out that those relating to uninsured drivers are particularly welcome. I know from my constituents the anxiety and upset that this issue causes; indeed, I am myself the former victim of an uninsured driver, so I know from personal experience how upsetting such an experience can be.

Like many Members who have spoken this afternoon, I want to discuss clause 119 and schedule 10, and I make absolutely no apology for doing so. It is the proper function of this House to discuss, debate and tease out controversial issues, and it is clear that these provisions are the subject of a great deal of public interest.

Mr. Heath: As the hon. Gentleman says, he is one of several Members who have chosen to concentrate on clause 119 and schedule 10, which leads me to think that we have had a rather unbalanced debate on this large Bill. Indeed, this confirms my view that the right thing for the Government to do is withdraw the clause and schedule and reintroduce them in a separate Bill, in order to accomplish the specific purpose for which they are intended.

Andrew Selous: The hon. Gentleman makes an eminently sensible suggestion, with which I agree. Perhaps the Government could detach these provisions in some way and subject them to a free vote.

It is always important to acknowledge good motives in politics, and certainly on the part of one's opponents. The Home Secretary referred to his having a noble motive in introducing the provision relating to the incitement of religious hatred. It is deeply hurtful and upsetting to be attacked because of one's faith or to experience one's religion being vilified and ridiculed. Many Christians in this country would probably say that they are the butt of adverse humour and believe that many aspects of public life challenge the faith that they hold dear, so I understand the Government's motives in including the clause in the Bill. We should all be moderate in our use of language, but it is especially important for people who are in positions of public prominence. We should not overlook the value of censure. We do not always have to resort to law, and public opprobrium can be used to rebuke people who do not use moderate language. Recently, some comedians experienced public censure when one of them overstepped the line.

This is clearly not a party political matter, as Members on both sides of the House have expressed concern about clause 119 and schedule 10. There are three reasons why we should be wary of those provisions and treat them with circumspection. First, the existing criminal law is fairly robust, and protects everyone from criminal acts and incitement to commit such acts. Since 2001, religiously aggravated offences have been introduced, further strengthening the law. Viscount Colville of Culross, who chaired the House of Lords Select Committee on Religious Offences in England and Wales, said:

> "There is a very substantial amount of criminal law relating to incitement . . . It is much more positive and less abstract than some people may think . . . a good deal of criminal law is available . . . I do not believe that it has all yet been tried out before we invent something else."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 22 April 2004: Vol. 660; c.4467.]

That is an important point. There is already a vast amount of legislation on the statute book. The problem is enforcement. To digress for a moment, I am particularly pleased that my party has policies to recruit an extra 5,000 police a year. That is the right approach; we do not always need to introduce more laws. The existing law on incitement is much stronger than we have been led to believe by Ministers.

Secondly, on freedom of speech, there have been a number of worrying incidents. Recently, the Bishop of Chester was reported to the police for remarks that he made in a sermon in the normal course of his business. It is worrying that the thought police are already investigating what happens in the pulpit. Furthermore, a pastor in Scandinavia was recently sent to jail for a month for making certain remarks in a sermon. It is a paradox of religious faith that it has the power to offend and upset but, at the same time, to give great comfort, satisfaction, joy and contentment to many people. Because of the exclusive claims of many faiths, they inevitably cause upset and offence to many other people. It is in the nature of many faiths to evangelise, which may also cause offence. It is incredibly important that we do not restrict the freedom of people of faith to express themselves fully in the way that they believe their faith calls them to do.

We need to look at what has happened in other jurisdictions where Governments have introduced a similar type of law. In March 2002, a Christian group organised a seminar in Australia. It was a private meeting at which three recent converts to Islam sat at the back and took notes. What they heard caused offence to them, although one can argue about whether what was said was offensive. The Bill refers to words, material or recording "likely to be seen or heard by any person in whom it is likely to stir up racial or religious hatred"—

a similar situation. As a result of a complaint, the case was taken to court. It has been in the Australian courts for seven months and has become bogged down in the Australian legal system. It is a worrying precedent that we ought to bear in mind.

I conclude by quoting from the executive director of the Australian Muslim Public Affairs Committee, Amir Butler, who said:

"Who, after all, would give credence to a religion that appears so fragile it can exist only if protected by a bodyguard of lawyers?"

6.27 pm

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): We have had an interesting and useful debate. It lacked the party political controversy of some of our discussions, and some extremely interesting speeches were made. I shall try to respond to a number of points made in the debate, but I start by emphasising that in the past, when there has been substantial agreement between both sides of the House, there has often been acute danger ahead for us.

The Bill, which we will not oppose on Second Reading, is something of a Christmas tree, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who speaks for the Liberal party, described it in his opening remarks. I agree and place on record our gratitude to NCIS and the National Crime Squad for what they have done. I also underline what he said about the national witness protection scheme. When I recently visited Nottingham to meet Mothers Against Guns, they eloquently stressed the importance of the scheme.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome expressed reservations about the new powers for community support officers and cited the 50 measures on law and order that have been introduced by the Government in the past seven years. It is clear from what he said that in Committee he and I will have much in common on our agenda.

The hon. and learned Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) spat out his support for those on his Front Bench and looked much better once he got that off his chest. He warned us not to over-flatter the criminals' success and inveighed against the Government's plans to deal with religious hatred, praising the motivation but pinpointing the dangers in practical terms. I very much agree.

The hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), who must be preoccupied today with his other duties, in which we all wish him wisdom and judgment, pointed out that religion is a matter of choice, whereas race is a matter of fact. He stressed that the two concepts should not be confused.

The hon. Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White) made a wide-ranging speech in which he dealt with matters such as the proceeds of crime. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) said that there had been far too many measures on law and order—50—since the Government came to office. He accused the Government of confusing activity with progress.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) made a really interesting speech. She agreed with the formation of SOCA and talked about people trafficking and drugs. She made two key points, on funding and on the danger that SOCA would act as a magnet for the best of our police forces. I shall return to both matters later.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar also made a number of technical points about disclosure notices. We are concerned that clause 56 goes too wide and that it allows powers to be exercised by a constable, whereas previous legislation required authorisation to be obtained at a very high level. We shall want to look at this matter in Committee. She also mentioned the pivotal role of the custody sergeant and spoke of the dangers of civilianising that post. I thought that she completely demolished the Government's case, and I hope that Ministers will consider what she had to say very carefully.

My hon. Friend the Member for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) made an excellent and moving speech in which he inveighed against people trafficking and the vile trade in children, women and men who are exploited and degraded by it. He said that the trade was worth nearly £20 million. He made clear how serious it is and said that the UK was a particular magnet for it, with 2 million people trafficked across our borders each year. In a speech that I have no doubt will be read with care by Ministers, he also set out the case against the clauses on incitement to religious hatred.

The hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) also spoke about religious hatred and advised us that there are no fewer than 390,000 Jedi knights in Britain. He also dealt with the question of definition. Rowan Atkinson was in the House only yesterday and, like him, the hon. Gentleman talked about the "chilling" of the climate of free expression. That is an excellent phrase.

My hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and the hon. Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter) concentrated on the issue of religious hatred. The hon. Gentleman treated the House to a philosophical and historical perspective on religion, and attacked the Government for their anodised view. He urged the Government to resile from their support for the relevant clauses.

The hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) gave a Scottish dimension to the debate. He supported SOCA, but expressed some concern about the difficulties inherent in implementing it in Scotland.

The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) took a view that was rather different from the one adopted by the more senior cleric on this side of the House who preceded him. Apart from him, only one other speaker supported the Government's proposals on incitement to religious hatred. He complained that my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), the shadow Home Secretary, did not give him a peroration. I shall see whether I can give him one towards the end of my speech.

My hon. Friend the Member for Fareham (Mr. Hoban) also spoke about clause 119, and pointed out the flaws in the Government's case. The hon. Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) talked about financial reporting orders and said that crime must not pay. He was the only other speaker on the Government Benches to support the religious hatred clauses in the Bill.

The final contribution from the Back Benches was made by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous). He opposed the religious hatred clauses, and underlined the importance of using moderate language in these discussions. I am sure that all hon. Members will be pleased by the moderate language used this afternoon.

The Opposition want to help the Government with this Bill. We want to identify various matters that we shall raise in Committee, and I hope that the Minister winding up tonight will take a fancy to some of the amendments that we expect to propose.

The first issue that we will want to discuss is the structure of SOCA. Although we support its formation, we understand that recruiting the brightest detectives and the best police from existing forces could damage those forces.

There is already evidence that some key leadership elements are likely to be removed from the police. We hope that the Minister will explain in Committee why she did not consider secondment as an option for staffing the agency, as happens in the Army with the special forces. We hope that she will put our fears to rest about the danger of a leadership vacuum as a result of the brightest and the best being recruited to SOCA.

We shall also want to be satisfied that SOCA, by dealing not with terrorism—we understand that argument—but with level 2 crime, including prostitution, drugs and people smuggling, will find a natural position between other law enforcement agencies. Considerable confusion could be caused, for example, if one agency is dealing with terrorism and another with people smuggling, as they are natural bedfellows. We will want to explore the relationship that SOCA will have with the intelligence agencies.

We shall also want to be clear that there will not be confusion in any particular region in which SOCA is responsible for the fight against drugs but the police are responsible for enforcing the law. We fear that if a failure resulted, each side would blame the other, which would not be good for policing.

We also want to be satisfied that the drive towards localism, local performance and local accountability will not be damaged by the new structure and that it will not have any unintended consequences. We want to be sure that addressing the regional vacuum will not cause problems elsewhere, especially in the relationship between SOCA and the local police forces.

We also want to be clear about the adequacy of funding. How will SOCA's funding needs be addressed? We also want to be clear that the Home Secretary will not, under clause 9, arrogate to himself wide powers to determine strategic priorities. Parliament must be careful not to pave the way for an unscrupulous Home Secretary to determine strategic priorities with an eye to achieving a political purpose. The Home Secretary said today that a Cabinet Sub-Committee would guide him on that. My reading of clause 9 is that that is not in the legislation. I hope that the Minister will be able to persuade us that it does not need to be.

We need to explore also the apparent provision—in clause 38(1)—that any member of staff of SOCA can be designated as having the powers of a police officer. It takes considerable training to be able to exercise those powers and we will need to explore that issue in Committee.

The major theme of the debate has been the religious hatred clauses. It will not have escaped the Government's notice that the Opposition are deeply unhappy about them, and that feeling is shared on both sides of the House. We are keen to maintain the balance between religious freedom and freedom of speech, but the debate has shown that those clauses are confusing, will make bad law and will not work. The Minister should consider carefully the telling intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Devon (Mr. Streeter), who asked precisely what threat the clauses were meant to stop. The Government have not answered that question. If it is the BNP, as many hon. Members have suggested, there are better ways to see off such dreadful people than introducing these clauses. My strong advice to the Minister is to have a word with the Home Secretary after this debate and to save the Committee and herself a lot of trouble by dropping those clauses now.

We shall also want to explore the issue of animal rights. My hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly) will look at ways of strengthening the Government's clauses, which we support as far as they go.

We shall also want to know why the use of intercepts has not been included in the Bill. We are concerned by the lack of reference to them and we have called consistently for the Government to lift the ban on intercept use in courts. It is clearly odd to confine the fruits of intercepts to intelligence only. The UK is one of the few countries in which intercept evidence is not admissible and we hope that the Minister will explain why she is not changing that situation in this Bill.

We shall also want to look at the changes to PACE, in clauses 101 to 115. We shall want to look carefully at several aspects, including the concept—as set out in the debate—that everything is now arrestable. I shudder to think of the paperwork, let alone anything else that would be involved in that legal change, which must be carefully considered.

We need to look carefully into a number of aspects, including the power of a civilian to make an arrest in very much wider circumstances, which could be counter-productive. The all-premises warrant is a considerable extension of power and we shall want to explore precisely what its effects would be and whether they would be acceptable.

Police community support officers have been discussed. A considerable increase in their powers is advocated in the Bill. We are not opposed to CSOs, but there has been no independent assessment of their effectiveness and value for money. We think that there should be one. Some forces, including Hampshire, have already made clear their view on CSOs and we are concerned about the additional powers of search and arrest, the use of equipment and the lack of training. It looks like an attempt by the Government to achieve policing on the cheap and could undermine confidence in the professionalism of the police.

We should also like to consider the changes proposed on dealing with money laundering.

We welcome the Government's announcement today that they will make the parents of under-10s responsible for the cost of wanton damage. Parents should have responsibility for their children.

There are a range of views on dealing with behaviour in the vicinity of Parliament and the matter will probably be best left until Report, so that the House can have a considered look at it in a wider focus than in Committee.

Finally, I turn to the general context for the Bill, where I fear that I must be somewhat less obliging to the Home Secretary and his team. If they think that by carpet-bombing the Queen's Speech with tough-sounding law and order measures—albeit ones with which the Opposition broadly agree—designed to conceal the Government's lamentable failures in combating crime, they will evade the justified wrath of the electorate at the appalling nature of their record on crime, they are sadly mistaken. The public will remember that these measures are not the start of Labour's agenda for fighting crime, but the product of seven years of talk, seven years of being asleep on the job, and seven years of failure.

6.42 pm

The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Caroline Flint): The debate has been interesting, with about 14 contributions from Back Benchers.

About 60 per cent. of the Bill deals with the Serious Organised Crime Agency and the powers that go with it. There are also several other powers that will help to develop neighbourhood policing and will help the police on whatever level they operate, whether local, regional or as part of SOCA. They will all help to tackle crime. As my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, West (Mr. Bailey) rightly said, the measure is about ensuring that the law is one step ahead on behalf of those who support the law.

The creation of SOCA is not about setting up a new police organisation, but about bringing together the National Criminal Intelligence Service, the National Crime Squad and the immigration crime side of the Home Office, as well as the drug investigations of Customs and Excise, in a new organisation with a new culture. That is why we had to address the powers of that organisation. When people use phrases such as "the brightest and the best", they do a disservice to those who, for whatever reason, want to work in different forms of law enforcement. We should recognise their particular skills in what they do. Some people are more interested in local policing, while others are interested in regional law enforcement or national and international law enforcement. I would not make the assessment that anyone is better than anyone else; they are all helping to fight crime and to tackle those who are involved in it.

In relation to the operation of SOCA at regional and local level, systems are already in place to ensure that different parts of law enforcement do not engage in operations that frustrate or put in jeopardy the work of other agencies. That will continue.

Paul Farrelly (Newcastle-under-Lyme) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Caroline Flint: I am sorry, I cannot give way. There is only a short time for my speech and my hon. Friend was not in the Chamber for the whole debate.

The Bill is also about ensuring that we deal with the operation of middle markets. That is why I was pleased to attend the launch in London just the other week of the middle market drugs unit, which has been established by the Metropolitan Police Service and Customs and Excise to tackle middle market drug organisations.

I shall try, if I can, to get through the contributions made during the debate. The shadow Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), raised a number of issues about the powers that the director general will be able to confer on those who work for SOCA and the powers of constables, Customs officers and immigration officers. It goes without saying that, as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said, the members of staff will need training in all those powers. That is certainly part of our thinking, and we will ensure that that happens. That also deals with a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East (Brian White).

We are not persuaded of the need for an annual parliamentary debate on SOCA. Hon. Members have many opportunities to debate policing and wider law enforcement issues in the House.

SOCA will not have a direct role in combating terrorism; but as has been said, terrorism is often funded by organised crime. SOCA will investigate such cases and seek to bring the offenders to justice, but in doing so, it will work very closely with the intelligence agencies and others.

I wish to make it clear that no clause relates to intercept powers. There is ongoing discussion about that complex issue, but we do not intend to introduce any such clause in the Bill.

The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden also talked about borders, as did a number of other hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and for Angus (Mr. Weir) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead (Mr. McWalter). Border controls are exercised by the three main border control agencies—the immigration service, Customs and port special branches—for a variety of reasons, not only to control immigration, but to facilitate genuine visits, detect contraband, collect revenue, prevent fraud and protect against terrorism. Those functions are distinct from the new agency's remit and will not be subsumed into it. The e-borders programme will help to create a modern, integrated and intelligence-led immigration control system that uses advanced passenger information, passenger name records and emerging technology to best effect.

Andrew Selous: Will the Minister give way?

Caroline Flint: No. I am afraid that I have not got time to give way.

On the comments made about small ports, we will run pilot schemes at sites across the UK during 2005, with a view to rolling out new ways of working across most ports from 2006. We shall consider the points that the hon. Member for Angus made about that issue.

On the suggestion that there has been no evaluation of the effectiveness of CSOs, 27 local evaluations have shown that CSOs have been well received by the public, with significant potential to reduce low-level crime and antisocial behaviour. Initial findings of the national evaluation will be published before the Bill is considered in Committee. The right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden said in his speech that the Hampshire force did not want its allocated number of CSOs. If that is the case, I suggest that the force let us know and we will redistribute those CSOs. I do not believe that such a redistribution would be supported by MPs for the area or, for that matter, members of the public.

The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) asked how SOCA will work in relation to other forces. As I have said already, SOCA will enable local forces to focus on level 1 and 2 crimes, while the agency will address national and international criminality. The Bill will allow SOCA to provide mutual support to forces. SOCA will be a UK-wide agency, and it will work closely with Scottish Drug Enforcement Agency in discharging its functions. I can assure the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Angus, who also made this point, that SOCA staff will be expected to have knowledge of the relevant Scottish law when operating in Scotland.

The NCS and NCIS have a service authority—a point made by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome—because they were clearly police-type bodies and therefore established along the lines of the police authority model. SOCA will not be a police force, but the SOCA board will exercise the strategic oversight of SOCA in similar ways to the service authorities.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the granting of immunity to someone under clause 65 or 66 would be drawn to the attention of the court where that person testified. The answer is, yes, that will happen in the normal way.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) asked whether the witness protection provisions would apply to someone subject to a disclosure notice under clause 56. The majority of people subject to disclosure notices are covered by the new witness protection provisions, as they are possible witnesses. Our intention is not that disclosure notices will put anyone at risk, and I will consider that issue further to find out how it is covered.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar and the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome asked about complaints. The complaints procedure, including oversight, will be carried out by the IPCC and it will apply to all SOCA staff, not just those designated with police or other powers. We are planning to have direct recruitment into the organisation, but I shall check on how secondees might continue to operate or assist in the future.

Power of arrest was mentioned and we were asked why the change is necessary. The findings of the PACE review were published more than two years ago. Since then, we have published detailed proposals in consultation papers on police powers. The Bill's provisions are fully supported by the Association of Chief Police Officers and others. It is important to bear in mind the fact that under general arrest conditions in PACE, it is already the case that in practice all offences are arrestable.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway (Mr. Marshall-Andrews) was concerned about people who are involved in serious fraud. The White Paper consulted on plea bargaining and we accept that it is desirable for all defendants to seek an indication of the likely sentence should they plead guilty. We will take the detail of that forward with the senior judiciary shortly, but I shall look further at what he said about that in Hansard.

My hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, North-East raised issues to do with SOCA and how it would engage with the private sector. He may be interested to know that an article on high-tech crime and the use of the internet in a trade magazine for those working in that industry resulted in a number of people e-mailing the Home Office seeking to become special constables to assist in that area because of their expertise in the internet. In some respects, SOCA is all about looking at the particular skills that we need to tackle high-tech crime.

I also welcome my hon. Friend's work on the all-party group on the internet. I have told him that we will table amendments to strengthen the Computer Misuse Act 1990, including the penalties that he mentioned. As others said, the Bill contains a number of provisions, and we take the view that adding to it at this stage is difficult and we shall not pursue it. However, we are looking for a suitable vehicle for that legislation.

My hon. Friend also mentioned powers. There was a bit of a misunderstanding. SOCA staff will not be restricted to the powers that they held in a previous organisation. All powers of customs and immigration officers can be made available to designated SOCA staff, subject to the necessary training and accreditation. We are still ensuring that forces are aware of RIPA. A dedicated team in the Home Office provides support to practitioners on how to use the powers appropriately. We are considering whether there is a need to address problems further.

A number of hon. Members referred to uninsured vehicles. I welcome the comments by my hon. Friends the Members for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) and for West Bromwich, West on uninsured vehicles and fireworks. We have the opportunity to tighten legislation and tweak it in some respects. I make no apology for that. It is one thing to pass laws in this place, but as we know, we only see how they work on the ground when they are implemented. That is why we sometimes have to return to the issues.

The hon. Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) was worried about the implications for human rights. As he said, the face of the Bill states that it is our view that "the provisions of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill are compatible with the Convention rights."

We have been careful to ensure that we seek advice on those issues throughout the process.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar also mentioned the two-tier work force. There will be no two-tier work force. Following consultation with unions, it is our aim to establish a unified set of terms and conditions for all SOCA staff. We will not have police officers on police terms or customs officers on customs terms. She also asked about disclosure notices issued against those who have information rather than those who are suspected of having information. Clause 56(2) provides that notice can be issued against a suspect, and that will be the exception rather than the rule. In either circumstance, it is authorised by a senior prosecutor.

My hon. and learned Friend also raised a number of issues on Queen's evidence. We have not made it a requirement that a person entering into a co-operation agreement has legal advice before doing so, but they usually will. As she said, they will be well advised to do so. However, it is not appropriate to legislate to force every individual to get legal advice in those circumstances.

My hon. and learned Friend also mentioned human trafficking. She will know that, in addition to my other duties, I am engaged in a review of prostitution. Human trafficking was also raised by the hon. Member for Canterbury. I am very concerned about it. We will see how we can use the prostitution review to tackle that. We should also not forget what is already on the statute book in respect of labour and sexual exploitation. SOCA will, of course, have a role to play in these matters, too.

Questions were raised about custody officers and I have to say that the Northumbria pilot scheme found that custody sergeants were champing at the bit to get out of the stations and be with the public. It has been greatly welcomed, and I see no reason why properly trained police staff cannot undertake the role to the same standard as police officers—a view shared by ACPO.

The hon. Member for Canterbury raised a number of issues about people smuggling and trafficking in women and children. We are very concerned about that. He also made a point about paedophiles. He will know that the National Criminal Intelligence Service and the National Crime Squad have, in their different ways, assisted operations to tackle paedophile rings. There is no reason not to do so and we ensure in our international contacts with practitioners and Ministers in the EU, for example, that matters of cross-border crime are understood and dealt with by many different countries, not just ourselves. It is a global issue that we must look into.

The hon. Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) raised a number of issues, including the effect of SOCA on the funding of Essex policing and local policing generally. A 3.75 per cent. increase in funding for Essex police was announced last week for 2005–06, up to £176 million, and police numbers have increased by 145 since 1997, with an additional 75 community support officers. It is all about added value for policing in this country. The hon. Gentleman referred to protests outside Parliament. We must ensure that we can safeguard the workings of Parliament in its unique surroundings. To that end, we believe it right and proper for the police to attach proportionate conditions on any protest.

Several speeches were made on the subject of incitement to religious hatred. For example, the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Medway, the hon. Members for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley), for Aldridge-Brownhills, for Fareham (Mr. Hoban), for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) and for Canterbury, my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice), the hon. Member for Castle Point, my hon. Friend the Member for Hemel Hempstead, and of course the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden, all spoke about it. They all had concerns about it or were against the provisions, though my hon. Friends the Members for Rhondda and for West Bromwich, West also made good speeches in support.

There are many issues and I would draw hon. Members' attention to a statement published this morning by the Home Secretary and the Attorney-General, which clearly outlines the basis of the offence and why it is necessary. It said that the proposals "will make it an offence to use threatening, abusive or insulting words, behaviour or written materials with the intention or likely effect of stirring up hatred against people targeted because of their religious beliefs, or lack of religious beliefs, as well as their race."

I believe that it will close an unacceptable loophole whereby mono-ethnic faith groups are protected, but multi-ethnic faith groups are not. It will ensure that there is still a clear difference between criticism of a religion and the act of stirring up hatred against members of religious groups. This provision was supported by ACPO, which said that it sometimes wanted to prosecute but could not, and it provided evidence to the House of Lords Select Committee on Religious Offences. It is right to move forward on this issue. It is not about stopping jokes, and it is not about stopping Rowan Atkinson or anyone else from expressing a point of view, either to raise a laugh or engage in serious debate on these issues.

I was interested to hear from the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome that the Liberal Democrats would vote against this measure. I remind him that the Liberal Democrat shadow Home Secretary said on 7 July this year:

"This plan closes a loophole that has allowed inflammatory language to go unpunished, and the Liberal Democrats will give these plans their support."

Perhaps it will be the same as with antisocial behaviour orders: the Liberal Democrats were against it and now they are for it; on this occasion, they were for it and now they are against it. We will wait with bated breath to see what will happen.

[Caroline Flint]

Finally, the Bill is about tackling crime on a local, regional or national level. It comes from a Government who have put in more money than ever before, more police officers and more support on the ground for the people we represent.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

SERIOUS ORGANISED CRIME AND POLICE BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 20th January.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

Programming Committee

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Programming of proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Derek Twigg.]

PETITION

Scottish Regiments

7.13 pm

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): It is with great pleasure that I present a petition on behalf of some 5,000 of my constituents, who remain very concerned about the proposals for the future of the Scottish regiments. The Black Watch was raised in my constituency some 300 years ago, and there is still incredible admiration and respect for the job that it does on behalf of us all. My constituents want to be reassured that, as well as having an illustrious past, it will continue to have a secure future.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of the Save the Scottish Regiments supporters, Declares their opposition to plans to abolish one Scottish Regiment and merge the remaining Regiments into a single unit. The Petitioners further declare their pride in Scotland's historic Regiments, which have strong, beneficial community links. The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to abandon UK Armed Forces spending cuts of approximately £2 billion, and thereby ensure the future of the Scottish Regiments by reversing plans to abolish one Regiment and merge the remaining Regiments into a single unit.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Review of Life Tariffs

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Ainger.]

7.15 pm

Mrs. Claire Curtis-Thomas (Crosby) (Lab): I am grateful for having secured this evening's Adjournment debate and wish to use it to highlight how one of my constituents has been treated by the courts system and the Home Office after the brutal murder of her son, Michael Moss.

Michael Moss, aged 15, was murdered by three boys in the early hours of 16 November 1999. The murder was savage. After luring Michael to a school playing field, two of those convicted of his murder attacked him and stripped him naked. They left Michael seriously injured and unable to move. Then, they went to the home of the third killer, woke him and returned to the playing field. There, all three continued the attack.

The killers used sadistic and gratuitous violence. There is evidence to show that they used swings to obtain height and thereby generated maximum force to cause greater injury from the violence they inflicted. They also used a broken spirit bottle to inflict stab wounds to Michael's neck. They subjected him to prolonged torture and violence.

All three boys were convicted of murder at Liverpool Crown court on 26 July 2000. At the time of the attack, two of the boys who murdered Michael were aged 15 and one aged 16. The convicted boys were given life sentences by the trial judge. On 19 October 2000, Mrs. Elizabeth Moss, Michael's mum, was visited by a representative of the victim information unit of the probation service. At that meeting, she was informed that the tariff for the three offenders had been set at 10 years. Mrs. Moss was sure that this tariff was irrevocable. However, three years later—in November 2003—Mrs. Moss was contacted to be told that the tariff had not yet been imposed. Michael Moss's family were then invited to give their views to the Lord Chief Justice, who would consider their submission before setting the tariff. Mrs. Moss submitted information, which was detailed and lenient. She suggested a tariff of 15 years for such murders.

The Criminal Justice Act 2003 sets out new starting points in relation to the calculation of tariffs in mandatory life cases. In this case, if these boys had been convicted after 2003, the minimum they would have received, including the mitigation of age, was 12 years. I welcome the Government's introduction of these higher minimum tariffs for such serious cases. However, in Michael's case, when the Lord Chief Justice announced his tariff in 2004, he decided on a sentence of 10 years for two of the boys convicted and nine for the third. He included in his judgment the statement that although Mrs. Moss's "views as to tariff are not relevant, they do indicate her praiseworthy and rational approach".

Having been invited to comment and to make contributions on the tariff, Mrs. Moss's views were subsequently ignored.

We are not here today to debate the tariff in this case. Instead, we should consider how Mrs. Moss and her family have been treated. Why were they asked for information if it was to be automatically rejected? In a written answer to my parliamentary question on 16 September 2004, the Minister said that the Sentencing Guidelines Council would provide "a more collaborative and transparent system, which is open to public scrutiny, and should engender greater public confidence in sentencing practice."—[Official Report, 16 September 2004; Vol. 424, c. 1686W.]

The actions of the courts and the Lord Chief Justice have been far from open and transparent in this case. They have led to confusion as to when the tariff was set and what influence the victim's family could hope to have when the tariff was being considered.

My concern is that Mrs. Moss has never been told why her views were elicited only to be dismissed as irrelevant by the Lord Chief Justice. Despite writing to the Home Office on a number of occasions—and discussing this matter privately with the relevant Ministers—Mrs. Moss has never received an adequate response to this question. Neither has she received an apology, which, on grounds of insensitivity alone, she deserves. I would ask that the Home Office should offer her an answer and an apology.

Mrs. Moss included personal details in her submission to the Lord Chief Justice. The details of this submission were revealed to the defendants and their families. Mrs. Moss accepts that, but was not prepared for the fact that personal details of the medical treatment required by the family to offset the emotional impact of the crime were widely publicised. It seems perverse that the Moss family's views were considered to be irrelevant to the process, yet details of the treatment that they required were suitable for public scrutiny. Mrs. Moss did not know that the judgment including those details would be published on the internet and so be publicly available to all. Could my hon. Friend the Minister explain what information is given to families when they make submissions to the Lord Chief Justice regarding the privacy and public use of such statements? Why was Mrs. Moss's express permission not sought if personal aspects of her submission were to be released publicly?

The Lord Chief Justice states that the defendants have expressed remorse. The offenders have now been in prison for four years, and the Lord Chief Justice's statement was the first that the family have heard of such an expression of regret. Information regarding the progress or otherwise of offenders in custody, their attitudes to their crime and their conduct while in the prison system are matters that are purposely withheld from the victim's family. However, Mrs. Moss is able to learn through a public document, with unrestricted access, the institutions where the offenders have been held, the names of their psychiatrists, their supervising and probation officers and other information regarding their conduct. Why is such information withheld from the family of the victim when it can be revealed publicly without any consideration as to the consequences for the families involved?

The Lord Chief Justice also said:

"In my view the recommendation of a 10 year tariff in the case of this very serious offence by the trial judge was merciful. If over 4 years had not elapsed since the offence and my consideration of tariff in the case . . . I would have considered 12 years the correct tariff."

The Lord Chief Justice drew attention to the length of time between the conviction and the imposition of a tariff in this case. He drew attention to the fact that this, along with other factors such as defender development, had affected his consideration of the tariff. I know that as a result of the European Court's view on the case of Venables and Thompson, the Lord Chief Justice could consider the "personal development of the defendant", but if the Lord Chief Justice had considered Michael Moss's case closer to the trial date, this information would not have been available to him when setting the original tariff. Indeed, the Lord Chief Justice suggests that he may have come to a different conclusion if he had set the tariff closer to the trial date. Could my hon. Friend the Minister please explain why there was such a delay, as this time lapse has clearly affected the tariff that was set?

Liz Moss, Michael's mum, has endured every mother's nightmare: her son was killed in the most horrific circumstances. Throughout the trial and sentencing of her son's murderers, she has sought justice in a moderate and commendable way. She is an incredible woman who has earned my deep respect for the calm way in which she has handled the terrible details of her son's death. At a time when victims' families need to feel that their views are relevant and valued, this family must feel that their own views have counted for nothing. Liz Moss has been treated very badly by this system, and she deserves at least an apology. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can also offer us an explanation on the questions that I have raised.

7.23 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Paul Goggins): I begin my congratulating my hon. Friend on securing this debate on victim consultation in the review of life tariffs. She has drawn the attention of the House to the experience of her constituent, Mrs. Elizabeth Moss, who had to endure the unimaginable tragedy of her son Michael's brutal murder in 1999. In outlining her concerns to the House, she has, as on so many previous occasions, shown both a deep compassion and a firm commitment to her constituents.

One of the Government's central aims is to rebalance the criminal justice system in favour of the victims of crime. Indeed, during the previous Session of Parliament it was my privilege to take through the House of Commons the Domestic Violence, Crime and Victims Act 2004, which for the first time sets out clearly what the victims of crime can expect from the criminal justice agencies. It is vital for victims of crime to have information and advice about the criminal justice process, and an opportunity to receive information about key stages in an offender's sentence.

It is the responsibility of the National Probation Service to arrange victim contact on behalf of us all in reaching out to victims in the important way that I have described. It consults victims before offenders' release from prison, so that they can make representations about any conditions that they think should apply to the offenders when they come out of prison on licence. That can include an offender's exclusion from a particular geographical area. It does not mean that victims have the final say in such matters—in particular, they do not have the final say on the length of sentences—but it does mean that their views are heard and properly considered.

Responsibility for the setting of life tariffs—the tariff being the punitive period of a life sentence, or what could be described as the minimum period of imprisonment that must be served in custody—used to lie with Ministers. As my hon. Friend explained, in recent years it has gradually become a wholly judicial function as a result of landmark decisions in the domestic and European courts. Sections 269 and 270 and schedules 21 and 22 of the Criminal Justice Act 2003, which came into force in December last year, established new arrangements for sentencing in all murder cases, and for setting tariffs—or, as they are now known, "specified parts" or "minimum terms".

My hon. Friend referred to the setting of a 12-year tariff in relation to offenders under the age of 18 who have been convicted of murder. In fact, 12 years represents not the minimum term but the starting point used by a judge passing sentence to determine the appropriate sentence. He or she can move the starting point up or down depending on the circumstances.

The distinction between a tariff set by Ministers and a specified part announced by the sentencing judge in court is that the latter runs from the date of sentence and will have already credited the offender with any time spent on remand. That may seem a small detail, but it is quite important and will be of particular interest to a victim's family, who will want to know how long a life sentence prisoner can expect to serve before being considered for release.

There are three groups of offenders who were and continue to be affected by the arrangements introduced by the 2003 Act. They consist of those sentenced after 18 December 2003, whose minimum terms will now be set in open court by the trial judge, those sentenced before that date for whom no minimum term has been set, and those sentenced before then whose tariff, set by Ministers, has not yet expired. Cases in which no minimum term has yet been set will be referred to the High Court. Offenders whose tariffs were originally set by Ministers can apply to have them reviewed. In such cases tariffs may remain the same or may decrease, but they cannot be increased.

The views of the victim's family will be sought in all cases in which an offender has yet to receive a minimum term, or has applied for a review of his or her tariff. The judges who set and review minimum terms will have an opportunity to receive statements from families about the events surrounding a loved one's death, and the immediate impact of the offence on their lives. National Probation Service victim contact teams are using their considerable knowledge and expertise to work with victims' families in order to present these views to the judges.

If they so wish, families will have the opportunity to attend the High Court to hear the judge's decision on the minimum term to be served. Indeed, I can confirm that guidance has recently been issued to victim liaison officers confirming the arrangements for submitting these personal statements to the court, and notifying the date on which the tariff will be set.

This is clearly highly sensitive work, and it has been ongoing for several months. Victim liaison officers work with victims' families to enable their views to be represented. This will often include several visits and involve many family members as they seek to obtain information, and try as best they can to put into words the impact of the death of a family member. Families will have strong views about the sentences that offenders should receive, but it is clear that those views alone cannot dictate the length of sentence that an offender will receive. We should also remember that some families will not wish to express their views, and it is important that we respect their right not to engage in the process, if that is what they choose.

The process for considering all applications and referrals in lifer cases is a matter for the High Court. There is some frustration at the fact that full implementation of the procedures has been delayed. That is the result of judicial challenges from a number of lifers concerning the relevant provisions in the 2003 Act, the most notable factor being the absence of an automatic right to an oral hearing. I am pleased to confirm that things have moved on and that the High Court process, including all the arrangements for considering the victim's perspective, is expected to be fully operational in the new year.

There is nothing that the criminal justice system can do to make up for sexual or violent offences, particularly those involving violent death. But the system that we have put in place attempts to treat victims and their families with dignity, and it offers them the opportunity to ensure that their important views are heard. As my hon. Friend made clear, there has been considerable correspondence about the issue that she has drawn to the House's attention this evening: the tariff-setting process for the three youths who murdered Michael Moss. As that correspondence makes clear, responsibility for deciding tariffs for murderers aged under 18 was taken on by the Lord Chief Justice, following the European Court of Human Rights decision in the cases of Thompson and Venables in December 1999. That happened in advance of the enactment of legislation to transfer responsibility for setting tariffs from Ministers to trial judges.

Michael's murderers were convicted on 26 July 2000, so they fell to having their tariffs decided by the Lord Chief Justice. They were among the last to be convicted before the new legislation came into effect on 30 November 2000, so they were behind a queue of 130 or more cases that needed consideration. The way in which the Lord Chief Justice set about this task was entirely a matter for him. He decided to seek the views of victims' families, through the Crown Prosecution Service and the police. Where families chose to make statements, they would have been informed that those views would be disclosed to the prisoners concerned for any comments, before being submitted—along with all other relevant material—to the Lord Chief Justice for a decision. I can confirm that the Prison Service played no part in obtaining the views of the families in any of these cases.

My hon. Friend asked a number of specific questions, including why her constituent's views were dismissed by the Lord Chief Justice. Clearly, I am not in a position to make a judgment about the way in which the Lord Chief Justice handled this particular case, but the arrangements for setting tariffs in those transitional cases pending the new legislation were entirely a matter for him. He decided to seek the views of victims' families in all such cases so that he could be aware of how they had been affected. I am sure that he did not intend to be offensive in any way when he made it clear that the decision on the length of tariff was ultimately a matter for the judiciary. However, in the light of my hon. Friend's comments, I intend to write to the Lord Chief Justice asking him to clarify for her and for her constituent—and indeed, for me as the Minister—precisely what he did mean.

I can understand that Mrs. Moss is extremely upset about everything that has happened in this tragic case. Clearly, she deserves our deepest sympathy but, as I have said, the arrangements for dealing with those cases were explained in detail in correspondence with my hon. Friend and Mrs. Moss, and were decided and operated by the Lord Chief Justice. My hon. Friend asked why Mrs. Moss's permission was not sought for releasing her submission. My understanding is that, as part of the arrangements put in place by the Lord Chief Justice, families were told that their statements would be disclosed to the offenders concerned, so there was a risk that they might be made public. In addition—this is an important point—the Lord Chief Justice took the view that decisions that were effectively sentencing decisions on the most serious offences should be made publicly available. Disclosure of any material from individual statements was a matter for the Lord Chief Justice.

The location and progress of prisoners is not normally disclosable, but again, the Lord Chief Justice clearly felt that it was necessary to give some details of progress to explain to the detainees, the families concerned and the public the reasons for reaching his decisions. As for any question of delay, it is clear that the Lord Chief Justice had a very large number of cases to consider personally. The offenders in this case were among the last to be convicted before the law was changed to transfer responsibility for tariff setting from Ministers to trial judges. No doubt, that was one reason for the delay. The appeal against conviction by one of the offenders, which was not disposed of until July 2002, would have been another reason why the decision was not made earlier.

In conclusion, it is clear that Mrs. Moss has been through a terrible ordeal. I am certainly sorry if the new procedures put in place as part of the transitional arrangements led to confusion or misunderstanding. The procedures now in place, which are operated by the National Probation Service, ensure that all victims of crime are fully informed and fully engaged, and have choice about the amount of information that they receive and the representations that they can make about offenders, particularly at the point of release from prison. I hope that my remarks have clarified some of the issues raised by my hon. Friend, but I would, of course, be happy to correspond with her or discuss the case further. If there is anything more that I can do to try to help clarify the decision-making process on the setting of the tariffs for the three men who were responsible for Michael Moss's murder, I shall be only too pleased to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Miners Compensation Scheme

1. Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): When the monitoring sub-committee for Wales on the miners compensation schemes for respiratory disease and vibration white finger last met; and what information was provided on payments made under the schemes for Wales and Bridgend. [201777]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): The Wales monitoring group met last Monday and reported progress for the whole of Wales showing that by mid-November a total of more than £451 million had been paid under both compensation schemes. Since then, the amount paid has increased by a further £3 million, bringing the total to more than £454 million.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank my hon. Friend for the great job that he is doing with the compensation claim scheme. Does he have any information for my constituency? As he has been at the forefront of dealing with the scourge of solicitors taking double payments, will he report on how successful he has been in that respect? What is being done to speed up smaller claims under the scheme?

Mr. Touhig: In my hon. Friend's constituency, £8.5 million has been paid under both schemes—£6.6 million under the respiratory disease scheme and £1.9 million under the vibration white finger scheme.

We have been working closely with the Law Society to ensure, in respect of solicitors who have taken payments from miners and their widows, that those payments, which belong not to the solicitors but to the miners and their widows, are returned. We are, however, having problems with claims farmers—people who are not solicitors but who act as intermediaries between claimants and solicitors—raking off very considerable amounts of money that do not belong to them. Unfortunately, several miners signed contracts, and it is very difficult to get that money back, although I believe that where solicitors have collaborated with claims farmers a liability should be pressed upon the solicitors.

As for my hon. Friend's other point, the Government have put to the judge a proposal for a fast-track payment scheme. The judge has approved the scheme, which will be voluntary and for live claimants only. It is hoped that it will start in the new year.

Adam Price (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr) (PC): Is the Minister aware that ex-miners who qualify under the Department of Trade and Industry's vibration white finger scheme are currently ineligible to claim industrial injuries disablement benefit because different criteria are used? The Industrial Injuries Advisory Council has called for that anomaly to be rectified. Will the Minister take that up with colleagues at the Department for Work and Pensions on behalf of the thousands of former miners in Wales who are affected?

Mr. Touhig: I am aware of the hon. Gentleman's point. I have written to colleagues as a constituency MP, and I know that it is a matter of concern to members of the monitoring group in Wales. I have no doubt that we will make representations, as he suggests.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Echoing the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths), I, too, pay tribute to the work of the DTI and the Law Society in returning money that rightfully belonged to miners, their widows and their families but was taken in percentages by claims handlers and other bodies. Can anything further be done to deal with that issue?

Mr. Touhig: I personally have made it clear on several occasions that those who are involved in taking money in that way are parasites who are preying on vulnerable people—elderly miners and their widows—by taking slices of money that do not belong to them. My hon. Friend refers to claims handlers and others. In Wales, those others include the union NACODS—the National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers—South Wales, which is led by a member of Plaid Cymru. That organisation has been taking 5 and 10 per cent. slices off the top of claimants' payments. That is not appropriate, in my view, and I hope that all Members will join me in urging NACODS South Wales to hand the money back to the miners and their widows, because that money belongs to them, not to the union.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): Many of my ex-miner constituents, particularly those from the Ystradgynlais area, welcome the speeding up of the process. However, the latest figures show that it will not be completed until 2014. Will the fast-track system have any impact on the final settlement date; and will the Minister write to me to let me know what that date will be?

Mr. Touhig: The judge has accepted the Government's proposals to speed up payments for live claims, and it is hoped that the process will begin next year. It is a voluntary scheme that a miner can choose on the advice of his solicitors, and perhaps his union. There will be banding tariffs of £1,400, £3,700 and £12,900 depending on the degree of disability. The miner will be able to choose whether to take the fast-track route.

There is an issue about how long it will take to pay off all the claimants—there are 90,000 claims in Wales and it will therefore take a considerable time. However, I am worried that those who have criticised the Government for, they say, delaying the final payments, and claim that the scheme will take too long to pay out now criticise us for introducing a fast-track scheme. I do not suggest that the hon. Gentleman does that, but it has happened. My only comment to those people is to recall the late Aneurin Bevan's words on such matters:

"you can't have the crown of thorns and the 30 pieces of silver."

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): Does the Minister have the total figure that NACODS South Wales has creamed off from the miners compensation fund? Has he any evidence about where the money ends up?

Mr. Touhig: That remains a deep mystery. I have taken up individual cases from my constituency with NACODS South Wales. I said that I did not believe that my constituents needed to pay the money and I succeeded in getting NACODS South Wales to say that it will not try to gain that money. I cannot imagine what on earth it wants to do with it. At the last count, it had 30-odd members. I have no idea why it needs to claim a vast amount of money from vulnerable miners and miners' widows. I repeat: the money does not belong to NACODS South Wales but to miners and miners' widows. It should give it back now.

Trade Links

2. Dr. Hywel Francis (Aberavon) (Lab): What discussions he has had with Cabinet and National Assembly for Wales Government colleagues on developing better trade and cultural links with Australia and New Zealand. [201778]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): In November, I visited Australia and New Zealand, where I took the opportunity to strengthen business and trade links between Wales and a part of the world that has great opportunities.

Dr. Francis: Several successful small and medium-sized enterprises in my constituency and throughout Wales are developing effective international trade links. Will the Secretary of State outline some of the advantages that accrue to SMEs as a result of his visits and thus counter some of the unnecessary and unwarranted criticisms of them by Welsh nationalists? Will he also enter into discussions with the First Minister of the Welsh Assembly Government to arrange a trade mission specifically for SMEs to eastern Asia and Australasia to counter the "fortress Wales" mentality that is being encouraged in certain quarters in Wales?

Mr. Hain: I agree with my hon. Friend that there is great potential for small business investment from overseas countries including New Zealand and Australia, which I visited recently and met representatives of small and large businesses. As a result of a visit to China in April on behalf of Wales, a company has invested in Wales, and others are following.

It is typically small minded of the nationalist group in the National Assembly to attack such visits, especially given that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) has said that Ministers should talk up Wales when they go abroad and the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) has said that we should use the instruments of the British state to promote Wales abroad more effectively. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy nods. He should sort out his Assembly group in Cardiff—he nods at that, too. [Interruption.] We will all help him to do that.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): What estimate has the Secretary of State made of the cost of his visits to Australia, New Zealand and China? How does he quantify the benefit of those visits to Wales? What plans does he have to visit Patagonia, where the people still speak Welsh?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman knows that, as I found in China, ministerial visits gain a higher level of access. According to the Welsh Development Agency, which organised the trip to China, there was greater access than ever to business leaders in Beijing and Shanghai. One direct investment resulted from the trip. According to the WDA, the same happened with the contacts that I had in Australia and New Zealand. It is my job as Secretary of State for Wales to bat for Wales and get more jobs for Wales. I shall continue to do that, despite Tory opposition.

Drugs

3. Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth) (Lab): What measures have been taken to combat illegal drug use in Wales. [201779]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): The Government take tackling illegal drug use extremely seriously. We work in partnership with a range of bodies, including the National Assembly, the police and the voluntary sector.

Mr. Edwards: I assure my hon. Friend that the Welsh Affairs Committee has received evidence from the chief constables of Wales about the success of Operation Tarian in combating illegal drug use. Will he join me in congratulating Gwent police on co-ordinating Operation Reptile and today's announcement of important seizures of drugs, arrests and the taking out of a significant drugs gang? Will he assure me that the Government will continue to support the police in their fight against the drugs trade?

Mr. Touhig: Yes, I certainly will do that. Indeed, I welcome the announcement today of Operation Reptile. My hon. Friend mentioned Operation Tarian, which came about as a result of the close collaboration between the Home Office, the Wales Office and the National Assembly. Operation Tarian is a police intelligence gathering unit whose aim is to prevent hard drugs from coming into Wales, and it is now in its second year of operation. In year one, 1.7 kg of heroin and cocaine were seized, representing assets worth about £1.7 million. So far this year, about 1 kg of heroin and cocaine have been seized, and 17 individuals have been convicted for supplying illegal drugs. The operation is making good progress and shows the determination of all of us—the Government, the police and the voluntary sector—who are working in partnership to combat this menace in society.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): I acknowledge the success of Operation Tarian, but there remains a serious drugs problem throughout Wales. The Gracious Speech mentioned intervention, which obviously is good, but may I remind the Minister that there are fewer than 40 rehabilitation beds in the whole of Wales? Regrettably, many towns in Wales need 40 beds each. This is a mammoth task. Will the Minister redouble his efforts to ensure that this matter is properly resourced in Wales?

Mr. Touhig: Yes, I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. Indeed, he raised it at the Welsh Grand Committee yesterday as well. The drug intervention programme that was launched last year aims to get drug misuse offenders out of crime and into treatment, and the Home Office has made about £5 million available to the Assembly in Wales for that purpose. The Assembly has also launched its own tackling substance misuse partnership approach scheme, which has five modules: community prescribing, needle and syringe exchange, residential rehabilitation, in-patient detoxification and co-occurring mental health and substance misuse. All these measures are working together to tackle this matter, but I recognise that intervention must come as quickly as possible. It is so important to identify that window of opportunity when someone wants to kick their drug habit, so that the system can be there to get them off drugs and bring them the support they need.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): The Minister is right to say that drug and alcohol abuse is an escalating problem in Wales. There are only two rehabilitation homes registered for substance misuse in Wales, yet Rhoserchan is threatened with closure while deaths directly caused by illegal drug misuse in Wales have doubled since 1997. What will the Minister do to prevent this home from closing?

Mr. Touhig: I am not aware of the case to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but he will be aware that tackling this issue is a matter for my colleagues in the Assembly. They have certainly increased the funding for combating substance misuse across Wales. They have created the substance misuse action fund, and substantially increased the amount of funding available from £3.3 million in 2002–03 to £18.5 million by 2007–08. That is an increase of 550 per cent. I regularly have meetings with the Assembly Minister responsible for social affairs, and I value and appreciate the interventions and programmes that the Assembly is progressing. However, I shall certainly take note of the issue that the hon. Gentleman has raised, and if it is appropriate to do so I shall raise it with my colleague Minister in the Assembly.

Antisocial Behaviour

4. Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): If he will make a statement on progress in dealing with antisocial behaviour in Wales. [201780]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): Following the Government's lead, the police, community safety partnerships and others in Wales are increasingly using the wide range of powers that we have put in place to tackle antisocial behaviour, and 114 antisocial behaviour orders have been issued in Wales as of June 2004.

Alan Howarth: Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in five wards of Newport, East, crime has been reduced by 15 per cent in six months, thanks to the extra police officers that the Government have provided, and to their deployment to individual wards, enabling them to develop much closer local knowledge? Is he further aware that my constituents greatly look forward to the benefits of tackling antisocial behaviour that will come from the additional police community support officers whom the Government have just announced they will fund from the neighbourhood policing fund?

Mr. Hain: Indeed, and the truth is that it is Labour that is making Wales more safe and secure, in our local neighbourhoods and right across the country, and tackling antisocial behaviour despite opposition from the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives to some of the measures that we have introduced in the House of Commons. We are also recruiting extra community support officers—300 are already in place, with more to come—and we have 800 extra police officers as well. I am delighted that Newport is one of the new action areas that are leading the drive against antisocial behaviour.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): Findings from the 2003–04 crime survey report that 92 per cent. of people think that antisocial behaviour has not improved. The chief constable of North Wales told the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs that ASBOs were taking up to four days of court time, and in a Swansea school a cancer victim had her hair set on fire. I am sure that the Minister was appalled by that. Why is he the only one who thinks that things are getting better in Wales?

Mr. Hain: If the hon. Gentleman represented an area in Wales, he would know that things are getting better because of the action that we are taking. The truth is that antisocial behaviour, not just in Wales but right across the UK, is a serious problem and has been growing over the decades. We are the Government who are taking action to introduce more antisocial behaviour orders, and working with local authorities, and we will continue to do that despite the sniping from the Conservatives.

Mrs. Betty Williams (Conwy) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that antisocial behaviour was tackled in the walled town of Conwy by using a dispersal order earlier this year. That was a success, as my constituents do not now feel as intimidated as they used to when going out to evening events. Does he have any data available at this stage to show how successful the use of dispersal orders is in Wales, and whether they are widely used in the rest of Wales?

Mr. Hain: I do not have that data to hand, but I agree that such orders can be extremely successful, and ought to be pursued by local police officers and the authorities generally. The point is that they are used right at the beginning, before antisocial behaviour takes hold and wrecks a neighbourhood. Measures are now available, and they should be used by all concerned.

Department for Work and Pensions

5. Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): What discussions he has had with the First Minister of the National Assembly for Wales regarding job losses in the Department for Work and Pensions within objective 1 areas in Wales. [201781]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The First Minister and I have discussed the effect of the efficiency review on civil service jobs in Wales, and the new Department for Work and Pensions contact centre jobs coming to Wales, including 250 jobs at Bangor.

Hywel Williams: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. I am surprised that he did not mention the fact that 2,600 jobs are being destroyed in Wales by this change, 1,700 of which are in objective 1 areas—the areas that the Government define as being most in need of economic regeneration and as being poor. In that regard, what has he done to make sure that the interests of Wales are fully considered when Government policy is discussed in Westminster?

Mr. Hain: We do not accept the figure that the hon. Gentleman quotes in respect of likely job changes and job losses. We are seeking greater efficiency by shifting jobs and resources from back-office staff to front-line services. I would have thought that he welcomed that. I recently met the leaders of the Public and Commercial Services Union in Wales. There are 430 new Department for Work and Pensions jobs in contact centres in Pembroke dock, Bangor and Bridgend, 500 new DWP jobs already in the pension centre in Swansea, 600 new Office for National Statistics jobs coming to Newport, 385 new DWP jobs already in Wrexham and 85 new Customs and Revenue jobs already in Cardiff. Jobs are changing, but more and more investment is bringing more and more jobs into Wales, across the public and private sectors.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Wrexham welcomes the redeployment of jobs concluded in February 2004, but there is concern about the integration of Jobcentre Plus and the Pension Service in Wrexham, which could lead to redundancies in the town. Will my right hon. Friend have a word with the relevant Minister in the Department for Work and Pensions to ensure that there are no compulsory redundancies in the Pension Service in Wrexham?

Mr. Hain: I will certainly investigate that matter. The objective has been to avoid compulsory redundancies, and the recent discussions with the unions concerned have sought to achieve that objective.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The Chancellor says that he wants to move city-based public sector jobs out to the regions, including to Wrexham. Staff in local centres such as that in Newtown fear that their jobs might also be moved to Wrexham, which, ironically, would mean shifting work from smaller to larger conurbations. I do not expect the Secretary of State to make policy at the Dispatch Box, but would he be willing to meet a delegation of Department for Work and Pensions staff to discuss their concerns and the case for keeping work at existing rural locations such as Newtown?

Mr. Hain: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point, and we will consider a meeting. He will also want to know, however, as I said a moment ago, that I met the leaders of the PCS and our discussions and contacts will remain.

Mr. Bill Wiggin (Leominster) (Con): The Secretary of State was talking about the number of jobs created in north Wales. Whether the number of jobs lost from the Department for Work and Pensions is 2,600 or some other number, it will mean that people will now have to telephone a call centre in Bangor. Will that achieve better delivery of front-line services, or will it experience the same problems as out-of-hours general practitioner services?

Mr. Hain: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman asks the question, as there is Welsh language provision for the Bangor call centre.

The truth is that we are providing more and more jobs in the public sector, in front-line services and in the private sector as a result of the dynamism of the Welsh economy. That contrasts with the dreadful record under the Conservatives. Talking of Conservative policies, may I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he cleared with the shadow Chancellor the fact that the Welsh budget will not be affected by the £35 billion of savings and cuts that the shadow Chancellor wants to make? England, not Wales, will have to bear the cost of those savings.

Dee Estuary

6. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with English local authorities and environmental bodies regarding dredging in the Dee estuary. [201782]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): Consideration of the port of Mostyn's dredging proposals is a matter for the National Assembly, the Environment Agency and the Department for Transport. As my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have taken a close interest in this matter.

Mr. Chapman: Does my hon. Friend agree that given the environmental importance of the estuary, the habitats directive demands full consideration of the alternatives to dredging? Does he share my hope that when the Environment Agency Wales reaches a "minded to" position, it will take full and balanced account both of realistic commercial, but perhaps temporary, considerations and of the permanent need to protect the ecology of the estuary?

Mr. Touhig: I know that my hon. Friend has been a strong advocate for his constituents on this issue. The Environment Agency recently submitted an application for a regulating order to manage the cockle beds in the estuary. The area concerned covers both England and Wales, although of course the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs is in the lead in this case. DEFRA and my colleagues in the Welsh Assembly are preparing a draft order, which should be ready for public consultation in the new year. I know that my hon. Friend will want to be kept closely informed of developments.

Small Businesses

7. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): What representations he has received from small business organisations on central Government regulation of small firms in Wales. [201783]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State and I have regular meetings with representatives of the business community to discuss issues that concern them.

Mr. Bellingham: Does the Minister agree that the European Union agency workers directive will be highly damaging for small firms in Wales? What is his view of it, and what advice has he given Welsh Labour MEPs?

Mr. Hain: As the hon. Gentleman knows, last week the Chancellor announced new measures to ensure that small businesses are not affected by over-burdensome EU regulations. He may also know that the small business sector has had a very successful record in Wales recently. The Welsh business survival rate is higher than the United Kingdom average. We had 7,000 business start-ups funded by the Assembly in the last financial year, and in October we had the 19th consecutive month of business growth.

As the Leader of the Opposition is now present, may I ask him whether he cleared the fact that the ring-fenced Welsh budget will not—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Rosindell.

NHS Dentistry

8. Mr. Andrew Rosindell (Romford) (Con): What discussions he has had with the National Assembly for Wales on improving the provision of NHS dentistry in Wales. [201784]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): I shall be having a bilateral meeting on Monday.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Romford is allowed a supplementary question, but he appears not to want to ask one.

Antisocial Behaviour

11. Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): What discussions he has had with the First Minister on combating antisocial behaviour in Wales. [201787]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Don Touhig): My right hon. Friend and I have regular discussions with the First Minister about matters affecting Wales.

Following the Government's lead, the police, community safety partnerships and others in Wales are increasingly using the wide range of powers to tackle antisocial behaviour.

Mark Tami: I welcome the many moves that have been made to deal with antisocial behaviour, but does my hon. Friend agree that there is still progress to be made, and that we can learn from the success of many areas, including Manchester, in making the legislation more effective?

Mr. Touhig: I certainly agree with the point that my hon. Friend makes. The important message to get across is that this Government are tackling the problems of antisocial behaviour in our communities. We are putting in the resources and funding, providing extra police officers and community support officers, and introducing the appropriate legislation. That should be contrasted with the policy of the Conservatives, who are committed to £35 billion-worth of cuts, which would wreck our public services and destroy all that we are doing to combat antisocial behaviour. Of course, the Liberal Democrats campaign against antisocial behaviour in the constituencies, but vote against every such measure that we bring before the House.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Indonesia

Q1. [202998] Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): what plans he has to visit Indonesia in the next three months to meet President Bambang Susilo Yudhoyono to discuss British support for, and co-operation with, Indonesia in the campaign against the threat of terrorism.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I have no current plans to meet the President of Indonesia. However, senior officials have been to Indonesia for discussions with the new Government on a range of issues, including co-operation on counter-terrorism. A Foreign Office Minister will attend the European Union and Association of South East Asian Nations meeting in Indonesia in March 2005.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank my right hon. Friend for that positive response. He doubtless does not need to be told that if terrorism is to be defeated in Indonesia and the wider world, it is vital that the newly elected President Bambang Susilo Yudhoyono be given our full support in his efforts to continue the reform process, to develop good governance and justice, to fight corruption and to promote sustainable economic prosperity. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that his Ministers in the Department of Trade and Industry, the Department for International Development and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office work closely to encourage trade missions and British investment in Indonesia?

The Prime Minister: Well, we will give the President—[Interruption]—every support. In particular, we welcome and applaud Indonesia's counter-terrorism efforts, including the detention of more than 100 members of the Jemaah Islamiyah organisation, the arrest of some of the perpetrators of the Marriott attacks in Bali, and the investigation into the attack on the Australian embassy. The point that my hon. Friend makes is absolutely right: it is important that we intensify counter-terrorism efforts, since Indonesia, as well as many other countries, faces the threat of terrorism. But I also agree that it is when we tackle poverty and economic development in Indonesia that we will also make an impact on the underlying causes of terrorism.

Engagements

Q2. [202999] Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 8 December.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Mr. Swayne: At the beginning of this week, Jonathan Baume, the leader of the First Division Association—the mandarins' union—was quoted on Radio 5 as saying that, at times, No. 10 and the Chancellor's office have competing and conflicting agendas, and that civil servants and Ministers are having to make sense of this battle. Why did he say that?

The Prime Minister: I cannot answer why he said it, but what I can say is that I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity to point out that under this Government and this Chancellor, we have had 2 million extra jobs; the lowest levels of inflation, unemployment and mortgage rates for 30 years; a strong economy; investment in health and education; and falling crime. That is surely enough to please even the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Mike Wood (Batley and Spen) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will know that PC Ian Broadhurst, a constituent of mine, was shot dead in Leeds on Boxing day last year. It now transpires that the bullets used in that killing and in the attempted murder of two of his colleagues were home-made. The components and the machine necessary to produce that ammunition were bought over the counter, with no questions, no vetting and apparently no checks whatever. Will my right hon. Friend pledge his and his Government's support for the campaign—launched by PC Broadhurst's mother, Cindy Eaton—to have this loophole in the law closed quickly?

The Prime Minister: Once again I extend my sympathy to the family of my hon. Friend's constituent and say how sorry I am for the situation in which they find themselves after a tragic and brutal murder. We are studying carefully the facts of the particular case and are aware of the campaign on behalf of the family. We hope to make a response shortly. I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that the way in which these items are sold over the counter is a very important issue, and we need to ensure that the law is tough enough to deal with that problem.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): Yesterday, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner said that he totally supports the private Member's Bill to change the law on self-defence against burglars. Will the Government support it too?

The Prime Minister: What we have said is that we will consult chief police officers, the Crown Prosecution Service and, indeed, the Attorney-General. I entirely understand the concern about this particular issue and I share the general view of the Metropolitan Police Commissioner. If we get the right response from those people, we will, of course, support a change in the law. As I understand it, the particular private Member's Bill has not yet been published. We will have to consider the best way to take it forward, but I entirely share and understand the concern and hope that we can reach agreement on it.

Mr. Howard: I am very glad to hear that, once again, where we lead, the Prime Minister follows. Can the Prime Minister tell us why the Lord Chancellor said this week that the law did not need to be changed?

The Prime Minister: First, let me deal with the issue of the right hon. and learned Gentleman leading and us following. The Home Secretary said that he was prepared to review the law on this matter a couple of months ago, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman jumped on the bandwagon only when he thought that there was something in it for him. I would have thought that we could deal with this issue perfectly sensibly. I entirely understand the concern. The Law Commission looked into it and said that the law did not need changing. I believe that the number of circumstances in which someone was convicted after taking on a burglar in their home would be very limited. None the less, in the light of recent concern, it is worth looking into whether we need to clarify the law in order to send a clear signal to people that we are on the side of the victim, not the offender.

Mr. Howard: The right hon. Gentleman talks about bandwagons, so I will tell him about bandwagons. This is the man who joined Michael Foot's bandwagon to get into the Labour party; joined the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament bandwagon to get on in the Labour party; and did over his Chancellor's bandwagon to take over the leadership of the Labour party. He is Mr. Bandwagon. Now let us get back to the question, which the Prime Minister manifestly did not answer. The Lord Chancellor said this week that the law did not need to be changed. Why do his Government say one thing one day, and something else the next?

The Prime Minister: What discomfited the right hon. and learned Gentleman is that I gave him an answer that he did not expect in reply to his first question. There is genuine public concern about this matter and we want to meet it. I am sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman does as well, so rather than engaging in rather absurd point scoring across the Dispatch Box, why not simply agree that, on the basis of advice from chief police officers, the Crown Prosecution Service and the Attorney-General, we will bring forward proposals, consult the other parties in the House and try to reach a sensible agreement on this matter?

Let me make one thing perfectly clear to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. It is as a result of the measures taken by the Government that crime is down, burglary is down and extra numbers of police are on our streets. If we took the measures that he and his shadow Chancellor are going to implement, we would be cutting the number of police officers on our streets.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the hand of history now rests on the shoulders of the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley)? Does he further agree that that hon. Gentleman should accept the leadership that the people of Northern Ireland have placed in his hands and say yes?

The Prime Minister: I think that the issue will be very clear once we publish the documents and proposals that we have been working on in the past few weeks. As the House will understand, we have worked extremely hard over the past seven years to secure peace in Northern Ireland, with power shared between all parts of the community and all parties, based on a commitment to exclusively peaceful and democratic means. The essence of that agreement is now in place, but the question is whether it can be implemented in such a way that it gains sufficient confidence on both sides of the community. We will carry on doing everything that we possibly can to bring that about.

I pay tribute to everyone who has been engaged in this process over the past few months. I think that people will see later today that we have made immense progress, and what I have learned above all else in respect of Northern Ireland over the past few years is that any setback—in any shape or form—should simply be a reason for us to redouble our efforts and carry on trying.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): Given that the Prime Minister has admitted that the Government will fail to meet their climate change targets, how does he expect the British public to have faith in his declared ambition to lead the industrialised world—including President Bush—in tackling the climate change issue successfully, once and for all?

The Prime Minister: First, I want to make it clear that there are two targets, both of which relate to 1990. The Kyoto targets are our international obligation, and we will meet them—indeed, we have met them already. We are one of the very few countries in the world that will meet those targets, and we can be proud of that. It is true that we set an even tougher target for ourselves on CO_2 emissions. Instead of a 20 per cent. reduction, we will achieve one of 14 per cent., but there are years to go before we must reach the higher target. As we say today, we do not accept that we will not meet that target, but again, we must make sure that we take the measures necessary to meet it.

Mr. Kennedy: The problem is that all the plans and strategies that the Prime Minister has reiterated this morning would have sounded great in the first seven days of a newly elected Labour Government, but we are now in the seventh year of this Labour Government. What practical and effective steps does the Prime Minister propose to take on issues such as tackling aircraft pollution, reforming the climate change levy successfully, and achieving a reduction in domestic energy consumption? Is not this yet another example of the Prime Minister talking a very good game and persuading himself, but failing to deliver in the end?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman has rather glossed over what I actually said, which is that we will meet our Kyoto targets. On CO_2 reduction, we have set a target of 20 per cent. and are on track to achieve a reduction of 14 per cent. We must do even more, but I shall list some of the things that we are doing. We have set a target for renewable energy levels by 2010. We are putting an obligation on energy suppliers to produce an increasing proportion of energy from renewables. We have the climate change levy, and I hope that the whole House will support us in maintaining that, but I remind the right hon. Gentleman that we had to force it through when we introduced it. We have the emissions trading agreement, which is also extremely important, and the measures announced in the pre-Budget report for energy efficiency innovation, on which we are spending hundreds of millions of pounds. It is not true that we will fail to meet our international target: we will meet it. We have more to do to meet our domestic UK targets, but we are taking the measures necessary to do that.

Law and Order

Q3. [203000] Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): When he next intends to visit Nottingham, North to review progress of cross-departmental working on law and order issues; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have no current plans to do so. However, I am always pleased to see good progress in cross-departmental working on law and order issues. As my hon. Friend will know, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's full ministerial team visited the region on 4 and 5 November. They saw some 26 projects in the region, including several focusing on community safety. They also engaged in discussions with local people. That is precisely why it is important that we continue with cross-departmental working, particularly in order to reduce antisocial behaviour in our communities.

Mr. Allen: The Government are doing all that they can from the centre to tackle law and order problems, including introducing welcome legislation and massive resource provision. However, that must have an echo at a local level, with people being reunited with the criminal justice system. Most people in my constituency do not know what the Crown Prosecution Service is, or the probation service or magistracy. Will my right hon. Friend accept that the next phase of our attack on crime must be to organise a crusade to link every tenants association and neighbourhood watch back to the criminal justice system, so that we can effectively progress the fight against crime?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend and that is why the local criminal justice boards were established. It is obvious, when we look at antisocial behaviour, that many communities are now using the extra powers and the extra police officers and community support officers, and they are getting local partnerships working. The powers are there and the resources are there, but—he is right—it does require local people on the ground to use those powers and resources adequately. What we can and do provide from the centre is the framework within which that can happen. Many hon. Members will know from their constituents that even though there are still major problems with antisocial behaviour, real and good work is being done by the police, local authorities and others on the ground to tackle that menace.

Engagements

Q4. [203001] Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): I can tell my right hon. Friend that the extra investment in health in Dartford is extremely welcome, with an accident and emergency extension and a £9 million treatment centre being built at my 3-star Darent Valley hospital, and a £2 million local improvement finance trust—or LIFT—programme to modernise general practices in the area. As he is aware, the Thames gateway is a massive regeneration and growth area with significant projections for new jobs, housing and population. Can he reassure my constituents that the extra investment needed in infrastructure, especially in health, education and transport, will be sustainable in the future?

The Prime Minister: I can give my hon. Friend that assurance because, as part of the Thames gateway project, we will ensure that there is the proper investment in the infrastructure in those areas. He is right to say that the improvements will come from the LIFT programme, but they will also come from the reduction in the waiting lists, the investment in hospital buildings, and the increases in the number of nurses and doctors, which are yielding results. As one of the international reports indicated this week in relation to health care, the UK now has one of the fastest improving health care systems anywhere in the world.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): In Labour's first term, crime rose, detection rates fell and the number of asylum seekers more than doubled. Presumably the Prime Minister agrees with his current Home Secretary, who thinks that after four years of Labour Government he inherited "a giant mess"?

The Prime Minister: At least he never said there was "something of the night" about him. Let me remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that in our first term crime fell under this Government, and under this Home Secretary crime continues to fall and we have record numbers of police officers—as opposed to the record of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who cut the numbers of police officers. Not merely have we got record police numbers: we have community support officers as well.

Mr. Howard: I shall tell the Prime Minister what his Home Secretary says about me. He thinks that I was the first Home Secretary to focus on cutting crime. That is what he says. Now I shall tell the Prime Minister what his Home Secretary thinks about the current Foreign Secretary's time at the Home Office. [Laughter.] Wait for it. He says:

"It was worse than any of us had imagined possible. God alone knows what Jack did for four years. I am simply unable to comprehend how he could have left it as it was. It was a giant mess."

He does not stop there. He thinks that the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport is weak; the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry does not think strategically; and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills has not developed as expected. He also says that the Prime Minister does not like being told the truth and—as no doubt the Prime Minister will agree—that the Chancellor is a bully. Could the Prime Minister please arrange for the Home Secretary to make regular reports on his Cabinet colleagues and place them in the Library?

Hon. Members: More!

The Prime Minister: I think that we have had quite enough. Since we are talking about records as well as the comments that people make—[Hon. Members: "Oh!"] Well, the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not actually want to discuss the alternative records of his time in office and our time in office, but that is what I am going to do. When he was responsible for employment, it went down and unemployment went up by 1 million—[Hon. Members: "Ah!"] That is right, is it not? When the Home Secretary was in charge of employment, unemployment fell by 500,000. When we were in office, we increased the investment in health and education, we got mortgage rates down and we got inflation and unemployment down. People remember not the comments but the record, and it is the record of the right hon. and learned Gentleman's time in government that we will concentrate on between now and the election.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon) (Lab): Given that absolute poverty kills a child every three seconds, has the Prime Minister seen the "Make Poverty History" early-day motion, which has more signatures than any other on the Order Paper? What is he doing in preparation to make next year the year when the international political will is created to make poverty history?

The Prime Minister: The main focus will obviously be the UK's G8 presidency. The Commission for Africa report will be published in March, and will focus not just on increasing levels of aid but on removing trade barriers for the poorest countries in the world, by making sure that we have the right framework for conflict resolution in Africa, since it is often conflict in Africa that creates disease, famine and death. We will also make sure that we are reducing debt levels. In other words, there will be a comprehensive plan for Africa. I hope that we can get it agreed at the G8 and then, literally, take it out to every part of the international community and get the necessary action. I know that my hon. Friend will agree that we are leading the way on these issues and as a result of the successful management of the economy, as well as increasing investment in our own health and education services, we have been able to treble aid to Africa, to reach £1 billion a year, which ties in very well with the campaign that will be launched right across the country to make poverty history—a campaign that we fully support.

Q5. [203002] Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): If a police officer makes an improper expenses claim, he will face disciplinary action. He then has the right of appeal to the Home Secretary. How can this Home Secretary sit in judgment on any such appeal?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. If any claims are made, they can be submitted to the normal authorities here and investigated.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): One of the proposals in the Queen's Speech was for a Bill on consumer credit, and that proposal received almost universal acclaim from consumer groups, Citizens Advice and the majority of the financial services industry. Given such widespread backing, may I urge the Prime Minister to ensure that the Bill is introduced sufficiently early in the Session to give it a good chance of becoming law if by some chance there were to be an early Dissolution of this Parliament?

The Prime Minister: It is important that we give consumers proper protection and we are doing that. We shall also be providing money to help more people to establish bank accounts and to deal with some of the problems of financial exclusion from the banking system. The measures that the Chancellor announced last week will make a major impact in that regard, but I agree with my hon. Friend that the Bill would be an important piece of legislation and I hope that it will command support right across the House as that would hasten its progress.

Q6. [203003] Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): As the Prime Minister will know, by next summer all councils must have held compulsory ballots of their tenants on stock transfer. The ballot options are financially rigged by the Government against the option of staying with the council rather than opting for a housing association or private finance initiative landlord. Will the Prime Minister explain to my constituents in Chesterfield, a quarter of whom are council tenants, and to his own Back Benchers, why he and his Government have such a dogmatic, ideological prejudice against those who democratically vote to remain council tenants?

The Prime Minister: That is a very odd point to make. We are giving people a vote; I think that there have been more than 150 already, and 70 per cent. or more voted in favour of the change. People should be able to make up their minds; where they vote for change, they believe that it is in their interests. The hon. Gentleman should allow his constituents the right to vote on that, as the Government's purpose is actually to give his constituents the chance to decide their own future.

Q7. [203004] Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Not a road or pavement in any town or city in the country is not smeared and disfigured with great white blobs of chewing gum. What penalties will the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill impose on people who drop chewing gum in the streets? Why do not manufacturers sell chewing gum in packets that contain a slot in which to put used gum; and should not the packets have a warning showing the penalty for dropping chewing gum in the streets? Perhaps the manufacturers should pay for cleaning up the mess that their customers create.

The Prime Minister: I had not quite appreciated what a social evil chewing gum was until my hon. Friend made that impassioned plea. Of course, there are provisions in respect of litter in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, but they are part of a general series of measures that will allow local communities to deal with issues such as fly-tipping, abandoned cars, graffiti—the things that really degrade and devalue the look of an area—and along with the other measures that the Home Secretary has announced, will result in the most comprehensive programme of measures on antisocial behaviour that this country has ever seen. Many people, including some hon. Members, were doubtful about the importance of those measures on antisocial behaviour, but they now recognise that they are actually working in communities up and down the country.

Q8. [203005] Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): Does the Prime Minister accept that, for this country to comply with its international legal obligations, we must hold a full, independent inquiry into the number of civilian casualties in Iraq since the invasion last year?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept that. In our view the figures from the Iraqi Ministry of Health, which has surveyed the hospitals there, constitute the most accurate survey that there is, but me just make this point to the hon. Gentleman and, through him, to the authors of the letter today: those who are killing innocent people in Iraq today—those who are responsible for innocent people dying—are the terrorists and insurgents who want to stop the elections happening in Iraq. Any action that the multinational force or the Iraqi army is taking in Iraq is intended to defeat those people, who are blowing up innocent people, preventing people from joining the police force and killing innocent aid workers—killing anyone trying to make the country better.

So let us be quite clear about this. If we want to stop any civilian deaths in Iraq, the best way to do so is for the hon. Gentleman and others to come behind the electoral process, come behind the UN-appointed Iraqi Government and ensure that we stop the terrorism and start the democracy.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): By the middle of next year, four new schools will be built in my constituency—three new primary schools and one secondary school—and 24 schools have been involved in an education action zone. Last week, they celebrated the success of that education action zone. They are now moving into school clusters. Will my right hon. Friend assure me that the support for the education action zone will remain there for the school clusters in the future?

The Prime Minister: I can assure my hon. Friend that the record investment going into our schools will remain in place. That money is set aside. Over the next few years, there will be a massive injection of capital funding. In any constituency in this country, we can see the difference in school buildings, extra computers, extra teachers and extra classroom assistants—of course, that turns up in the best results for 11-year-olds, GCSEs and A-levels that this country has had—and every single penny piece of that investment was voted against by the Conservative party.

Q9. [203006] Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): May I ask the Prime Minister a question of which I have given him notice? Is he aware that less than half of home-owning pensioner households are claiming the council tax benefit to which they are entitled, so a staggering £750 million goes unclaimed each year? Having been successful in the ballot for private Members' Bills, I intend to introduce a one-clause Bill that, I hope, would better inform and better enable those pensioners to claim that council tax benefit. Will the Government support such a Bill?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, on the support for the Bill, we would have to see the specifics of it, and I understand that the hon. Gentleman is in discussion with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions. Incidentally, I thank him for notice of his question. Of course we support the principle of getting as many people as possible the benefits to which they are entitled, and we have made certain changes both to the forms that people have and in relation to the information campaign, to ensure that people get the information that they require. I am afraid that we will have to look very carefully at whether we can go further and engage with the statutory responsibility in the way he describes—there are obviously a lot of ramifications—but in general, of course we want to ensure that the more generous payments that we are giving to people, particularly with things such as pension credit, actually get to them. But I am afraid that, on the specifics of the Bill, we will have to wait until the outcome of the considerations that he and the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions must have.

Q10. [203007] Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Given the present security situation in Iraq, is my right hon. Friend confident that the January elections can take place?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I am. I emphasise that the elections are overseen by—indeed, the terms of them are dictated by—the United Nations. The United Nations people engaged in the process believe that the elections can take place. Somewhere in the region of more than 200 parties have registered to participate in the elections. All the information that we have from people in Iraq is that they are desperate to take part in the elections.

This is a good moment to talk about elections in Iraq, the day after President Karzai was sworn in in Afghanistan, a country that for years and years was a failed state, run by a gang of murderers, thugs and fanatics. It is now a country in which millions of people—men and women—can vote. That is the same vision as we have for Iraq. If we succeed in that vision, Iraq and the world will be a more stable and safer place.

Q11. [203008] Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Is the Prime Minister proud of the measure stealthily slipped into the pre-Budget report, whereby the tax on orphan assets in life insurance policies is to be raised to 30 per cent. from 10 per cent.? Is he aware that the chief executive of Norwich Union, the biggest life insurer in the country, calls that a disgraceful clobbering of his policyholders, and that it will cost them £150 million over the life of their policies? Is he not satisfied that damage enough has been done with the removal of dividend interest tax relief on pension funds? Why clobber the pensioners and retiring people twice?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept that. There have been discussions with all the institutions over a period of time on the issue. There is a balance of funding review, as the hon. Gentleman knows, and we should await its outcome.

Orders of the Day

Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill

[Relevant document: The Ninth Report from the Treasury Committee, Session 2003–04, on The Merger of Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue, HC 556.]

Order for Second Reading read.

12.31 pm

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill implements the principal recommendations of the O'Donnell review of the revenue departments. It brings together the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise to create a single new department called Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs. It also establishes a new, fully independent prosecutions office, the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office. This office will provide independent scrutiny of all Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs prosecution cases, and will conduct prosecutions where appropriate.

It is principally a machinery-of-Government Bill to implement sensible reforms to tax administration, and I was pleased to hear the shadow Chancellor support that when he said in the debate on the Loyal Address last week:

"The Treasury's Bill on the merger of the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise carries our general support".—[Official Report, 1 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 636.]

I therefore look forward to a constructive and useful debate on the detailed measures. Before I go on to discuss those, I should like to take a moment to thank members of the Treasury Committee for their excellent work, which culminated in the recently published ninth report, exploring the issues around the merger of Customs and the Inland Revenue.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Will the Minister comment briefly on the employment implications of the proposals? Will they be substantial or limited? Can she give us any idea?

Dawn Primarolo: I shall address that in the course of my remarks. If the hon. Gentleman forgives me, however, I will continue to pay fulsome tribute to the Treasury Committee's report.

I welcome the Committee's endorsement of a pragmatic approach to legislating for the creation of the new department. I have carefully considered all the points contained in its thorough report and will respond to them. Although it is not a matter for the Bill, for completeness I shall quickly clear up one concern that the Committee raised about the clarity of ministerial accountability arrangements for the new department. David Varney, the prospective chairman of Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs, wrote to the Committee Deputy Chairman, who I am pleased to see is in his place, on 15 October to help with this matter. The position is clear. I shall be the departmental Minister for HMRC, and all Treasury Ministers have lead responsibility for specific matters. Such arrangements are normal in central Government departments. We regularly review such arrangements and, as suggested by the Treasury Select Committee, we shall review these arrangements as the merger progresses.

I shall return in more detail to the other points raised by the Committee in the course of my remarks and, no doubt, as we discuss the relevant clauses in more detail in Committee. As I have said, I am pleased that the shadow Chancellor and the Treasury Committee are not alone in their support for integration. Over the summer my officials have conducted a programme of consultation with representatives of the new Department's stakeholder groups to inform the development of the Bill. A summary of that consultation is reproduced as an annex to the regulatory impact assessment. I am pleased to say that support for integration was almost universal.

I shall explain what I mean by integration. I am talking about a major change in the way in which taxes and revenues are administered. This is not about shuffling a few Whitehall deckchairs, creating a new department and then assuming that the job is done. It is far more fundamental than that, as the Treasury Committee highlighted. I am talking about a process that goes beyond a simple merger of departments. It is a process of real integration, of bringing the two existing departments together and developing better new ways of working. It is about delivering truly joined-up services to taxpayers, and about creating an organisation that can meet taxpayers' needs because it can look across their affairs and tailor its services to their particular circumstances.

The question of meeting taxpayers' needs is a key one. That means that integration must mean different things in different parts of the business—another point touched on by the Treasury Select Committee—with parts of the business with very similar activities and remits merging in their entirety. For example, there are the corporate services; business areas with similar stakeholders or functions fully integrating their structures and activities—for example, the large business service—and other parts of the business that deal with a unique group of stakeholders not shared by other parts of HMRC connecting into the new Department structure. One example is some of the frontier protection work.

That sounds like a huge job and of course it is. Integration cannot be delivered overnight nor can it be delivered in this Bill alone. I shall give the House some idea of the scale of the task.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Before the right hon. Lady moves on, I thank her for mentioning frontier protection work. The Bill proposes the saving of 16,000 posts by 2007–08. There is already considerable dissatisfaction with the extent to which our borders and ports are left open to smuggling. The Bill appears to be driven more by revenue than by the prevention of smuggling. Will the right hon. Lady assure me that our ports will be better protected as a result of the Bill and not less well protected?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman confuses two subjects, one of which is not connected with the Bill. When he refers to reductions in staff across the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise and to savings of 16,000 posts, he is referring to the Gershon efficiency savings, not the Bill. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the regulatory impact assessment, he will see that the proposals surrounding the merger are very different from those that he has suggested.

I hope to make it clear in the debate that the Bill takes every opportunity to protect the current functions of both departments. It involves a change in the machinery of government to allow the departments to start to come together and, over the period of integration, many issues will need to be addressed. However, I absolutely assure the hon. Gentleman that the figure of 16,000 that he quoted is not correct.

Mr. Turner: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I will give way again, but if the hon. Gentleman looks at the regulatory impact assessment—I do not believe that he has it with him—he will see that figures are given for the expected savings across all the departments. They involve 100,000 staff and they will not have the impact that he fears.

Mr. Turner: I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for giving way again. Among other things, the press notice issued by her Department on 23 November said:

"Through delivering a single Department, the Bill would . . . Enable the new department to meet its demanding Public Service Agreements and realise efficiency savings, with integration contributing 3,000 posts towards total savings of 16,000".

Dawn Primarolo: Yes, but if the hon. Gentleman will allow me to make progress, I can specifically address that point. We are discussing the merger Bill today, not the efficiency savings that are in the agreements arising out of the Gershon review. My speech will touch specifically on the reductions in staff anticipated as a result of the departments being merged and duplication being removed. I will also touch on safeguards, efficiencies and the delivery of services. If the hon. Gentleman is a little patient, I will be happy to give way to him again if he feels that my remarks have not addressed the points that he has raised.

The Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise are among the oldest Government departments. The Inland Revenue can trace its history back more than 300 years—it is a rather junior partner in some senses—while a nationally organised customs system dates back to the 13th century.

The new department will have more than 30 million taxpayers and stakeholders, of which 4 million are businesses. HMRC will collect more than £400 billion a year in receipts and pay out over £25 billion in tax credits and child benefit. The costs of running HMRC will amount to some £4.8 billion a year, and the department will have nearly 100,000 staff; 20 per cent. of the civil service. It is a huge task and I very much understand the hon. Gentleman's point about the continuation of services through the period of change.

Given the huge task, it is not particularly surprising that the Treasury Committee has suggested that further primary legislation is required fully to implement integration. Of course, as we the start the process of integration, I cannot confirm what will be needed, but I can say that we will be doing further work with David Varney, the prospective chairman of the new department, to look at how it should manage its business. If legislative change is needed to support our conclusions, it will be brought forward in an appropriate form for consideration by the House.

Delivering real, meaningful integration is a process that should be measured in years, not weeks. That has been acknowledged by all those who have commented on the Bill. It must be an ongoing process of continual improvement; a process that identifies and responds to taxpayers' needs, involving proper consultation where appropriate to produce robust and effective new policies. It must develop and exploit new technologies and working methods to create the integrated, coherent and consistent approach that we all seek, and that taxpayers rightly expect.

The Bill is, and can only be, the first step in that process, but it is a vital step. It creates the organisational structures within which the process of integration can develop. Without the Bill, that process of improving the way in which we deliver services to taxpayers cannot even start in the systematic way that we all want.

I shall explain briefly why integration is so important. The O'Donnell review identified clear benefits from integration that will pay real dividends for people and businesses throughout the UK, and are vital to ensuring that this country remains a highly competitive place to do business. Foremost among those benefits are the improvements to taxpayer or customer focus that integration can deliver. The delivery of more joined-up services will result in a more consistent and coherent approach to taxpayers' affairs. Understanding taxpayers and taking a view across their affairs is essential to deliver a world-class service, built on support for taxpayers that is tailored to their needs.

We have already started identifying areas where this approach would be beneficial. The Chancellor's announcement at the pre-Budget report of a new small business unit at the heart of the new department is a key example. Improvements to the use of information within the new department should, as IT capability is developed, reduce the need for taxpayers to supply the same information several times over. The Chancellor's pre-Budget report announcement of work to develop ways of minimising the requirements on small businesses through, for example, a single tax return for all taxes and a reduction in the number of forms, is a key component of this agenda. Returning to the point made by the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), that will bring efficiency savings for business and Government alike.

The same developments that will improve the taxpayer experience will also improve the effectiveness of revenue administration, helping to reduce the tax gap. Better use of information, built around an ability to look across a taxpayer's affairs, will allow for more effective targeting of resources to areas of risk. That will improve fairness, making it harder for those who seek to avoid their obligations to succeed, and reducing unnecessary interventions in the affairs of honest taxpayers. There will also be efficiency improvements. Through economies of scale and alignment of common areas of activity, integration will produce efficiency savings of 3,200 posts by 2007–08.

The Treasury Committee's report rightly suggested that a detailed analysis of the costs and benefits of integration would be helpful. The regulatory impact assessment published alongside the Bill sets out the costs and benefits of the legislation. Future substantive proposals for legislative reform will also be accompanied by regulatory impact assessments in the usual way, so that the costs and benefits of particular measures to effect integration can be considered. That further addresses the hon. Gentleman's point with regard to progress on integration over a period of time.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): The Paymaster General is right to say that the regulatory impact assessment contains some, but perhaps not all, of the costs relating to the merger. Will the merger result in a net cost saving over the period of the existing spending review? Will there be a total saving, taking into account all the cost savings and all the additional costs?

Dawn Primarolo: I shall make two points to the hon. Gentleman. First, the regulatory impact assessment includes an initial setting-up cost of £75 million for the department. If further costs are incurred, they will be identified in any subsequent regulatory impact assessment. Secondly, on savings, over the period to 2007–08, the reduction of 3,200 posts will produce a net saving in the region of £500 million—I will make sure that that figure is exactly right—by taking out duplication.

Mr. Laws: Will the Paymaster General clarify whether the £500 million saving will come from the gross staff reduction, to which the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) referred, or from the 3,200 posts, because the saving sounds rather large for 3,200 posts?

Dawn Primarolo: If I have not got the figure exactly right, I will make sure that it is corrected. The saving will result from the merger's taking out duplication in the departments as the services provided by the Bill are delivered more efficiently and effectively.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): Will the Minister clarify the time frame over which the £500 million will be garnered? When will we see the full benefits?

Dawn Primarolo: The total annual efficiencies and the figure that I have quoted are by 2007–08; I thought that I made that clear in my initial comments. Savings across the department as it delivers both its public service agreement targets and integration will produce the required savings.

Turning to the content of the Bill, hon. Members undoubtedly will be pleased to hear that I do not propose to describe the detail of each and every clause today—that pleasure awaits us in Committee—but I want to take a moment to outline the key measures that the Bill introduces. I confirm that we will table a number of Government amendments later. That is unfortunately inevitable, because those technical amendments involve cross-referencing right across the tax system. However, with the exception of a measure, which is currently being finalised, to provide information gateways for the new prosecutions office, those amendments will be minor or technical drafting amendments; the Bill before hon. Members today is, in essence, complete.

The Bill establishes HMRC as a non-ministerial department, led by commissioners acting under the general directions of Treasury Ministers. That arm's-length relationship between Ministers and Revenue administration will maintain the existing convention that Ministers do not intervene in individual cases. The Bill transfers the statutory functions of the two existing departments to HMRC, and it provides for the manner in which the commissioners and their officers may exercise those functions. It also provides for the method of financing the costs of running HMRC, and creates a new framework for managing and accounting for the revenues, tax credits and other moneys that the department collects and pays out. That new framework includes measures to enhance parliamentary oversight of HMRC's finances; for example, it enhances existing arrangements for reporting daily revenue flows to the Comptroller and Auditor General.

The Bill introduces flexibility around the future functions of HMRC, putting it on a level footing with ministerial Departments to allow the transfer of functions into or out of HMRC by Order in Council.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): The Paymaster General has just said that important functions could be transferred out. Those important powers could include intelligence gathering, enforcement and criminal prosecutions, and the transfer would simply be agreed by statutory instrument, which, as she knows, are seldom debated and not amendable. Does she think it right that important powers on enforcement and criminal prosecutions should be transferred in that way? Surely the point of the Bill is carefully to circumscribe and limit powers, so that Parliament knows in advance and in primary legislation who will exercise those powers, which should not exercised by Ministers as provided for in this Bill.

Dawn Primarolo: If what the right hon. Gentleman, who was a distinguished Treasury Minister, suggests were true, I would agree with him, but the Bill introduces flexibility without compromising either the integrity of the tax system or the principle that administration of revenues is held at arm's length from Ministers. The transfer from HMRC of taxes, duties, national insurance and tax credits work is not permitted under those arrangements, and the functions are the same as those of other departments. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill does not provide a gateway for transferring the responsibilities of the department without the proper scrutiny of the House.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Paymaster General has mentioned tax-gathering powers and tax credits, which will remain in the department, but I have mentioned other powers, such as intelligence gathering, prosecution and enforcement. She has not said whether there is a block on those powers being transferred. It would be different if those powers went from the new department, which will be headed by appointments by the Crown and therefore will be at one remove from Ministers, to Departments headed by individual Ministers. Will she give an assurance on those points?

Dawn Primarolo: I want to be as clear as possible in giving the right hon. Gentleman an assurance on that point. I want to make it clear that all the department's current functions associated with tax and tax credits cannot be transferred under the Bill. The department could collaborate with a devolved Administration or undertake particular work—for example, the collection of student loans—on behalf of another department, but that does not include the administration associated with any of its revenue collection or protection duties.

That leads me on to the department's powers. The Bill is, as I have mentioned, the first step in an incremental process of integration. It does not introduce substantive changes to the administration of regimes, and existing powers for enforcing regimes therefore will be transferred to the new department without any change to the way in which or purposes for which they may be used. The Bill achieves that by ring-fencing powers to prevent their inadvertent extension within HMRC.

Let me spell out what that means in practice. I think that the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) will recognise this from the time when he was Economic Secretary. It means that a VAT inspector will retain all her current powers in HMRC, with no changes. Similarly, the powers of a corporation tax inspector in HMRC will remain as they currently are in the Inland Revenue. The Bill ensures that the VAT inspector's powers do not become available to the corporation tax inspector, and vice versa. That applies across all HMRC functions. Powers in the new department remain as they currently are in the separate organisations.

This is, of course, only a temporary position. As the Treasury Committee report acknowledged, delivery of integration in the longer term on the scale that I described is likely to require greater consistency of approach to enable effective working across different taxes and duties. To that end, I can announce today that the Government will issue a consultation document in January that will consider the suitability of the existing range of powers, including the requirement to provide information; interest and surcharge regimes for late payment; penalties for non-compliance and rights of appeal; and the modern regulations and practices that HMRC will need to be a high-performing 21st-century tax administration.

The Government intend that following that initial consultation and the completion of the Bill's passage, HMRC officials should enter into more detailed discussions with representative bodies. The consultation exercise does not aim to deliver reform in time for the creation of HMRC, but will be the beginning of a thorough review, with the aim of legislating where necessary in the 2006 Finance Bill.

In the meantime, to aid clarity on and public understanding of the powers available to HMRC for its different functions, an advice note on the powers available to officers of the new department will be published in time for the inception of HMRC. The Inland Revenue and Customs today placed a copy of the draft of that advice note on their internet site, seeking comments. It is also available in the Vote Office and the Library. The departments will also write to key representative customer and tax bodies to invite their comments.

This considered and incremental timetable for change has been welcomed by key representative taxpayer bodies, as well as by the Treasury Committee. I hope that the House, too, will endorse it.

The Bill confirms HMRC's authority to pool information internally so that information supplied for one of its functions can be used for any of its other functions. That authority is vital to deliver the joined-up services that the O'Donnell review envisaged and to capture the consequent benefits in service and effectiveness. Again, that has been recognised by key external commentators as a necessary prerequisite for the successful integration of services.

I stress that HMRC will of course take taxpayer confidentiality every bit as seriously as the predecessor departments; the importance of that was recognised by the Treasury Committee's report. There will be no let-up in HMRC's commitment to safeguarding taxpayer confidentiality.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD) rose—

Dawn Primarolo: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to finish the passage on confidentiality, I will give way to him then.

To that end, the Bill introduces a statutory duty for all officers to maintain the confidentiality of information that they acquire in the course of their duties. That replaces the Inland Revenue oath, and for the first time extends it across former Customs and Excise matters, giving statutory backing to existing duties of confidentiality under employment contracts, across a larger range of functions. To reinforce that duty, the Bill provides for a criminal offence of unlawful disclosure of confidential information about an identifiable person by an HMRC officer. That extends the existing provision for Inland Revenue and Customs staff to all functions of the new department. The Bill replaces the existing authority for commissioners in either department to authorise disclosure of information with a much tighter provision that restricts them to authorising disclosures in prescribed, limited circumstances where there is a public interest case for doing so, as defined in regulations. Those regulations will be available for Members to see before the commencement of the Bill's consideration in Committee.

The Treasury Committee identified the importance of maintaining taxpayer confidentiality where the Treasury and Ministers are concerned. The Government strongly agree with the Committee's view, and I can confirm that confidential information about identified taxpayers will continue to be kept in HMRC and will not be passed to the Treasury or to Ministers.

Mr. Burnett: May I take the Paymaster General back a paragraph or two to the streamlining of powers? Will she give the House the benefit of her initial views about how that will take place, particularly in relation to culture and tone, tax-gathering and co-operation, and policing-type functions?

Dawn Primarolo: We need to consider whether powers are, for example, necessary, appropriate, proportionate, sanctioned by the correct level of authority, have a right of appeal against them, or are sufficient in a changing environment. The Bill and the consultation give us the opportunity comprehensively to consider those issues.

It will be vital for taxpayers—for all of us as taxpayers—to understand exactly what is expected of us and what the sanctions may be if we do not discharge those obligations properly. It is important, in a new department, to try to ensure continuity of powers. This is a huge task, hence the need to consult instead of putting everything in the Bill. Because many of the powers have developed over a long period to deal with specific circumstances, it is much more appropriate that we consider them in the round.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): The Paymaster General spoke about confidentiality. Although I welcome the clause on that, confidentiality was a matter of concern to the Select Committee. The department's officers currently have to sign a statutory declaration on taking up employment, and I hope that she will reassure us that including the welcome provision in the Bill does not necessarily relieve officers from signing that individual statutory declaration.

Dawn Primarolo: I assure the hon. Gentleman that officers will be required to sign the declaration. When he reads the points that I made, he will remember that I spoke about the employment contract for the new department. We have improved all the protections that currently exist. If the new department can start at the beginning of the next financial year—parliamentary process permitting—the new confidentiality requirements that I have identified will operate. I cannot express too strongly the importance that I personally—and the hon. Gentleman, the Treasury Committee and, I believe, every hon. Member—place on a clear and unambiguous commitment to protect taxpayer confidentiality with the necessary functions. It is vital for continuing compliance rates that taxpayers provide information to the Revenue departments. The bedrock of that process is the knowledge that their confidentiality is protected. We should guard that at all costs, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman believes that the Bill provides for that.

The Bill also introduces new arrangements for ensuring the highest possible standards in HMRC in relation to criminal investigations. As my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary announced in September, the Bill extends the remit of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary to provide for it to inspect HMRC's compliance with the requirements of the criminal justice system. It also extends the remit of the Independent Police Complaints Commission, giving it a key role in considering allegations of criminal or gross misconduct by HMRC officers. Those two proposals will implement the recommendation of the Butterfield review that Customs identify how additional external scrutiny can best be introduced into investigation work. Given that the departments are merging, I hope that hon. Members agree that it is right to take the opportunity to ensure that the new department is subject to the highest standards of scrutiny and accountability.

The Bill provides for obstruction, assault, or impersonation of HMRC officers to become a criminal offence, thereby consolidating existing provisions that relate to the Revenue and Customs. That ensures that officers can perform their functions within the protection of the law and protects the public from the unlikely event of unscrupulous people passing themselves off as officers.

The Bill aligns the penalties for those offences with their police equivalents, helping to deliver coherence and consistency throughout the criminal justice system. It also restricts the officers who could previously arrest for such Customs offences, so that only officers authorised by the commissioners to exercise the power of arrest for the offences can do that. That tightens arrest arrangements and will remove the power of arrest for the offences from several Customs and Excise officers who currently have it legally but do not need it in their current jobs and are therefore administratively barred from using it.

The Bill establishes a fully independent prosecutions office—the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office—to provide independent scrutiny of criminal cases investigated by HMRC. The creation of that office was a key recommendation of the Butterfield review. The director of the prosecutions office will be accountable to the Attorney-General, ensuring a clear separation of responsibilities from HMRC.

Sir Teddy Taylor: The Paymaster General has spoken for 45 minutes and interested us with many of her comments. Will she refer to the Bill's employment implications at some stage?

Dawn Primarolo: I referred to the employment implications when I identified staff savings of 3,200 by 2007–08. There was an exchange between several hon. Members and me about that. I went on to demonstrate how that would be achieved in some cases by removing duplication and moving forward on several reforms. I gave the example of the pre-Budget report announcements on the Small Business Service and allowing one tax return for all taxes.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for giving way again so graciously. She is obviously learning from the Chancellor. Will she confirm that the figure of 3,200 is a working assumption, been taken from the example of other mergers, or does it follow detailed work examining specific aspects and estimated savings that might be made?

Dawn Primarolo: Of necessity, it is a working assumption at this stage. The merger, the preparation for it and the commitment to spend public money to begin the process cannot start—the two departments do not have the authority to undertake that work—until the completion of Second Reading. I have therefore been advised of the figure by the prospective chairman and management of the new department. I know that hon. Members will keenly follow the implications.

[Dawn Primarolo]

However, hon. Members have also pressed me on many occasions over the years to remove duplication, simplify the system and allow one contact point whenever possible for information for a taxpayer—I gave the example of a taxpayer's having to give the same information to several different components of the existing department. When we achieve that, we will be more effective, but it is inevitable that fewer staff will be required.

Let me revert to the fully independent prosecutions office. As I said, the director will be accountable to the Attorney-General, thus ensuring a clear separation of responsibilities. The creation of such an office is an important contribution towards maintaining public confidence in the criminal justice system, because it ensures the independence of the prosecutor from the investigator in cases that require criminal proceedings.

That independence matters because it ensures that the prosecutor can conduct a fully impartial assessment of the merits of a case before it reaches the courts. Independence does not, of course, mean distance. HMRC and the new office will work closely together to ensure that the prosecutor's expert and independent advice can be called on to provide guidance on the requirements of the criminal justice system at all times.

This constructive approach to prosecutions, with clearly defined and distinct roles for the investigator and prosecutor, will ensure that the quality of criminal justice work undertaken in HMRC and by the new office is of the highest possible standard.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Will the new arrangements make it easier or more difficult to sustain convictions? While billions of pounds are being evaded or avoided each year, it is important to ensure that the system is able to sustain convictions and that the Exchequer receives the maximum possible benefit from them.

Dawn Primarolo: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. It is vital to ensure that a case has all the information and evidence required to secure a prosecution. These recommendations arose from the Butterfield report, which was commissioned by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary, and will ensure that investigations will be able to benefit from the expert advice of the prosecution service, which will then take a decision on whether the evidence supplied by the department would secure a prosecution. It is also important that we set a high standard for operations in this area, in order to maintain confidence and to ensure that the tax system works as it should.

Mr. Burnett: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I have given away many times, but I shall give way once more. I realise, however, that I must be testing the House's patience by speaking for so long.

Mr. Burnett: I do not think so: many of us are extremely interested in what the Paymaster General has to say. I have been bellyaching for years about taking the Inland Revenue prosecution service and the Customs prosecution service and putting them under the aegis of the Attorney-General, and I very much welcome this provision. As she knows, the Butterfield report related to a Customs case, and things have not been too happy in that prosecution service for some time. I should like to know the answer to one or two questions that might superficially sound mundane but are not. Will staff regularly transfer from the Inland Revenue to the prosecution service; and will the prosecution service be housed away from the Inland Revenue premises?

Dawn Primarolo: With regard to the staff, the necessary expertise currently in the two departments will transfer to the prosecution service. As the Bill states, the appointment of staff will be a matter for the director. I do not know exactly which office block the service will eventually be housed in, although I am sure that we can find out before we reach the winding-up speeches. From memory, I think that it will be in separate accommodation, but I do not want to mislead the House on that. I honestly cannot remember, but I will ensure that the hon. Gentleman has a reply to that question before we conclude our debate today.

The Bill establishes the office under a director, who will carry out his functions under the superintendence of the Attorney-General. I think that that will be widely welcomed. The director may designate appropriate members of his staff as prosecutors, who will enjoy the rights and responsibilities necessary to enable them to conduct prosecutions on his behalf. All staff of the office, including prosecutors, will be subject to the director's instructions.

Confidentiality remains as important an issue in the prosecutions office as it is in HMRC. The Bill therefore places a duty of confidentiality on RCPO staff, and backs this up with a criminal sanction for unlawful disclosure of information. The prosecutions office will operate to the highest possible professional standards. In order to provide independent assurance of those standards, the Bill provides for the office to be inspected by the Crown Prosecution Service inspectorate, and in a reflection of this focus on standards, the Bill sets out clear minimum requirements for qualifications, which all RCPO prosecutors must satisfy in order to be appointed to the role.

The Bill is modest, although the task that it sets in train is not, as it will involve a very substantial programme of reform and change, which will deliver incremental improvements to services over the coming years. A key challenge for HMRC management throughout the integration process will be to ensure ongoing, consistently high standards of service to taxpayers, and to ensure that the delivery of business as usual is not compromised. Indeed, this very point was identified as a risk in the Treasury Committee's report, and we are very alive to it. The House and the Treasury Committee will be pleased to hear that it is a challenge that HMRC management are absolutely committed to meeting, as am I.

The O'Donnell review acknowledged the importance of strong leadership in managing the transition process, and I am confident that the management team led by David Varney will maintain an absolute focus on business results alongside the delivery of the new departmental structures and processes. I have equal confidence in Inland Revenue and Customs staff, who have delivered, and continue to deliver, high standards of professional service in their respective departments.

We can trace a nationally organised customs service back over 800 years, to the time of King John. In 1671, King Charles II put the service into the hands of commissioners. In fact, anyone who visits Customs headquarters can see the swords that have been blunted, once used—I do not know what for—as a testament to the long history of the department. Direct taxes, in the sense of a contribution from the local community to royal expenses, are also ancient, but the modern national administration is much the younger of the two departments, dating from the introduction of income tax in 1842 and the creation of the Board of Inland Revenue in 1849. In all that time, the staff in both departments have served the House and the taxpayers of the United Kingdom to their greatest ability, and their professionalism is beyond question.

The formation of HMRC will build on the proven track records of people across Customs and the Inland Revenue, to deliver a world-class organisation that is truly fit for the 21st century. The challenge is significant, but so too is the potential for delivering real improvements in the way in which the new department does business. The Bill is a crucial first step towards delivering those improvements, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I shall carry on more or less from where the Paymaster General left off, although I shall not try to match her symphony of heavenly length. That was partly because she gave way so generously that she had to make such a long speech, but I shall try to make mine in about half that time. I should like to thank her for inviting me, my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) and the Liberal spokesman, the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws), to the Treasury to discuss the Bill. We found that briefing very helpful.

I really will carry on from where the right hon. Lady left off in one particular regard. She talked about the culture of the departments. The Revenue departments come in for a lot of criticism, both from individuals and businesses—and sometimes from me—particularly when they fail to use common sense and end up making my constituents' lives a misery. Customs, in particular, has come in for a rough ride in recent years.

At the outset, however, I want to say that we are lucky in this country with our Revenue departments. In many ways, they are the salt of the earth. They probably provide the least corrupt revenue service of any major country in the world, and are assiduous in protecting the Revenue. Above all, they have a sense of collective loyalty and duty that only the best organisations can hope to nurture.

Some might think that I say all that because I might be sitting on the other side of the House shortly, so it would be handy for the early part of my tenure to have said it. As it happens, I say it because I believe it, having worked closely with both departments in the 1980s. I would like any criticisms and reservations that I and my party might express about the departments in the weeks ahead, as we consider the Bill, to be put in the context of those remarks.

Mr. Hopkins: I agree strongly with the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but does he agree that sometimes when the Revenue and Customs and Excise come in for flak, it is because of the bad legislation that they have to implement, or the absence of clear rules, particularly on the importing of alcohol and tobacco from the continent of Europe, on which we never quite know where we stand?

Mr. Tyrie: I shall not get drawn on the alcohol and tobacco point, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman's comment that a high proportion of the problems of Government departments are caused by politicians getting in the way and trying to run things, rather than getting out of the way and reducing the size of departments to enable the rest of the country to get on with their jobs.

The Opposition will not force a Division on this issue tonight. Our primary concern is not that, in principle, there are no benefits to be had from merger, but that in practice, we are not yet convinced that the Government have thought through fully how to capture the benefits of merger, or even tried to measure them much.

Although we have had the O'Donnell report, a regulatory impact assessment, a Bill and its explanatory notes, rafts of evidence to the Treasury Committee and much else, we have not yet obtained clear thinking from the Government on why we are merging these departments. The nearest that I have found to a clear summary for the reasons for merger is in Gus O'Donnell's March report—a very long report, which I have here—particularly in paragraphs 1.18 and 3.41. It would be far too tedious to read it all out, but I shall try to provide a summary, which I think the Paymaster-General will agree is connected to what she said earlier.

Mr. O'Donnell says that there are four benefits of a merger: first,

"more complete information and analysis to improve risk management across the tax system";

secondly,

"better and more flexible use of resources";

thirdly,

"a more focused approach to compliance across the tax system";

and fourthly, "better deterrence" through increased

"compliance allowing greater targeting of the non-compliant."

I was not much the wiser having read that.

In a speech only a few weeks ago, Gus O'Donnell had a go at his predecessor, Lord Bridges: he read out a passage of Lord Bridges's prose, which he described as something of which Sir Humphrey Appleby would be proud. I think that I have worked out what Gus O'Donnell meant in his passage. Great man though he is, he seems to have fallen into a similar mandarin trap.

Much more worrying, however, is the lack of clarity in some of these documents about why the departments are being merged, which may conceal a lack of a sense of purpose in doing it. My concern is not just that it is not explained, but that those who are doing it may not be clear in their minds about why they are doing it.

[Mr. Tyrie]

I sat down and tried to work out what tests we should use to measure whether a merger would be a success. Those can be much more simply stated than anything that I have seen in these documents. If the Paymaster General disagrees with what I say, I shall give way to her, and if I miss out a major item I am sure that she will be able to leap in.

The primary task of a revenue department is to get the money in. Therefore, task No. 1 is to protect the yield. Will this merger get more money in with fewer mistakes? If so, how much? That is the first issue that needs to be measured.

The second objective must be to reduce the hassle for millions of individuals, and hundreds and thousands of businesses throughout the country—the so-called compliance burden. Will that go up or down with this merger? The Paymaster General implied that it would go down. If so, by how much? What is her estimate?

Two consequential questions flow from those two simple ones, and they also need answering. Are we confident enough about the possible gains in extra yield and better compliance to be able to justify what everybody agrees would be transitional costs? I refer not only to the £75 million in the explanatory notes but to the enormous disruption that will take place—the Paymaster General implied at the end of her remarks that the merger was a Herculean task, with which I agree, and that will also impose a substantial transitional cost. Are we confident that the extra gains in yield and compliance are greater than those transitional costs?

Finally—this relates to a point that I made at the beginning—we need to have in mind a long-run strategic objective. Even if the benefits outweigh the costs, are we confident that we can achieve that without a decline in the high standards that Revenue departments have set themselves, including their duty of confidentiality? Will the morale of the departments suffer in the long run? In particular, we must bear in mind that both departments, particularly Customs, face major criminal efforts at evasion.

I have set out my four tests for attempting to measure the success of a merger. I agree that other considerations may be relevant, but the Paymaster General has not leapt to her feet to suggest that anything that I have said is mistaken or that I have missed out something substantial.

Let us try to move forward. As we now have some intelligible yardsticks, how does the merger measure up to them? The first port of call should be the regulatory impact assessment, a relatively thin document for such an important issue. I can find in it no overall estimate of the effects on the yield. Virtually the whole of the economic costs and benefits are dealt with in five very short paragraphs. On efficiency savings, we are told that there will be 13,000 staff savings, but when we consider that carefully, and as the Paymaster General clarified earlier, more than 9,000 of those will come anyway under the Gershon review, even without the merger, and only 3,000—3,200 now, I think—as a result of integration. Incidentally, those figures have moved around a bit as they have been examined.

The Treasury Committee did a very good job generally on this subject. It is sensible, particularly with regard to subjects that are not absolutely urgent and immediate, that debate should take place on the basis of thorough scrutiny by Select Committees. The Treasury Committee also did a good job on this specific point, and I commend the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt), who is in his place, and the hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann), who showed in questions in Committee just how much the numbers on potential savings had moved around.

We have arrived at the point of agreement that the Government are saying that staff savings directly from the merger will be about 3,200—just over 3 per cent. of the total work force. That is scarcely the sort of number that could justify what amounts to one of the biggest mergers in Whitehall, or indeed between any two organisations. No private sector institutions would go through all the administrative hell and business risk of a merger to secure 3 per cent. staff savings, but if we take the regulatory impact assessment at face value, that is what the Government appear to be saying as to why we should support the Bill.

At least, that was the position in all the documentation until today. Today, the Paymaster General came up with a variation: she told us that the total merger savings amount to £500 million. I should be grateful if she could tell us whether that £500 million is directly connected to the 3,000 staff saving, or whether it is also connected to the further savings that will result from the Gershon review.

Dawn Primarolo: I do not want to try the patience of the House. I was clear about the Department's efficiency savings, and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will deal with the hon. Gentleman's points in his winding-up speech.

Mr. Tyrie: I hope he does.

Mr. Laws: Is the hon. Gentleman concerned about the lack of clarity on a point as important as whether the savings relate to the total Gershon staff savings or the merger? In his answer to the Chairman of the Treasury Sub-Committee, David Varney said:

"We have a series of targets over the 2004 settlement, where we have got to produce efficiencies of 507 million cumulatively and save 12,500 jobs net".

Does that not suggest that the figures cited by the Paymaster General relate to the total staff savings, not the merger?

Mr. Tyrie: That is a good point. I think that that is what we shall find, but we shall have to wait until the winding-up speech for clarification.

If the savings are based on the combined value of the 3,000 from the merger directly and the 9,000-odd from the Gershon review, we are talking about confusion between two quite different things. The merger is not necessary for the Gershon savings, so the £500 million does not represent savings from the merger. Only a small fraction of that amount should be attributed to it. I hope that issue will be clarified later, but it illustrates a point that I was trying to make at the beginning. The true costs and benefits, and why we are going about the merger now, are not clear in the documentation before us.

The most important single question in the case of any Revenue department is "What will happen to the yield?" I can find no answer to that anywhere, but my best guess is "Not very much". That is why, although paragraph 3.43 of the O'Donnell report refers to the tax gap—which is another way of talking about the same thing: the difference between the amount that should be collected and the amount that is collected—there is no estimate of what will happen to it as a result of the merger. I think that that should have been addressed in some of the documentation.

While we are on the subject of staff, I want to refer to the slightly broader issue of relocation. I should be interested to know how many staff will be relocated out of London as a consequence of the Gershon review. I note that the Lyons review proposed the relocation of 500 from Customs and Excise and 1,450 from the Revenue—about 2,000 in all. How many extra jobs, if any, will be relocated as a specific consequence of the merger?

I hope that the Paymaster General and the Economic Secretary will forgive a hint of scepticism from the Conservatives about the relocation issue. After all, is it not the case that far the biggest relocation so far is that of 1,575 staff who have moved from the Inland Revenue office of Somerset house in the Strand to the Treasury building in Whitehall? I do not think that that is the kind of relocation initiative that the Chancellor wanted us to have in mind when he announced—I will not try to reproduce his blathering rant—

"I am publishing department by department plans to relocate civil service jobs out of the south east".

A move from the Strand to Whitehall does not quite match that.

Mr. Fallon: I hope my hon. Friend has observed from the Treasury's own efficiency technical note that the Chancellor proposes to relocate only 11.5 of the 1,000 people he employs in his own Department to Norwich.

Mr. Tyrie: I was not aware of the 11.5 full-time equivalent jobs going to Norwich, but that makes my point.

Let me return to the broader theme. The first of the two tests that I mentioned at the beginning was that of "getting the money in". We have virtually nothing from the Government to help us to assess the merger. What about the compliance-burden test? That is covered at length in the O'Donnell report, which points out that companies may obtain benefits from being able to engage with only one Department to fulfil their requirements for all their taxes. Here again, however, I have not been able to spot any figures, I suspect because most of the gains—although possibly there in the long run—are extremely difficult to capture. That is because the Inland Revenue and Customs have fundamentally different sets of skills as organisations, and are trying to collect two completely different types of tax—which is why the merger did not take place decades ago.

The Inland Revenue deals with organisations retrospectively. It is trying to capture income flows on which there is usually a great deal of ready documentation. Its approach is analytical. Customs, on the other hand, is dealing with transaction taxes. Its role is, of necessity, partly forensic—quasi-legal. It needs to capture the transaction as it happens. That is why it may not be easy for the new department to deliver the compliance gains that we should like for its customers. There is also a real danger that each organisation might find its skill sets diluted, to the benefit of neither. Of course there is the opportunity to get the best out of both skill sets, but that is easier said than done. It is a big undertaking. I think it will be particularly difficult to achieve in the next year or two, because both departments already have their hands full.

The Inland Revenue is grappling with the task of transforming itself from a revenue collection service into a very different institution: a tax and benefits agency. As we know, it has already been a bumpy ride. Customs has its own problems. It is about to install a massive information technology system, and we know the Government's history on those. I shall return to that subject later.

Explanation and justification of both those crucial issues—the effect on the yield and compliance—is pretty thin. To its great credit, the Treasury Select Committee has tried to elicit some by asking questions about long-term savings, but that has not helped us to obtain a better regulatory impact assessment. When David Varney was questioned by the Treasury Committee on the gains of merger, he said that it was impossible to answer without knowing the details of the sequencing—the timetable. The Government must have done the work required to establish that by now. Will the Paymaster General give us a quantitative analysis of the costs and benefits?

I have tried to describe how to assess whether the merger is really worth it by providing some basic yardsticks. We will of course have a couple of days in which to examine the Bill in detail in Committee, but a number of points should at least be alluded to now.

First and most important, the Minister has been at pains to stress—it is stressed in the documents—that this is a minimalist Bill. The Paymaster General has told us that, and the regulatory impact assessment assures us of it. The regulatory impact assessment tells us of two other possibilities that the Government rejected: a more comprehensive early Bill that would make substantive changes in relation to powers, and a fully comprehensive Bill in a later legislative Session. However, I am a little worried—we will explore this issue in Committee—that the Bill might have included provisions that fall into the category of a comprehensive Bill. I noted carefully that the Paymaster General sought to provide reassurance about powers of arrest, but an initial reading of clause 29 does not give me that reassurance. It appears to extend the power of arrest to new HMRC officers.

I was very grateful to the Paymaster General for making it clear that she will publish proposals on the powers in January; we will of course develop the proposals when we are in government. It is important that this issue—the one to which many pressure groups will pay the most assiduous attention—be given a full airing, and I am pleased that there will be a consultative document as early as January. The advice note on powers has only just been published, so I was unable to read it before today's debate, but I shall read it carefully as soon as I can.

[Mr. Tyrie]

Another significant issue, which the Paymaster General hardly touched on, is policy formulation. My best guess is that the lion's share of the 1,500 people who are moving from the Strand all the way to the Treasury will be doing policy work. In justifying the new policy arrangements, Mr. O'Donnell has sought to distinguish between strategic policy and policy maintenance. I have thought quite a bit about this distinction. Is it really helpful? Perhaps it is in theory, but I am not sure that it will be in practice. The current arrangements work reasonably well. I could not help feeling that the ghost of Sir Humphrey—or perhaps I should say Lord Bridges—was lurking in Mr. O'Donnell's lengthy description of the distinction between strategic policy and policy maintenance.

Mr. Laws: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that we have good reason to be confident about the origination of tax policy in the Treasury in recent years? Can he cite any evidence to suggest that it has been doing a good job in developing tax policy in that time by, for example, simplifying the tax system?

Mr. Tyrie: As I have said, it is the politicians, not the officials, who should be blamed. Tax policy can be dramatically improved and the tax system dramatically reformed if politicians have the will to do so. The system has become far more complicated and it has set the economy back some way in the medium and long term. Eventually, it will have a corrosive and sclerotic influence on the economy's performance. I do not want to blame Treasury officials; rather, I put the blame fairly and squarely at Ministers' door. In many cases, these often distributional reforms have been pushed through with the best of intentions, but in the long run they are likely to have the opposite effect to the intended one. If one presses the right buttons in respect of the officials, one gets the right results. I am sure that the new arrangements can be made to work—a way will be found to make them work—but I am simply trying to point out that I am not absolutely sure that this apparently major reshuffle will make much difference to the overall quality of policy work.

There are a few more issues that I want to touch on, and which we shall discuss in more detail in Committee. The first is information sharing and confidentiality, to which the Paymaster General referred. Clause 16 and schedule 2 enable the use of information acquired by the Revenue and Customs in connection with a function for any other function. Before integration, information could be passed between the Revenue and Customs only through statutory gateways. As I understand it, the Bill will enable the new department to pool all its information, irrespective of the purpose for which it was originally obtained. That issue could also be of concern, and we need to examine it carefully in Committee.

Mr. Hopkins: If this provision makes it easier to collect the revenue that the country so clearly needs, is it not a good thing?

Mr. Tyrie: The hon. Gentleman is right: that is why the gateways were created in the first place. The question is, are we confident that relaxing them is either necessary or desirable? As I said at the outset, if it can be shown that relaxing the gateways could increase yield, such a provision might be worth considering carefully, but it must be balanced against the consequential risk to confidentiality.

It is vital that nothing in the Bill threatens taxpayer confidentiality. If people do not have confidence in the Revenue department, they will not share information and the tax yield will suffer. According to clause 19, information can be disclosed "in the public interest", but the explanatory notes provide little clarification. I should be grateful for an explanation of the meaning behind this apparent widening of the disclosure provisions.

On reading the O'Donnell review, I was also somewhat apprehensive at discovering that the new Bill provides "an opportunity to consider gateways with other departments, such as DWP."

I should be grateful if the Paymaster General would tell us to what extent the opening of gateways to other Departments has been considered and what decision has been arrived at.

I am surprised and disappointed by the Government's decision to abolish the oath that officers are expected to take and to read out in front of a witness—it is properly known as the statutory declaration—thereby impressing on them their duty of confidentiality. The Law Society told the Treasury Committee that there would be advantages in restating the Inland Revenue oath in legislation, so that it is made clear that officials keep taxpayers' information confidential. I agree, and I am really perplexed by the Government's decision to abolish it. It is used in courts for witnesses, and we swear the Oath of Allegiance before we can take our seats in the House. The oath has previously been the subject of much controversy, but many hon. Members feel that it should be used even for witnesses who appear before Select Committees, particularly during major investigations; in other words, they feel that the use of the oath should be extended. Keeping the oath of confidentiality would certainly do no harm, and might even do some good. I find it difficult to justify its removal.

Mr. Burnett: I thought that the Paymaster General said earlier that the oath would appear in contracts of employment.

Dawn Primarolo indicated assent.

Mr. Burnett: Does the hon. Gentleman think that sufficient, in addition to the Bill's provisions on confidentiality?

Mr. Tyrie: I shall listen very carefully to what the Government have to say on this issue, but I am inclined to say no, I do not think it sufficient. I want to stay on the road that we are currently on, which is keeping the oath. In fact, we should extend the Revenue oath to all members of the new department. However, let us discuss this issue in Committee.

Let me say a brief work on IT systems. Although not the most crucial questions, two important ones are: to what extent can these systems be merged, bearing in mind the different needs of the two departments; and what savings are to be made from such a merger? As David Varney said in giving evidence to the Select Committee, the new department will have 250 major IT systems and 3,000 staff working them. It will "put out 170 million forms a year and run 100,000 desktop computers."

I was not at all surprised to see that, in its report, the National Audit Office told Customs that contingency plans were needed to deal with the O'Donnell review. Are the Government prepared to put into the public domain the necessary information to reassure us that contingency planning has indeed been conducted? Do the Government have a contingency plan for weaknesses in IT that they could publish, and can we please have it before we consider the Bill in Committee? I hope that the Government do not think that I am wasting officials' time by asking Whitehall to produce a document or amend an existing document before January.

IT systems are never easy, but the truth is that the Government's record on them does not inspire confidence. My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) will discuss it in greater detail later, but let me give a few brief examples. The Child Support Agency's computer system, which cost nearly £500 million, recently failed and staff at the Department for Work and Pensions were unable recently to process new benefits and pension claims for several days because the system went down. The computer systems of the Passport Service, the Criminal Records Bureau and National Air Traffic Services have also had problems. And so we go on.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich) (Lab): We inherited those problems.

Mr. Tyrie: Actually, what the hon. Gentleman says from a sedentary position is not true. I checked every one of those before I mentioned them and they have all been substantially altered or completely renewed under the present Government.

I would like to say a few words about the law enforcement provisions. I support in principle the creation of a new prosecuting authority, but we need to look carefully at the detail in Committee. That new authority is, in its way, the single most important direct, clear and visible change made as a consequence of the merger. Outsiders will see it and it is extremely important that we get it right. Rather than go into detail now—I notice that I have been going on for more than half an hour—let us leave that for examination in Committee.

I want to make a general point before concluding. Many business people say that when they deal with the Inland Revenue at its best, they are having a conversation with someone who is thinking carefully about the needs of the business as well as a narrow calculation of the yield. Both parties know that accounting practice can vary and that recourse to the law will probably not help very much. The idea that they should always pay exactly the correct amount of tax in any one year needs to be taken in the light of the fact that accounting practices vary and companies' decisions can alter liability in any particular year. The Revenue knows that most companies do not want to break the law and do not want to find themselves on the wrong side of the Revenue, so a modus vivendi delivers the yield.

We should compare that with Customs. As the Paymaster General said, anyone who walks into its headquarters—I have not done so for a few years, but my opportunity will come shortly—is confronted with a wall laden with cutlasses. That shows that its history and approach are closer to that of a police force than a revenue service. The Revenue has had many decades of dealing with reluctant but honest men and women. Customs has had rather more experience of chasing dishonest men and women. It is still chasing smugglers and other highly organised criminals who seek to evade the excise. I spoke earlier about the blending of cultures and it is crucial that we pick up the best of each. In many ways, that means the Revenue showing Customs what can be achieved on the basis of its culture, whereby dealing with basically honest but often busy business men brings about more co-operation and yields more tax.

This has been a long speech—probably longer than I thought it would take to deliver, but still a good deal shorter than that of the Paymaster General.

Dawn Primarolo: I gave way a lot.

Mr. Tyrie: I agree. I am sure that the right hon. Lady is pleased that I also gave way a good few times.

The merger of the two Departments was first described by a royal commission in 1887 as an "old question", and a Select Committee had looked into the matter 15 years before that. Gladstone was first against it and then, as with so many issues—home rule, the great Reform Act, extension of the franchise—eventually in favour of it. It took him about 20 years to change his mind about the merger of the Departments, but this Government have stood on their heads in a mere four years.

The Government's response to the Select Committee's first report on the matter in 2000 said that they believed that the synergies

"can be achieved without the risks, upfront and opportunity costs and structural upheaval which merger would inevitably entail . . . Thus, while the Government accepts that merger might bring some of the benefits outlined by the Committee, it believes that they can be achieved without the disbenefits of merger through a dynamic and focused programme of closer working."

That is official jargon for saying that it is not worth the candle. Four years later, we are told that it is worth the candle. Why the volte-face? I hope that it is because the Government have done a good deal of backroom work, which they have not yet published, and that they will shortly show us that the real benefits of the Bill relate to protection of the yield and reduced compliance. I hope that they will be able to add some numbers and some substance to their claims and be able to quantify the so-called synergies in order to produce a sensible estimate of the full benefits of the merger.

I hope so, but I fear not. I fear that the Government have not been feeding on the pure milk of administrative common sense, but have taken a dose of raw politics. They have sharply increased the size of the civil service. In the Revenue departments alone, the number of civil servants has increased by more than a third in seven years, from 73,000 to almost 100,000. The public—the Labour party's focus groups will have told them this—made it clear that they did not believe that they were getting value for money, and they were probably right. So the Chancellor had his Gershon review, and subsequently put the whole recruitment drive for the civil service sharply into reverse. But he could hardly go around telling other Departments to put their recruitment into reverse without having a look at his own. I believe that that matter explains, at least partly, the timing of the Bill.

There may be some benefits from the merger, but they are not necessarily great. The two Departments have developed different styles and different cultures for very good reasons. As a result, capturing the benefits will take a long time and will not be easy. There are attendant costs and risks. Conservative Members will not oppose the Bill, but we would like to see much more evidence that the Government have carefully thought through what they are trying to achieve with the Bill and what their ultimate objectives are. We would also like to see more evidence that the Government know how to accomplish them, but we have not heard much evidence today.

2.8 pm

Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Lab): The merger of Customs and Excise with the Inland Revenue was proposed by the previous Treasury Committee and has been welcomed by the current one. On the face of it, as the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) touched on, it is a peculiar coupling. Customs and Excise has an image of speed boats and James Bond activity in remote inlets of the coast, whereas the Inland Revenue has the Bob Cratchit quill-pen image of someone at home in a dusty office with ledgers. That is not how it seems to many business people, who deal with one set of people to pay VAT and another set to pay company and income tax.

Bringing those two cultures together with compatible IT systems will ostensibly lead to savings, as already mentioned, but realising the potential benefits that are pointed out in the O'Donnell report needs managing—indeed, a degree of management that has not always been apparent in the past. That said, we must not lose sight of the wood for the trees. The dominant and primary objective of this merger is not cost saving in organisation: the overriding aim must be to reduce the gap between the potential revenue to the Government from tax and what is realised. That tax gap is too large.

The touchstone of success of this merger is not some recondite measure of administrative efficiency—it is the reduction, virtually to elimination if possible, of tax evasion. The amount of tax currently not paid by those who should pay VAT or company tax or income tax would make a significant contribution to the national accounts. At the same time, we must foresee and minimize the impact of new tax policy on the competitiveness of businesses.

In that context, I welcome the proposal for retaining an ability to assess the business impact of tax proposals within the new organisation, while at the same time strengthening the Treasury's ability to assess the overall effect of tax policy. If there are to be adverse effects of new taxes, at least we should expect that they were known about and weighed against the benefits of the tax. Normally, we should expect that adverse effects are anticipated, and eliminated as much as possible.

Above all, we must avoid the costs that honest organisations face in complying with tax law. I know very well that the CBI goes on and on, boringly, on the subject, as though all tax were an unnecessary imposition, and Digby certainly does moan an awful lot—but he is not always wrong.

There is no real reason why the basis for calculating income tax, for example, should be slightly different from the basis for calculating national insurance contributions and so involve a different set of calculations. More generally, the accounting needed for tax purposes could be brought nearer to the principles involved in normal company accounts. I hope that the new tax policy unit will home in on such issues.

A great gain for many businesses will be that they will have to deal with one inspector only for VAT, company tax and income tax. However, the primary measure of success of this reform will be the reduction of tax evasion, and the record is not good in either detection or prosecution.

The case of the London bonded warehouse was a scandal that could be presented theatrically as a farce. Duty-free spirits were donated to the back doors of public houses throughout south-east England on a grand scale. They left the bonded warehouse heading for the continent, and so no duty was paid on them. However, they had a regular habit of turning round at the sight of the channel and returning to London. Once that was spotted, an exercise was established for acquiring the evidence needed for prosecution. The Exchequer lost the unbelievable sum of £670 million just in the process of gathering the evidence.

Then there was the case of Regina v. Doran, a large-scale drug dealer. He was caught redhanded in possession of a huge haul of class A drugs. Someone had to try really hard to allow him to avoid due punishment, but the case failed because of a legal mix-up in mounting the prosecution. After those two cases, the Roques report looked into the management and administration of Customs and Excise, and the Butterfield report analysed whether Customs and Excise should have its powers to mount independent prosecutions taken away.

The Treasury Sub-Committee was assured that the findings of those two inquiries had now been acted upon. That is no doubt true, but I should like an assurance from the new chairman, Mr. Varney, that he is personally satisfied that these events could not be repeated in the new organisation. The Sub-Committee was not reassured when the previous Customs and Excise chairman was asked for an assurance that staff vetting procedures were such that no one with a criminal record could be employed in Customs and Excise. The answer was no, he could not give us that assurance.

Likewise, action against cigarette smuggling is not reassuring. A few years ago, no duty was paid on one in four cigarettes sold in Britain. That 25 per cent. has been brought down to 18 per cent. but many cigarettes are still being smuggled, at a cost to the Exchequer of around £2.5 billion per annum.

The cigarettes in question were not made of mud and brick dust in a shanty town. They were made by three major UK companies—British American Tobacco, Gallahers and Imperial Tobacco Ltd, with the Government health warning printed on the side of packets. The total estimate of smuggled cigarettes in 2002–03 was about 12 billion, out of a total consumption of 75 billion. With duty avoided on that scale, I cannot believe that no one in those major companies knew what was going on.

At a recent meeting of the Treasury Sub-Committee, we were told that progress had been made and that the companies involved had signed a memorandum of understanding to co-operate in reducing cigarette smuggling. So three major companies have decided that they are willing to co-operate in enforcing the law of the land, but that leaves rather up in the air the question of what went on before the memorandum. No doubt all will be revealed in due course.

Mr. O'Donnell, the permanent under-secretary to the Treasury, said when he was commending this reorganisation that "you need an organisation which is capable of managing different cultures within itself. For honest taxpayers you want a culture that is customer friendly. For dishonest taxpayers and, where there is fraud going on, you need a very tough, ruthless approach."

I agree entirely that that is a good principle of operation, but we seem to have seen too little of the tough and ruthless approach. If anything, the approach seems to have been lackadaisical and benignly indulgent. The great fallacy would be to assume that, because we are setting up a new organisation, all the observations in the Roques and Butterfield reports would be complied with immediately. They will not be, unless there is a clear determination, and a management ethos, to crack down on the cheats and frauds mercilessly.

The message that I should like to see go out from this debate to Mr. Varney, the chairman, and to his management team is that he should stick to the customer friendly approach for the honest taxpayer, but use every power available against the dishonest ones. If he does not have enough powers, he should come back and ask for more.

There is a heavy dependence on management to put right the inadequacies that I have outlined. Legislation is not enough. The management arrangements of the Inland Revenue, as evidence to the Treasury Sub-Committee has shown, do not lead to unqualified confidence. The sale of all the Inland Revenue's properties on lease-back to a company registered in a tax haven did not imply a management with a highly developed sense of the ridiculous. Nor was a sense of worldliness obvious when a so-called comfort letter was given to the buyer that breached Treasury directives that apply to every Government Department. The then head of the Inland Revenue was not told about it, and neither was the Minister.

The Treasury Sub-Committee has welcomed the steps taken to tighten management in the new organisation. We have supported the introduction of a framework document setting out who is accountable to whom, and for what. We also welcome the proposal for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to issue an annual remit to the executive chairman outlining the organisation's new and continuing tasks. However, the proposal for the executive chairman to report to three different Ministers on different aspects of the organisation is a formula for confusion, delay and blurred accountability. It is important that the new organisation hits the ground running and puts the past behind it. A first year with management distracted by a flurry of memos around Treasury departments and fruitless co-ordination meetings will not achieve that. I hope that the Sub-Committee's recommendation that this arrangement should be looked at again will be acted on, not when the confusion has happened but without delay.

This Bill is a good basic framework that recognises the inadequacies that have arisen in the past in both Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue. However, it must not be seen as a ritual incantation that in itself will provide a revenue and customs service relevant to the 21st century. It needs complementing by a highly motivated staff, who are managed to make full use of their abilities, directed to achieve clear objectives and provided with investment in technology. All that is vital to them ensuring that the taxation that this House votes for is fairly levied on everyone who has a lawful duty to pay. I am sure that the good wishes of this House go out to all who will be involved in an endeavour that is so fundamental to the life of this country. They will not be thanked by their customers: let us thank them in anticipation of their services.

2.20 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): I join the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) in thanking the Paymaster General and the Economic Secretary for the briefing that they gave us a week or so ago. In particular, I thank the Paymaster General for returning to me an item of clothing that I left in her office at the end of our discussion. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I should clarify that it was a coat. Her generosity in bringing it back to the House was welcome, especially as it was a cold day.

I also join the hon. Gentleman in broadly welcoming the Bill. We share the view of Martin Taylor who, in the evidence that he gave to Gus O'Donnell's report, which was produced in March, said that the separation of tax-gathering departments is anomalous in a modern economy. That is an accurate assessment of the position and I pay tribute to those bodies, such as the Treasury Committee, whose Chairman and other members have been in their places today, for their work in drawing attention to the potential benefits of merger. I am especially pleased that they have indicated that they will continue to track the progress of this merger over the next few years, because that will be important.

We share many of the detailed concerns that the hon. Gentleman outlined and I shall set out some of those in a minute. I am also pleased that the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard), who is also a member of the Treasury Committee, emphasised in his contribution the importance of addressing the tax gap through the merger of the two departments. The Paymaster General gave a long, detailed and helpful speech, but the one area on which she was a little light was an emphasis on how, over time, the merger will seek to address that important issue. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman put it at the centre of what the Government strategy should be.

[Mr. David Laws]

Although I started by saying that we broadly welcome the Bill, we also share the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and by many of the professional bodies about how the merger will work in practice, and we share Martin Taylor's view—set out in his submission to Gus O'Donnell—that the change will be risky, perhaps very risky. We also share the view of the Law Society that major gains could be made from the merger if it is conducted well. The devil will be in the detail and the delivery of the changes. If the Government and those people responsible for delivering and implementing the merger get the detail and the delivery wrong, what could be a triumph—in the Government's mind—could turn into a disaster. It is the risks on which I shall concentrate, bearing in mind that the Bill is essentially a modest mechanism to get the merger up and running, leaving some of the important decisions about powers for consultation and implementation to a later date.

I shall start by setting out the points of agreement with the Government. The first is that although there are many areas in the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise with no obvious overlap in responsibilities, we can see the potential for cost savings within the new department and in compliance for businesses. We also believe that there is a potential for improving action against tax evasion and avoidance. In our view, and as the Treasury Committee concluded—and the Government appear to agree—those gains are more likely to be secured by a merged department than by keeping the two departments separate and trying to institute measures to ensure co-operation between the departments, including some of the measures that have been in place in recent years.

The second reason we support this change is that although it will lead to considerable overhauling of the two departments and, potentially, some disturbance to their activities in the next few years, I would be very surprised if it did not expose the scope for doing business considerably better and at less cost. When I was in the private sector, one particular company used to refer to Spanish practices that built up over time and institutionalised inefficiencies. I am not sure that it is politically correct to refer to such practices in that way now, but I am sure that the merger will reveal areas where things could be done considerably better.

Thirdly, we welcome the mechanism through which the Government will deliver the merger. The O'Donnell report clearly set out different options for the Government in proceeding with the merger, including legislating rapidly for the new department on issues such as its powers or taking a more leisurely approach and allowing plenty of time for consultation on the powers of the new department. The Government have taken a sensible approach in introducing this modest enabling Bill and leaving time and scope for consultation. We share the welcome voiced by the hon. Member for Chichester for a consultation paper in January that will allow people an early chance to feed their views into the Finance Bill for 2006, regardless of which party will then be in power.

The fourth area of agreement is on the establishment of a new Revenue and Customs Prosecution Office. As my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) said earlier, he has argued for such a body for some time, and it was also proposed in the Butterfield report. It is a sensible change.

The fifth and final area is one in which I differ from the hon. Gentleman, although I acknowledge that he has more experience and skills in such matters, so I may be making a mistake. Nevertheless, I welcome the fact that the Government will take back some control over strategic leadership on tax policy from the two departments and put it in the Treasury. That is where it belongs.

Dawn Primarolo indicated assent.

Mr. Laws: The Paymaster General may not nod so enthusiastically at my next point. I believe that considerable weakness and lack of coherence has been evident in tax policy for a long period. There has been a lack of assessment of the costs and benefits of new tax proposals. Tax changes have appeared to follow short-term political imperatives and the initiatives brought forward by the Chancellor, or have followed attempts to plug tax loopholes as they emerge, no doubt on the sensible advice of the two Revenue departments, rather than being part of a coherent, long-term tax strategy.

I pray in aid the O'Donnell report, which said that "the precise formal role of each department is"— in other words, has been—"ill defined."

That refers to the two Revenue departments and the Treasury. On page 99, the report also implies that at present Treasury officials—and the Treasury as a whole—may be more reactive than proactive in relation to tax policy. The report talks of ministerial policy initiatives and the co-ordination and presentation of overall tax policy—an important part of the Government's work on tax—but says little about setting a broad tax strategy. I hope that the new approach to management of such matters will leave much of the expertise in developing tax policy in the new merged department, especially in relation to anti-evasion and avoidance activity. I hope that it will also lead to a more strategic perspective in the Treasury. This is certainly an opportunity for a more strategic approach to tax policy, which many businesses would welcome. It would also bring about an obligation to be more strategic on tax policy and to simplify taxation.

As the Chartered Institute of Taxation said in its paper on the benefits of the merger for business:

"We consider that merger creates an additional need for simplicity"; not least if the staff in the new merged department are really able to interact with customers, particularly business customers, as part of a one-shop stop. In that regard, Martin Taylor, in his submission to the O'Donnell report, said that

"integration of tax administration would be more likely to succeed if backed by a Government commitment to simplification as part of the enterprise agenda".

Mr. Tyrie: I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman has just said, but surely the lack of high-quality cost-benefit analysis for tax changes, the increased complexity of the system, the need for more simplicity, the obsession with tax avoidance and many other things are the responsibility of Ministers not of administrators. It is to blame administrators for decisions taken by politicians to suggest that a reorganisation of the structure can solve the problems to which he has alluded.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman is right: ultimately, Ministers have accountability for determining tax strategy and pursuing it. I am sure he is also right to say that revenue Departments and Treasury officials, if given clear and helpful advice about how Ministers want the tax system to develop, would deliver the necessary policies. However, my sense of the way things have worked in practice over recent years is that that has not actually happened, partly perhaps because much of the tax policy expertise has been in the individual revenue Departments rather than centrally. I may be naïve in thinking that this reform will change that aspect of the system, but I live in hope.

As we debate the detail of the Bill, we must remember that many people outside in the real world, especially in the business world, will not be as interested in the small elements and small changes in the Bill as in what it will mean over time for the tax system as a whole. David Frost, the director general of the British Chambers of Commerce, summed up the general view of tax practitioners and business men about the British tax system when he wrote recently:

"Britain's tax system has come into being piece by piece over the years . . . often without regard to the complexity of the whole. Our tax system is already over-complicated, but each year brings new additions and alterations. Tax simplification is often identified by the government as a goal, but progress is rarely achieved."

I hope that setting up the merged department will be the opportunity for a more coherent tax strategy and that it will galvanise the Government into simplifying the tax system, because without simplification the benefits of merger will be much less than they might otherwise be.

Mr. Barnett: As usual, my hon. Friend is giving a powerful speech. I fully agree with what he says about the necessity for a more co-ordinated approach to tax strategy. With that, of course, will come responsibilities for Treasury operators to accept the level of confidentiality that will be imposed on members of the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Laws: I agree with my hon. Friend. He is absolutely right to suggest that change in the location of the policy-making bodies for tax should in no way compromise taxpayer confidentiality. The Government have already given certain guarantees about that and we shall obviously be able to probe them in more detail in Committee.

I have covered the points of agreement in our approach to the Bill, so now I want to consider some of the aspects that are of greater concern to us and to pick up some of the points raised by the hon. Member for Chichester. I shall start by focusing on the Government's objectives in introducing the Bill and the problems that are likely to arise in its implementation. I share the concerns of the hon. Gentleman about whether the Government have a clear sense of the ranking of the achievements and objectives they want to secure through the Bill. At least three have been mentioned frequently: increased efficiency, reduced compliance costs for business and more effective tax gathering. Do the Government have a clear sense of the ranking of those priorities?

Over recent months, we have heard much from all political parties about the need to make savings in Government expenditure. Indeed, we have heard a lot from both the Government and the Conservative party about the need to make administrative savings in Government expenditure. Much of the context for the announcement of the Bill focuses on efficiency savings and job cuts but not on the possibly bigger issue raised earlier by the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford—the tax gap. Is the Chancellor giving short-term cost reduction too high a priority, or giving it too high an emphasis over more important objectives? Concern about that seems widespread not only among employees and their representatives—we should expect them to be worried about reductions in staff numbers—but also among professionals who have commented on the Bill.

Those people are right to be concerned about whether the Government's focus is simply on securing efficiency savings. After all, when the Chancellor announced the merger of Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue in his 2004 Budget statement, he did so in the context of securing value for money, as he put it, in a section of his speech where he announced—with, I understand, no previous consultation with employee groups—a gross reduction of about 54,000 staff in the Department for Work and Pensions, Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue. As one of the witnesses to the Select Committee said, "any private organisation which had announced job cuts in that way would be vilified".

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely wrong to say that there was no discussion with representative bodies of the two departments before the Budget announcement. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary and I, as the Ministers with responsibility for those departments, had long discussions with the unions on how to modernise, and how to make savings and efficiencies to move forward in those departments. On the very day that the announcements were made, we briefed them on that matter, so what the hon. Gentleman says is not true; the discussions were of long standing.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for clarifying that point and obviously I accept her comments, but will she accept that many Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise staff learned about the plans through hearing them announced on the radio or on television or by hearing the announcement made in the House of Commons? It appeared to many people that the plans were driven by the Government's political need to face down many of the criticisms made by the Conservatives about wasteful public expenditure rather than by a focus on the best way to manage the important resource of staffing in those departments.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman is wrong again. Both departments have a good history of partnership working with the representative trade unions. As the Gershon review was being worked on—not just on the day of the Chancellor's speech—my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary and I ensured that at each point the representative bodies knew the nature of the discussions and the likely progress that would be made.

Mr. Laws: I do not want to get bogged down on that particular point. Having discussed the issue with local representatives of the Inland Revenue offices in my area, I can tell the Paymaster General that they seem to feel strongly about the way in which the announcement was made, and the Government should be acutely aware of that in terms of taking staff on board for a strategy that will mean considerable change.

To return to the Government's presentation of the matter, on 23 November, the Gracious Speech announced the merger in the context of "reducing bureaucracy and the costs of Government".

In other words, the focus was very much on efficiency, costs and the staffing savings that could be made rather than on the tax gap—the point raised by the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford earlier.

As earlier exchanges in the debate showed, and the hon. Member for Chichester highlighted, there is considerable uncertainty about what the economics of the merger are. I hope that the Economic Secretary will be able to clarify an important point about the £507 million savings when he sums up the debate. My understanding is that the savings of £507 million over the spending review period relate to the total reduction in staff numbers, now set at 12,500 jobs net—16,000 jobs gross—rather than the 3,200 job cuts that relate specifically to the merger of the departments. I should think that 3,200 job cuts equate roughly to savings of £75 million or £100 million a year, cumulating upwards over a period of time as the cuts take place. I do not see how the Government can get to a figure of £507 million over the spending review period, unless they are doing what the Paymaster General earlier criticised the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) for doing—conflating the general Gershon savings with the impact of the merger savings.

We also know from the Government's regulatory impact assessment—thin though that is on the monetary costs and benefits of the merger—that certain costs will arise as a consequence of the merger. The Government put those costs at £75 million for the two years 2004–05 and 2005–06. Presumably, that is just a small portion of the costs that will arise as a consequence of the merger, particularly given that the figure relates to two years and that not much expenditure will be incurred in the first year, 2004–05.

Standing back, as the hon. Member for Chichester sought to do, and assessing whether the Government will make any such efficiency saving at all over the period of the spending review and, indeed, over the rest of the decade, I have considerable scepticism about whether any net saving will be made from the merger. When the Economic Secretary replies to the debate, I would welcome any clarification on whether he expects any net saving during either the period of the spending review or the rest of the decade from the merger.

My confidence in the Government's lack of clarity about such things is reinforced by the O'Donnell report, which says on page 63, in section 3.99:

"when Jobcentre Plus was created the benefit of providing a unified contact point . . . in terms of efficiencies, job outcomes, and reductions in fraud and error, were projected to equal the investment cost within seven to eight years."

In other words, it may be well into the next decade before any net annual saving is made from the merger of the Departments.

Does it really matter whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Gracious Speech are rather over-hyping the potential to make efficiency savings, while the Government quietly, sensibly and rather elusively indicate in their own assessments that there may not be any net saving? I am not sure whether that is simply an issue of presentation, about which we should not concern ourselves. If the Government in presenting the merger and its justification put a great premium on the possible staff and efficiency savings and the Government are competing with other parties in the run-up to the general election to promise reductions in civil service numbers, a great deal of pressure could be put on the new department to make savings in staff numbers that might not be borne out by the sensible economies that the department would implement if left to its own devices.

That point marries with the point made by the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford, and it was made very effectively in an article in The Tax Journal by John Davidson of Baker Tilly on 19 April 2004, where he says:

"If the motivation for the merger is to save money and to cut jobs, it could be to the long-term detriment of the Revenue and the taxpayer. It will save a large sum of money. At the average salary cost, the loss of 10,500 will give a saving of £267 million. This, however, is just 0.08 per cent. of the revenue raised by the two departments".

In the year that he cited, that revenue was £338 billion, and I think that I heard the Paymaster General say earlier that it was rising to £400 billion over the period that we are considering. The article continues:

"If job cuts cause a 0.1 per cent. loss of revenue, the savings"—

even those excluding the cost of the merger—

"will not have been worthwhile."

The importance of the contribution made by the hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford is underlined by the similar point that Martin Taylor makes in his contribution to Gus O'Donnell's report. He says:

"the reduction of the tax gap is far the bigger prize, and should be the priority rather than costs . . . this should be made clear to the new management, who should not be judged primarily on the attainment of secondary objectives."

That is exactly right, and the Paymaster General very helpfully and honestly acknowledged—she need not look worried when I say that—in her earlier comments that the 3,200 staff reduction figure from the merger is itself a guess.

The Inland Revenue officials who gave evidence to the Treasury Sub-Committee, which is chaired by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), were clear that the 3,200 figure was taken from guestimates of previous changes, including those in the Department for Work and Pensions. So it could be that the 3,200 figure is unlikely to be delivered and that Mr. Varney could find himself working to promises that he has given to the Government to deliver staff reductions that he would not want to bear out in practice. I hope that when the Economy Secretary replies to the debate, he will give us a clear undertaking that he and the Paymaster General will advise the chairman to focus on reducing the tax gap and compliance costs and only to reduce staff numbers when the Government can be sure that doing so will not damage those two other objectives.

I take some hope from David Varney's contribution to Gus O'Donnell's report, where he wrote:

"It will be a challenge to keep a long-term focus on the effectiveness prizes and not fall prey to the temptation to substitute short-term cost reduction objectives."

David Varney knows very well what the priorities are, and I hope that the Economic Secretary and the Paymaster General will strongly support him in ensuring that those are the priorities. I wonder therefore whether the Economic Secretary could give us more information about those very important issues that relate to the merger's economic costs and benefits. Will he give us a time scale for the reduction of 3,200 jobs in the merger; or is that figure so uncertain that no time scale can be offered?

Will the Economic Secretary be absolutely clear with us about whether the £500 million savings relate to the merger or to the Gershon savings? Can the Government give us any guestimates of what the net savings will be from the merger over this spending review period, let alone any further round? Can the Economic Secretary give us any indication of whether there will be any net saving over the spending review period?

Will any of the 3,200 job losses result from outsourcing in the two departments? I understand that Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue have different arrangements governing the extent to which they outsource work. I am sure that the Economic Secretary would not want any pressure to be put on the new department artificially to reduce job numbers by outsourcing, rather than doing what is in its best economic interests. In particular, is there any plan to outsource the debt collection facility of the combined department?

On the number of total employees, is the Economic Secretary confident that both departments are able to carry out their current work, particularly with tax credits, which have caused a lot of problems recently, not least because of the huge backlogs at the call centre. Is the Economic Secretary confident that, despite the job losses, the combined department will be able to introduce the new proposals on child trust funds?

The hon. Member for Chichester is right to draw attention to the fact that the job numbers at the Inland Revenue and in the combined department appear to have increased quite a lot since 1997–98, but the O'Donnell report makes it clear that all the increase in job numbers at the combined department is a consequence of additional burdens imposed on the department in relation to issues such as tax credit, while the underlying number of staff who carry out the work that was done before 1997 has fallen slightly. We want to ensure that the staff are there to do those important jobs, particularly in relation to tax credits on which the lowest income people in the country depend.

I want to probe the Government's thinking on a couple of other issues. Following the concern about the lack of clarity about costs and staffing, the second issue is the Government's expected improvement in compliance-related activity. It was clear from Gus O'Donnell's evidence to the Treasury Committee that even the Government accept that there is currently a huge tax gap in the United Kingdom. Mr. O'Donnell's evidence indicated that that gap was likely to be around 8 to 10 per cent. of revenues, which is in the order of magnitude of £30 billion or £40 billion.

It is unusual for such an estimate to be volunteered by a senior Government official because the Government tend to be sensitive about acknowledging the extent of the problem of tax evasion and tax avoidance. Given that that figure has been put into the public domain and that Mr. O'Donnell was willing to acknowledge that the figure for uncollected VAT alone is estimated by the Government at 12 per cent.—£12 billion a year that would be collected if people adhered to the letter of the tax law—I am interested to know whether they anticipate that the tax gap will be closed in any way by the merger of the two departments.

I should have liked the Paymaster General to say more about the detail of how the Government plan to close that enormous tax gap, which after all is the central purpose of the two departments. We can talk as long as we want about improving service to customers, but, as the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) pointed out robustly in the evidence taken by the Select Committee, ultimately the purpose of the departments is to collect revenue for the Government's public services and other priorities. If £30 billion or £40 billion is going missing, it needs to be a high priority for the new department to tackle.

On compliance, the new department must focus on those entities who are in the black economy, and who are probably avoiding contact with both Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue, rather than simply focusing all efforts on the largely compliant group of businesses and taxpayers, which could be easier targets for it. Have the Government recently estimated the compliance cost to business, one of the recommendations by the Treasury Committee in its report in 2000? Will there be an opportunity, either now or in the year ahead, to estimate the savings to business from the reduction in compliance activity? Has the Economic Secretary considered whether the tax system, in particular the business tax system, can be simplified to reduce the compliance burdens on business?

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) (Con): The hon. Gentleman mentions the 2000 report. I chaired the Sub-Committee that produced it. Does he accept, both in the context of efficiency and the tax take, that part of the answer to his question depends on whether the Inland Revenue or Customs takes the lead in the merger? One of the things that we encountered was that Customs was a much less effective and efficient organisation than the Inland Revenue.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that. He speaks with great expertise, having chaired that particular inquiry. One thing that came out of the inquiry as it related to simplification was that merging the two departments, with their different histories, traditions and knowledge base, would work only if the individuals in the combined department can handle the complexity of the tax system. That requires the Government to ensure that the tax system is simplified.

[Mr. Laws]

We could no doubt speak for some time about the problems with IT systems throughout government. The hon. Member for Chichester referred to those. That will also be an enormous challenge for the new department, potentially at a huge cost, which was mentioned a number of times in evidence taken by the Treasury Committee.

To sum up, there is an enormous job to be done if the planned merger is to realise the promised benefits. This small Bill is a first and rather simple step down the route towards a merged department. We shall scrutinise the detail in Committee, but its delivery and implementation will determine whether, in the years to come, it is a great triumph or a terrible disaster. The way in which it is implemented, and the way in which Treasury Ministers and those in the new department lead the merger, will have a massive impact on whether it is a success or failure.

We are glad that the Treasury Committee has undertaken to continue to monitor the merger. We will also watch it closely. The Government have our support for the Bill as a whole, but only if they allow managers to focus on the big potential prizes, and not if the process is driven simply by their short-term political imperatives or the need to outbid the Conservative party in cutting back on the jobs of those people who work in the public services.

2.55 pm

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am sorry that I missed the first part of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General, but I heard the other speeches, and very good they were too. I compliment in particular my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard), whose speech was excellent.

My concern is whether the Bill will close the tax gap or have the opposite effect. Given Labour's commitment to public services, anything that brings in more revenue to the Government is important. Some commentators have suggested that the Chancellor has a bit of a revenue gap. I would not necessarily argue that, but if he has, the extra revenue will help in the coming years.

There is also talk of staff cuts. I have close relations with the civil service union, the Public and Commercial Services Union, which is worried about employment. Its members are dedicated public servants who are committed to the broad common good. The union wants the new department to do its job properly and wants it to be properly resourced.

I hope that the new arrangements for prosecutions will also help to close the tax gap. If prosecutions are more effective, that will encourage those who are evading or avoiding tax to pay their taxes, as all good citizens should, so that we have more to spend on essential public services. However, the staff cuts worry me.

I have some anecdotes of my experiences. Three or four years ago, I took it on myself to visit our local VAT inspectorate. I was impressed with what I saw. It was explained that had it got more staff, it could collect more revenue. The rough estimate was that every additional VAT inspector collected five or six times his salary in VAT every year. I wrote to Treasury Ministers, suggesting that we should have more inspectors because we could clearly bring in far more to the Exchequer than the cost of their salaries, which would be a good thing in every way. I got a bland reply, mentioning staff costs. I am afraid that I did not get a positive response.

I also took it on myself a little while ago to visit customs officers at Luton airport. Again, the same story. They were doing a good job of catching people who were involved in smuggling drugs in particular. They wanted more staff so that they could do an effective job because they were stretched. Again, I wrote off, saying the same thing.

PCS members and officers tell me that the same is true of personal and business taxation. With more tax officers specialising in those fields, they could collect more revenue, at a multiple of their salaries, so more staff rather than less would be good. It may be that other staff who are not inspectors and who are not directly concerned with tax collection could have their jobs modernised with IT systems or whatever, but inspectors can collect many times their own salaries. I ask my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to give that serious thought.

I also had the experience—again, this is an anecdote, although I am sure the experience is not uncommon—of returning from the continent 15 years ago. As one does when returning from holiday in France, I had a certain amount of wine in my car.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): For your own use.

Mr. Hopkins: Very much so.

The limits at the time were less than they are now, and I had rather more than the limit. Trying to be a good citizen, that night I drove through the red line, which said "Something to Declare". Everyone else was going through the green line, which said "Nothing to Declare". There was no one present at the red line, so I got out of my car and had to walk a considerable distance. I looked about 20 ft upwards to find the only customs officer on duty, who was waving people through the green line. I said, "Excuse me." He said, "What do you want?" I said, "I would like to pay my duty, please. I have a certain amount of wine above the limit." The officer was astonished. I had written out what I had bought and where I had bought it. I even had those documents that are called factures, which people are supposed to have when they transfer wine across France.

I wanted to do the right thing. I did not wish to be prosecuted. As I have said, there was only one customs officer on duty. That suggested to me that Customs was under-resourced. It may have been that all the other officers were off sick or that Customs was not efficiently organised, but that was not my impression. My impression was that one man had been left at the port all night to wave the people through the green route. I am sure that things are better now than they were then. I am talking of 14 years ago when a public expenditure-cutting Conservative Government were in office, not a proper Labour Government who would know that we have to fund public services properly.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I assure my hon. Friend that I, as a solicitor, always tried to be scrupulously honest in the same regard. I had the same experience as my hon. Friend, but there were three customs officers on duty.

Mr. Hopkins: It was obviously a larger port or a good day. I do not know.

Rob Marris: It was Dover.

Mr. Hopkins: It was a larger port. I was at a small port.

I have the greatest admiration for Customs and Excise officers and for income tax officers. I have never found any fault with the Inland Revenue. I only wish that my ability to complete my tax form was half as good as the Inland Revenue's in checking it. Customs and Excise does a splendid job. It is vital to ensure that the Government get their revenue, which they can spend on public services and salaries for all our public servants. We must ensure that that revenue is collected.

I am concerned about the failure to collect taxes. The failure to bridge the gap means that there is effectively a culture of petty criminality among people who are finding ways of avoiding or evading paying tax. That is particularly the case when importing cigarettes, other forms of tobacco and alcohol from the continent of Europe. That is not a good thing. We are a law-abiding society and I think that people like to obey the law. If we fail to police the taxation system and Customs and Excise properly, over time, we will allow that culture of petty criminality to develop.

Allowing vast amounts of tobacco and alcohol to enter the country, illegally or legally at cheaper prices than would be charged in the UK, runs counter to the Government's public health agenda. We should maintain the price of cigarettes and, I suggest, alcohol at the levels that we think are appropriate in Britain. That is a way of constraining people from excessive consumption. We think that the continent has got it wrong—I do, anyway. If it is serious about dealing with alcohol and smoking, it should introduce higher prices. Alcohol prices, as a proportion of disposable income, are now half what they were in the 1970s. Floods of alcohol are coming in from the continent that are not effectively policed or constrained.

The money that is lost by failing to collect duties and taxes on those items is of fundamental importance to the Government. I want the Government to spend money on many other things. For example, free long-term care for the elderly could easily be financed just by collecting the tax on tobacco that is coming in from the continent illegally.

That is an equation that I make frequently. I hope that the Government will take the point seriously. I hope also that the Bill will make a big difference in closing this tax gap. I hope that the Government will not use the measure only as a means of cutting the numbers of civil servants in the Departments, especially as the civil servants that we are talking about, above all, are the ones who collect money. They do not spend money. Their salaries are as nothing compared with the amount of money that they bring in. If we need more of them to collect more money to narrow the tax gap, we should appoint more of them. I hope that the Government will take a positive view of these fine and honourable public servants and not look to every opportunity to cut their numbers.

There have been numerous problems with IT systems in the public sector. Is it not time that we looked to have more in-house IT systems rather than relying on what are clearly unreliable private companies? The contracts have gone wrong on so many occasions. Surely it is time that we looked seriously at an in-house public sector IT facility or brought in-house as much as we can of IT systems and services.

I hope that the Government do not seek to outsource any of the services that are undertaken by the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. Above all, we need people in these services who have a sense of dedication to the public sector and who believe in and feel that public service ethic. They are people on whom we depend for the civilised society in which we live. It would be a mistake to push them into the profit-making sector. I hope that they will be kept as directly employed public servants and that they will continue to collect the £30 billion or £40 billion that we have heard about so that we can have more to spend on the health service, education and all the other fine public services.

3.6 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Sevenoaks) (Con): The House will be impressed by the integrity of the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins), given his vignette about his return from France. He spoilt it only slightly by suggesting that under a Conservative Government there were fewer customs officers on duty. It is true that, under the Conservative Government, duty was much lower than it is now.

The hon. Gentleman made some important points about jobs, to which I shall return. It is important that Ministers address seriously the argument that the PCS has advanced. It has been put to the Treasury Sub-Committee. I am grateful for the kind words that have been said about the report of the Sub-Committee, which I have the honour to chair. The Committee, as my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer) reminded us, has been on this track for some time. It was in 1999, when he chaired the Committee, that it first recommended that a feasibility study should begin of the prospects of merging these two great and historic Departments. It was a year later, after taking evidence about other countries that had merged the two services successfully, and notably Canada, that the Sub-Committee made its final report in April 2000, recommending a full merger between the two Departments.

That recommendation was rejected by the Government, as has been said. One of the things that puzzled the Sub-Committee when we came to consider the merger again was why the Government had changed their mind. It is important for the Government to declare why they have now accepted the recommendation.

I was alarmed by the permanent secretary's reply when he was asked why he had changed his mind. He pointed to the record of other bits of Whitehall being merged. He pointed to the emergence of the Department for Work and Pensions. I do not think that it is necessarily the case that the functions carried out by that Department are demonstrably better carried out now than they were when they were distributed among other Departments.

Secondly, the permanent secretary suggested that the creation of the Financial Services Authority, which had taken on the functions of a number of different regulators, had also encouraged the Government to think again. I am not sure about that parallel either. Regulators are much smaller than the bodies that we are now considering.

Sir Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend is making a strong point about the Government changing their mind. Perhaps an even stronger point is that we have had a change of Ministers between the two decisions. I think that the Paymaster General was in office at the time.

Mr. Fallon: My hon. Friend makes the point. We were surprised when we heard the announcement a year ago and it is worth trying to probe the Government on the reasons that they put forward. The evidence that we took from the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland pointed to a very different parallel. It said:

"From past experience of the merger of the Inland Revenue and the Contributions Agency, the proposal to merge the Revenue and Customs does not inspire confidence."

It pointed out that, five years on, those two bits of the Inland Revenue still cannot properly exchange information on their computer systems. That is why it is important that this merger, which I welcome, is justified on genuine grounds. It is not enough to say that it is simply strategic or that such mergers have worked elsewhere in Whitehall.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): In the course of my hon. Friend's Sub-Committee's inquiry, was he furnished with any statistics showing the greater cost and efficiency savings that should be delivered by the merger?

Mr. Fallon: We probed hard on that point and I will come to the costs and benefits, but first I want to deal with the reasoning behind the merger. As I said, it is not enough to say that merging two departments like the ones covered by this Bill has worked with other departments or that the decision is simply strategic. In the business world, that would not justify a merger. I should remind the House of my business interests. One usually becomes involved in a merger in business because one can convince the board or shareholders that a merger will add value, reduce costs and make organisational sense. I had hoped that the Ministers behind the Bill and the Chancellor would have set the case out more clearly.

To be fair to Ministers, they have set out some reasons. First, they have said that they hope that the merger will improve taxpayer compliance to close the tax gap. Several colleagues have already mentioned that important point. Secondly, Ministers have said that the merger will reduce the cost of compliance and, thirdly, that it will reduce the costs of collection. If those are the three stated objectives behind the merger, we should, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley) implied, perhaps have had a stronger indication of the exact savings that can be quantified.

Any merger in the private sector—David Varney has been involved in a number of mergers in the private sector—would have been preceded by a proper cost-benefit analysis. We pressed the permanent secretary and Mr. Varney hard on that point and, although it is hard to be sure, there appears to have been some attempt at quantifying the actual costs and benefits. However, that attempt seems to have been abandoned. We recommend in our report that such analysis should take place as soon as practicable. Even if we believe that the Government's explanation that we cannot properly cost the savings until some of the second-order issues are resolved, we are still entitled to ask for the cost-benefit analysis to be carried out as soon as possible.

Mr. Ruffley: Is that explanation not puzzling given that, under the Gershon review, very detailed numbers have been given for efficiency and cost savings? Is there not a contradiction there?

Mr. Fallon: There is a contradiction and I would have expected the Sub-Committee to have been presented with more detailed analysis than we received.

The explanatory notes on the Bill contain a particular figure. It is tucked away in paragraph 284, which tells us that integration

"will lead to initial costs of around £75 million over the two financial years 2004/2005 and 2005/2006."

At least we have some indication of the initial costs.

The Paymaster General has also told us today—I think for the first time—that there will be savings of £500 million by 2007. It is still not clear where those savings will come from: whether they result from the 3,200 posts that will be scrapped directly, from the Gershon exercise or from a combination of the two. When the Economic Secretary winds up, I hope that he will be clearer with the House about the figure of £500 million. As the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) said, it seems a large figure if we are simply talking about the 3,200 posts. I am not clear whether it is a cumulative figure—the Government have previously counted things several times—or whether it is the actual figure that directly relates to the cost savings.

Mr. Laws: Is the hon. Gentleman suspicious, as I am, that the Paymaster General may have muddled up the savings from Gershon with the savings from the merger? Is he particularly suspicious given the answer that David Varney gave to his question in the Select Committee hearings? David Varney said that there would savings of £507 million over the spending review period and a saving of 12,500 jobs net, a figure that clearly relates to total job savings and not just to the merger itself.

Mr. Fallon: I am not clear on that point and it falls to the Economic Secretary to clarify the figure of £500 million when he winds up. He must tell us how it has been arrived at, whether it is cumulative, whether it includes the 3,000 posts, whether it excludes Gershon and whether it relates to annual savings.

The only other hint of further costs, rather than savings, is the reference on page 10 of the regulatory impact assessment. It suggests that there may be further costs to integration resulting from changes to join up some of the services that the two departments currently provide. It states:

"These cannot be quantified until the associated policies have been agreed."

We are not quite clear what those costs are, but it is clear that they are costs and not savings. The Economic Secretary owes us a further explanation of the costs and benefits and I hope that he will reply to our specific recommendation—I do not think that the Paymaster General quite did—that the costs and benefits should be quantified as soon as practicable when the integration policies are agreed and brought back before the House.

The hon. Member for Luton, North raised the important issue of jobs, which is well documented in the PCS's submission to the Sub-Committee. We are told that, as part of the Gershon review, 12,800 full-time posts will be scrapped and that, as a result of the merger, 3,200 specific posts will be lost. That is a rather one-dimensional view of efficiency savings. When one asks Ministers and David Varney about the savings that will result from merging these two great departments, they respond only in terms of the number of posts to be scrapped.

As someone more distinguished in the Treasury keeps saying, it is not the job title that one holds but what one actually does that matters in government. It is not right simply to consider efficiency savings in terms of the number of jobs that will be scrapped. Instead, I would have expected to hear from the Government how the work load of the two departments, once merged, would be handled more efficiently.

I would have liked the Government to have responded much more vigorously on the whole issue of reducing the costs of compliance for business. If it is true that a merged customs and revenue service is going to result in reduced compliance costs for individual taxpayers or for business, I would have expected the Government to have set themselves more vigorous targets.

In an earlier Sub-Committee report, we said how impressed we were by the Finance Ministry in Holland in which officials have been set a specific target of reducing by 25 per cent. over four years the costs to business of complying with taxation. It has introduced modelling for the smallest businesses that enables it to measure the actual costs to small businesses, shopkeepers and medium-sized firms of filling in tax forms and of complying with the tax burden. Some 17 people in a unit in the Finance Ministry are dedicated to reducing the costs of compliance. I hope that Ministers will set the new service a much more specific target for reducing the costs of compliance for business.

I turn to the Bill itself, which is only the first of two Bills. I have two problems with that. Because the Bill is so minimalist, there is a risk, as the regulatory impact assessment pointed out, that its scope is inadequate. Because it is so minimal and has been introduced so quickly, it may not fully cover the arrangements that need to be put in place. I was alarmed to hear that we are to be faced with Government amendments to the Bill as soon as it starts in Committee. I very much hope that when choosing the two-stage minimalist approach, the Government have drafted the Bill correctly.

There does not appear to be a firm commitment to the second stage. The Department said:

"More substantive change, and change requiring further legislation, will be considered as part of a longer term programme of work."

That does not sound like an explicit commitment to a second-stage Bill, although I understood the Paymaster General to say earlier that there was a commitment to produce the second stage in 2006 or 2007. Perhaps the Economic Secretary could clarify that. It is worth some clarification, because we have some experience of two-stage reform. We are still waiting for the second stage of House of Lords reform, which still has not emerged some years after the first stage was introduced.

Secondly, there is the issue of powers. I welcome the non-transferability of powers to prevent any inadvertent widening of powers in the new department. That will need to be scrutinised in Committee. It reinforces the need for further legislation and for that to be forthcoming reasonably early, to ensure that the powers are appropriate, proportionate and fit for purpose. If the Government are committed to those tests—that the powers they are taking are to be appropriate, proportionate and fit for purpose—they need to get on with the consultation and get the new powers into statute as soon as possible.

One specific power that will concern anyone who scrutinises the Bill in detail is the power in clause 10 requiring officials to comply with "any directions of a general nature given to them by the Treasury."

The explanatory notes are helpful. They state that that excludes directions on the day-to-day management of the service or on operational matters. The intention is fine, but the clause is not sufficiently tightly drafted. It might be helpful if the Government specified exactly what those might cover. It might seem odd to ask for a general direction to be specified, but it would be helpful if we knew what kind of directions Ministers had in mind, given that the drafting of the clause is so wide.

"directions of a general nature"

I turn to confidentiality, on which I intervened on the Minister. That is a matter of concern to me and the rest of the Sub-Committee. We should always be concerned about confidentiality. I welcome the strength of the Paymaster General's view this afternoon. A further reason for concern is that the departments are being merged into the Treasury building. That puts into sharp relief the question whether we can ensure that officials who are using the same building, sharing the same cafeteria and meeting in the same corridors are properly separated from the Ministers and special advisers who have the more political function.

Given that point, I hope that the Economic Secretary will clarify the downgrading of the oath and statutory declaration. We were told in evidence that it is no longer an oath but a statutory declaration. But, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) said, a statutory declaration made and witnessed at the beginning of each official's employment has some solemnity about it and brings home to the person making the declaration just how serious the matter is. It is therefore not sufficient to write the terms of the declaration into the statute. How many officials taking up office will read the Act? Ministers ought to look again at that and reassure the House. If it is part of the employment contract of staff of the new department, there could still be a case for making that a statutory declaration in front of witnesses, as part of the employment contract. That may be Ministers' intention, but it was not clear from the remarks of the Paymaster General. I think that she appreciates the concern and I hope that the Economic Secretary will clarify the matter.

Finally, on the Bill, I turn to accountability. When we first heard about the merger a year or so ago, I expected that a single department would report to a single Minister. It now appears that the new merged department will report mainly to the Paymaster General, but also to the Economic Secretary on excise duties and green taxes, and to the Financial Secretary on stamp duty, taxes on savings and taxes on pensions. This is not a political point. The hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard) made the same point. It is cumbersome for a new single merged department to report to at least three Ministers. The Treasury Sub-Committee will want reassurance that the lines of accountability are not blurred and that everything possible is being done to narrow accountability to one particular Minister, who I expect to be the Paymaster General.

I shall touch on two other issues that are not directly referred to in the Bill, but that flow from the merger proposal. The first is the department's estate—the buildings that it will occupy. I make no apology for returning to the issue of Mapeley, which has preoccupied my Committee and the Public Accounts Committee over the past two or three years. Because the departments are being merged, the case for rationalising the estate and being clear about the costings of that estate is all the more obvious and important. That brings us back to the Mapeley costings. As the House may recall, the National Audit Office estimated that the facility price—in other words, the cost that the departments will pay Mapeley, the private sector consortium looking after the offices—should have averaged out at about £170 million a year over the 20 years from 2001. In a letter on 24 November, the Paymaster General told me that the payments to Mapeley in the first three years were £235 million in 2001–02, £306 million in 2002–03 and £311 million in 2003–04. Those payments were significantly higher than the NAO expected, and we must ask why. One would expect more rationalisation from a merger, and even after the Mapeley contract was signed—we will not go into the sad history of its offshore sourcing—one would have expected some variation to the contract to have been sought to reduce the number of offices occupied by the merged department.

In her letter, the Paymaster General explained why the NAO price of £170 million a year is nowhere near the £300 million a year that she now pays:

> "NAO modelling is based upon initial pre-contract modelling assumptions and as such would not be expected to capture changes in the profile of the estate due to new legislation or changes in the departments' business model."

Why not? The merger will provide the department's new business model and changes in the legislation.

One would have expected some rationalisation, but instead we have costs. I accept that the costs are for the first three years of a long contract, but they are now running at nearly twice the NAO assessment of the facility's price. The point of putting offices under private sector management is to get away from the department's business modelling and forecasting and into the real world, where people experienced in estate management and commercial property can weigh up matters and make the required savings. In the private sector, such a merger would yield immediate savings by sharing offices, rationalising space and utilising fewer, not more, square feet. In other words, the price paid to Mapeley should be falling, not rising.

In the end, the Bill is about improving the service that the customer gets. In rather a chilling phrase, the Paymaster General said that she wants "to improve the taxpayer experience". Over the past few years, taxpayers have had much experience of paying more and more taxes. Taking her comment at face value, it is important to focus on the aim of the exercise, which is to improve the service to individual taxpayers and, indeed, business taxpayers. The record over the past few years is not particularly good.

The tax credit fiasco, on which my Sub-Committee reported, is not an encouraging precedent. The scandal of deficiency notices that are issued late or not at all again shows that the follow through is not particularly good when changes are made in Whitehall. Evidence is also emerging that the Revenue is not as good at running the benefits system as it was at running the tax system. We must focus on the service that the customer gets. From my experience of constituency casework, the Revenue and Customs must re-examine their interface with customers. For example, the helpline service is not nearly good enough and needs improving.

I am not sure whether people—perhaps even hon. Members—are sufficiently aware of the function of the adjudicator, who rules on complaints against the Revenue and its various sub-departments such as the valuation office. Last year, the adjudicator investigated 374 cases in the Inland Revenue and 98 cases in Customs and Excise, which is not an awful lot. We should use the opportunity presented by the merger to revamp the way in which the Revenue and Customs treat those who pay for them and rely on their services—the situation could and should be better.

Let me sum up. The merger was recommended by the Sub-Committee and is probably a good idea, but it needs to be driven by set objectives and against measurable benchmarks. I welcome this initial legislation and wish Mr. Varney and his team well in implementing it, but I put him, and Ministers, on notice that this is not the end of the story as far as the Treasury Sub-Committee is concerned. We will return to the merger at six-monthly intervals to see how it is getting on, because the stakes are very high indeed.

3.35 pm

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): It is a great pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), who, in his position as Chair of the Treasury Sub-Committee, has done a very thorough job in picking over the bones of this dry but important Bill.

There was not much levity in the debate apart from that provided by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins), who described his experiences in trying unsuccessfully to pay duty on wine. Sadly, he has left the Chamber; I was going to advise him that if he really wants to be done over by Customs on arriving back in this country, he should not look so honest and should drive a white van laden to the springs with wine.

Another moment of levity came from the Paymaster General during her rather long and sombre speech, when, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks said, she told us that she wanted to improve the taxpayer experience.

Dawn Primarolo: I am not bothered what the hon. Gentleman thinks about my speech or its tone, but I gave way endlessly to hon. Members, mainly to his hon. Friends, out of courtesy, and to rebuke me for that seems a bit foolish, as it will not encourage me to do it again.

Mr. Atkinson: I am sorry that the Paymaster General is upset, but she leaped to her feet a little too soon. I understand why she spoke so fully—it is a detailed matter and she had to deal with many interventions—but I merely wanted to ponder on her use of the term, "taxpayer experience". That almost sounds as if dealing with one's tax is a form of entertainment—there is a tourist attraction in Ayrshire called the Tam O'Shanter Experience—and I had a vision of the Paymaster General trying to make taxation more exciting.

Dawn Primarolo indicated dissent.

Mr. Atkinson: She obviously does not agree.

The main unanswered question about the Bill is what lies behind the renewed enthusiasm for the merger. Until now, it has been a classic example of something that lots of officials think a good idea, so it gets taken off the shelf, dusted down, put back, forgotten about and eventually taken back down again. I would be rather worried about an idea that Mr. Gladstone considered and rejected. We missed out some of the history, because Prime Minister H. H. Asquith had a nibble at it when he merged Customs and Excise.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) said, another unanswered question is whether the exercise is worth the candle. We will find out as the Bill progresses. I suspect that my hon. Friend was on to something when he suggested that the Chancellor wants to do this to set an example before he starts to lay about Government Departments. He could have triggered it through a series of timed statutory instruments; indeed, he could have postponed secondary legislation almost indefinitely. The merger is to proceed so incredibly slowly that it does not need to have a great deal of effect, but it enables him to say to other Ministers, "We've put our house in order—now put yours in order."

Another unresolved matter, which I hope will be resolved shortly in the winding-up speeches, concerns how many staff will be involved. The figure seemed to change almost daily between the Chancellor's first announcement in March and the evidence given to the Treasury Sub-Committee in October.

Some years ago, the Conservative Government considered what to do about the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise. It was the subject of much discussion. One suggestion was that the Inland Revenue should merge not with Customs and Excise but with the then Department of Social Security. That option has not been considered. As the Inland Revenue increasingly becomes a tax and benefit-paying operation, it almost makes sense for it to be part of the Department for Work and Pensions rather than merging with Customs and Excise, which, as we have heard, has a different philosophy from the Revenue.

The original Excise men were military figures, with their cutlasses and armed ships. Indeed, they chased the forebears of my constituents who had a readily available supply of illegal whisky stills in the Northumberland hills. The Excise men would wreck the stills. It was said that they were given a reward if they found a still, so when a still burned out, its owner would tell the Excise man who then "discovered" it and collected a reward. The distiller would receive half, which helped him to build a new still further up the hills. That was Northumbria a long time ago—but it is rightly said that the philosophy of the two departments differs greatly.

Customs and Excise clearly has much more of a policing role. That is well set out in the various submissions to the Treasury Committee by the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants, which is worried, probably rightly, about the gung-ho mentality that exists in the Customs service, as opposed to the gentler, more considered approach of the Inland Revenue. I know from experience of running a disorderly business—in its early days—that the VAT man was a sight tougher than the tax man. Anyone who fell behind with VAT payments had little leeway, whereas it was always possible to negotiate some settlement with the Inland Revenue. There are genuine concerns about the different attitudes.

Let me comment on the problems that the Revenue experiences in paying the tax benefits. I am sure that all hon. Members have had constituency cases of overpayment of tax credits that are now being reclaimed, in some instances with a great lack of care for the victim. Obviously, some people must have realised that they had been overpaid, but others did not. They read the forms and thought that they were getting it approximately right. I have a constituent who received £150 in tax credits and has had the sum reduced to £30 a month. That has made a serious difference to her life. To echo my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks, it is almost impossible to get through to the helpline. My constituent came to me to circumvent the difficulty of contacting the helpline.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): My hon. Friend is right. I have a constituent who is being asked for £7,500 that was wrongly paid to him, despite the fact that he phoned the Revenue on every occasion to check that the calculation had been done correctly. He was assured that it was correct until the final occasion, when he was told that a glitch in the computer system had resulted in an overpayment of £7,500. His wife is pregnant—they had planned to expand their family based on the department's errors.

Mr. Atkinson: That is a graphic illustration of the trouble that overpayment causes. It has affected many vulnerable people, who now need help because of the mistakes in the payment of benefit. There have also been computer problems and difficulties with the private finance initiative deal, which has also been mentioned.

I remain in favour of considering the merger, but hon. Members need more information about its objective. What are the costs and benefits? Will it improve the service and make the promised substantial savings? Or will it usher in a long period of confusion and muddle, which will cause considerable difficulties to the customers of Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue?

Finally, there is an issue of accountability that still needs properly to be resolved. The commissioners of the Revenue and of Customs and Excise are appointed by the Crown and are responsible to the Chancellor. Lord Bridges, the archetypal Sir Humphrey, when trying to examine the relationship between the Revenue, Customs and the Government, said:

"The Inland Revenue and HM Customs and Excise are responsible to the Chancellor, and are subject to a measure of Treasury direction. This however means Ministerial direction. The officials of Revenue and Customs do not take orders from Treasury officials."

That was an interesting, if slightly Sir Humphreyish, statement for Lord Bridges to make at that time, and I wonder whether that will continue to be the case under the new regime, or whether Treasury officials will give instructions to the commissioners of the new joint organisation.

3.45 pm

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): As my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) said, we welcome the thrust of the Bill and the principle of merging the Inland Revenue and Customs. However, we temper our welcome with the important caveat that there will be much more detail in the draft regulations, which we look forward to receiving in plenty of time before we debate the Bill in Committee.

I have for some time advocated the subsuming of the prosecution functions of the Inland Revenue into the Department under the aegis of the Attorney-General, and I strongly support what is now happening in that regard. I also strongly support the establishment of a separate, independent prosecution service and the fact that it is to be inspected regularly by the Crown Prosecution Service inspectorate. I presume that there will be some financial consequences, but it is difficult to judge what they will be. Since January 2003, the Customs prosecutors have come under the Attorney-General, and I wonder what additional staff—or perhaps whether fewer staff—have been employed since that time, and whether that has involved savings or additional costs.

I welcome clauses 23 and 24. The recent establishment of the Independent Police Complaints Commission goes a long way towards answering the impossible question: who will guard the guardians themselves? It appears to be settling down well, but there are bound to be resource implications for the IPCC taking on this additional work. Do the Ministers have any idea what those implications will be? Some indication would be welcome. My second question relates to a difficult point. The IPCC is, and should be, independent, and it is up to the commission to run itself. However, it would be interesting to know whether the Ministers have a view on whether the police function within the IPCC should be separate from the Revenue and Customs functions.

I want to refer to the matter of tone and culture, but before I do so, I want to say to the House that we shall debate information sharing and confidentiality in Committee, and that we shall also return to the necessary matter of powers. I am grateful to the Paymaster General for setting out just a few of the important points of principle. This impinges on what my hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil said about the Treasury having a function on the macro side of setting tax policy. I hope that clear guidelines—there are already some—in relation to absolutely solid and enforceable duties of confidentiality will be provided for anyone who, under this Bill, has access to Revenue information As has been said, the Revenue has an enviable culture, and the vast majority of people do not want to break the law. Tax law, however, is extremely complex, taxpayers often do not have a clue what the law is, and it is difficult for small professional firms of advisers to keep up with the complexity of the law and its changes.

In my experience, the Revenue is helpful, in so far as it is accessible locally and reasonably willing to give sensible advice—obviously, its view is not necessarily the correct one, but it is helpful. I hope that such local delivery will be a model of the new department, so that Customs specialists will also be at hand in local offices and will accept Inland Revenue practice.

On training, I refer the Economic Secretary and the Paymaster General to Mr. Justice Butterfield's conclusions. Two particular points should be noted from that Customs inquiry, as hundreds of millions of pounds in duty were lost and an unfortunate series of bungled prosecutions occurred. First, Mr. Justice Butterfield recommended that there should be regular refresher training for investigators, and secondly, that investigators should be subject to systematic external scrutiny. In Committee, we will examine these matters in some detail, and we will want to hear exactly what has happened since the Butterfield report, and on what standards of training the new department will insist. I know from experience that the inspector of taxes course is of high quality and is also recognised in the private sector.

To conclude on the question of culture and tone, I practised as a tax practitioner for 25 years, and I do not believe that in the course of that period I ever had cause to complain about the conduct of members of the Inland Revenue. I hope that, in 25 years' time, practitioners will be able to say exactly the same of the new merged organisation.

3.53 pm

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): This Bill on the merger of Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise carries the general support of the Opposition.

although we remain concerned, as the House will have noted, about its practical implementation. We are dealing with two organisations that have between them 250 legacy computer systems and some 13 million customers. It is no mean feat to put those two together, and we will want to examine the details extremely carefully, not just during consideration of the Bill but in the first few months and years of the merger.

I had the privilege of sitting on the Treasury Sub-Committee in 2000, which was then chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir Michael Spicer). In the course of our inquiry, we came to some conclusions: that the possibility of a merger had not, by 2000, been examined properly by Ministers; that differences in the functions of the two bodies were not insurmountable obstacles to a merger; and that a merger was in fact desirable.

Our 2000 report noted several concerns relating to the closer working programme, which—I should say in all fairness—had been developed not since 1997 but since 1994. We concluded that the programme had not been a great success. There seemed to be no general philosophy or rationale underpinning the various areas chosen for closer working between the two departments. The witnesses whom we consulted could cite few specific benefits to businesses as a result of the programme, and Customs and Excise gave us no clear idea of how it intended the programme to develop in the future. We agreed with the programme's aims, but did not feel that it was achieving its objectives. When we examine the way in which the two departments have tried to co-operate so far, we do not see a happy set of antecedents.

We were rather disappointed by the Government's response to the report. The possibility of a merger was rejected, and the explanation given was this:

"while the Government accepts that merger might bring some of the benefits outlined by the Committee, it believes that they can be achieved without the disbenefits of merger through a dynamic and focused programme of closer working."

The Government have clearly done some more thinking during the three or four years since that statement was made. Like other Conservative Members, I am prompted to ask the reason for the turnaround—the sudden Damascene conversion—especially in the light of the paucity of statistical information and data about cost and efficiency savings in the medium term.

We know that there will be transitional costs upfront, but although the Government seem to have moved to the right side of the argument, we have not seen enough of their working. Some indications of why their views had changed were given in the O'Donnell review, which concluded that a merger would be a good idea—although it noted at the same time that risks were involved in the "business as usual" tax collection model, and that the disruption of projects already planned could attend any merger.

I wonder whether the rather sad events of spring and summer 2003 might have prompted the O'Donnell review. As we all recall and as was mentioned earlier, a computer system that was installed did not deliver, and the fiasco of the working tax credit and child tax credit payments ensued. The Treasury Committee, of which I was a member, took evidence that revealed an unfortunate set of management relations at the Inland Revenue. We also discovered that when the national insurance contributions office was taken away from social security officials in Whitehall and merged with the Inland Revenue, the left hand did not know what the right hand was doing. That led to the shambles of the deficiency notices: Ministers were not aware that they had not been issued, and large parts of the civil service did not know either.

That brings me to two of my concerns, which have not been dealt with by my hon. Friends' trenchant criticisms of other aspects. They relate to information technology. The Treasury Sub-Committee noted the views of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland:

"From past experience of the merger of the Inland Revenue and Contributions Agency, the proposal to merge the Revenue and Customs does not inspire confidence. As organisations, the Contributions Agency and the Inland Revenue had different computer systems and five years after the merger had been completed they still have computer systems which cannot exchange information and accordingly duplicate enquiries and impose unnecessary additional costs on taxpayers in general."

In speaking to the Treasury Sub-Committee, David Varney made clear the scale of the IT problem for him and the associated risks. Indeed, he was very up front, and it might assist the House if I give a flavour of what he said:

"We have 250 major IT systems, and we have 3,000 staff" working in IT.

"It is a huge expenditure ... We, per year, put out 170 million forms and we run 100,000 desktops. So this is a big issue for us. I think what we are bringing in"— in the recent recruitment of a chief information officer—

"is expertise of somebody who has a track record of managing change in IT and delivering business benefits. We also have to get smarter at our pre-risking and big risk minimisation projects, talking through both the IT risk and the operation."

Amen to that. The Paymaster General will doubtless work closely with Mr. Varney on the implementation of change in the IT systems.

However, I offer a strong word of warning. When the computer failures occurred that were responsible for the working tax credit and child tax credit shambles, and for the deficiency notice problem—without even considering the Mapeley problem, which is different in qualitative terms—the chairman of the Revenue came before my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) and I, and said that the Revenue take this issue terribly seriously. He said that a lot of time had been spent stress-testing the system before putting it in place. He acknowledged that it was very complicated, and said that they would spend a lot time ensuring that they got it right.

The problem is that warm words are no use when the system crashes or fails to work in an optimal fashion. Who suffers? The taxpayer suffers, and bad governance is the result. That does no good for the Government of the day, or for democracy and our constituents.

I pray in aid the National Audit Office, which noted in its recent report:

"Contingency plans are needed to handle any changes resulting from the O'Donnell review."

I have great regard for the Paymaster General, who gets into the interstices of her brief. I hope that she will put contingency plans in place, and she will doubtless ask her officials to speak to the NAO and other stakeholders. We need to bear in mind the huge risk involved. We do not want a repeat of the IT shambles.

My final point, to which reference has already been made, concerns enforcement and the culture of the departments that will be merged. I welcome the placing on a statutory footing of the new Revenue and Customs Prosecution Office, which will undertake all the new department's prosecutions. However, I am not entirely clear as to how it will be staffed, or how the varying expertise of the current Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise prosecutors will be melded.

In 1999 and 2000, my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire and I examined how the experience of the Canada Revenue Agency compared with ours, and we discovered that it was similar. To put it bluntly, the expertise of those in the revenue departments here and in Canada is of a higher quality than of those in the customs and excise departments. That is simply a cultural difference. Melding the two to achieve an optimal solution is what this is all about. However, the most recent Select Committee report—the proceedings were chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks—stated that "witnesses were concerned about the different approaches of the revenue departments and how this might impact on the new department."

Those concerns were summarised by the Association of Chartered Certified Accountants, which said:

"The Inland Revenue is more prepared to negotiate and has a more human face. By contrast, mention Customs investigators to accountants and businesspeople and exasperation sets in. Once the Revenue has made a ruling, it generally sticks to it. VAT offices change their minds more often—partly because they tend not to commit themselves in writing."

There is clearly a culture problem and I hope that, when the matter is put to bed, we adopt a pretty robust approach to change management. Ministers should adopt a hands-on approach to ensure that the execution of the merger takes the different cultures into account, but not use that as an excuse for things not going right. We need people to get thinking the right way and to do so quickly.

Mr. Burnett: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that one aspect of the co-operation between taxpayers and the Inland Revenue is the fairly widespread system of clearance procedures? It would be interesting to incorporate that approach rather more frequently in customs matters.

Mr. Ruffley: I am sure that those implementing this huge change will reflect on the good point that the hon. Gentleman has just made.

Mr. David Varney said that there is a need to look further into the different powers and cultures of the current Revenue and the current Customs and Excise. He said:

"I think the proposition we will be putting, if the Bill is introduced, will be to keep the powers that each individual tax activity has in place and to accept that when" the new department

"is up and running we will look again at the question of proportionality of powers in the context of broader institutions that exercise powers of enforcement."

It will be incumbent on the House and associated Select Committees carefully to scrutinise how well the powers vested in the merged department are meshing together. Clearly, there are different kinds of powers and a different enforcement culture in the two departments pre-merger.

For all those reasons, it is fair to say that this side of the House welcomes the merger in principle. Some of us have argued in favour of it for four or five years. We wait to see whether Ministers will clarify whether some of the savings that they talk about are Gershon savings or other savings. What are the medium-term savings and what are the short-term transitional costs? We look forward to greater clarification of those matters.

Finally, we expect the Paymaster General to make two specific undertakings. First, she or her successors should not come back to the House with rather poor or lame explanations for why the IT has not worked. That will simply not be good enough. She and her officials must redouble their efforts, and not lapse into some alibi society as they did with the working tax credit computer model, when they said that they stress tested it, that everything was ready to go and that they simply could not understand why it was a dog's breakfast on the day it went live. No more excuses of that sort will be acceptable to the House.

Secondly, in view of the different cultural mores of these organisations, new uniform management and working together will have to be forced through. We cannot allow excuses such as saying that organic change takes a long time. We want the merger to work and to work as soon as possible. I therefore give a qualified welcome to the Bill on Second Reading.

4.9 pm

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): First, I apologise for attending the debate so late. I had a constituency engagement, the Ealing Family Housing Association annual pensioners' Christmas dinner. When they reached the Christmas carols, particularly "Oh Come, All Ye Faithful", I thought that it was time to come to the Chamber.

Normally, out of politeness to the House, I would not intervene in a debate that I joined so late. However, I do not appear at risk of being trampled to death by other Labour Members wishing to speak so, in my capacity as chair of the Public and Commercial Services Union all-party parliamentary group, I shall make some comments about staffing matters.

I want to begin with a general point about how legislation is considered these days, and what information is provided to the House in connection with staffing and manpower issues. Over recent years, the consideration of Bills has been refined. The explanatory notes accompanying a Bill now contain detailed assurances in respect of costs and compliance with human rights legislation. They also refer to staffing implications—that is, the impact on public service manpower.

That information enables the House to try and identify individual costs and, in some cases, potential savings, but the system gives us a minimum amount of information about manpower issues. The one sentence on the topic in the explanatory notes for this Bill states:

"There will be a net reduction of approximately 3,200 posts as a direct result of the integration."

Admittedly, the Treasury Committee looked in more detail at the staffing reductions consequent to the Bill, but even then the information provided was fairly peremptory. It identified that about 3,000 jobs would be cut as a result of this Bill, in the context of the other staffing reductions that were taking place. About 8,000 jobs will go as a result of the Gershon review and other studies, but the losses implied by the Bill will bring the total of jobs lost in the relevant departments to something like 12,500.

Elsewhere in the public and private sectors when departments are rationalised and merged on such a scale, or when an organisation is reviewed or restructured, it would be expected that some significant detail about the new staffing levels would be made available. In addition, matters to do with staff structures would be covered in a report from the human relations department involved—what used to be called the personnel department—setting out the range of posts that would be lost, and the responsibilities that rested with those posts. Such a report would also outline the new structures being established, and possibly offer some detail about new posts and their functions. As a result, people could use that report to determine whether the new structures would be workable, in comparison with what had gone before.

Interestingly, only a minimum amount of information on staffing implications has been provided with this proposal. More importantly, however, we know in some detail what went on before. The Treasury Committee has conducted many reviews and produced many reports over the years. Those studies have made it clear that both Customs and the Inland Revenue are world-class services. There is no doubt about their probity and the efficiency of their tax collection in many respects, but it is also clear that both services are open to innovation.

I compliment the Government on their spend-to-save and spend-to-raise initiatives, which are proving exceptionally successful, and have enjoyed cross-party support. That success has been highlighted by the Treasury Committee.

I pay tribute to the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), as the Treasury Sub-Committee has also been very frank about mistakes that have been made. That may have embarrassed the Government, but the Select Committee has a job to do and it has done it effectively. To be candid, it is clear that most failures in the past have not been blamed on staff at Customs and Excise or the Inland Revenue. To a certain extent, we as politicians have to take the blame for some of the failures, because some of the policies were wrong and certainly some of the initiatives that we thrust on the staff were ill thought through. At no time has the Treasury Committee made extensive criticisms of the staff and their professionalism. Indeed, the reverse is true: the Committee has been complimentary.

If we know that the existing staffing structures and levels work effectively—indeed, provide a world-class service—we need to be careful when we seek to adjust, review, revise or change those structures. Anyone who has gone through a merger, in the public or private sector, will know what turbulence it can cause in an organisation. Mergers can lead to breakdowns in efficient delivery of services. My anxiety about the proposals is that it is almost impossible to judge from the information that we have been given about staffing whether the proposals will be effective.

Mr. Laws: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman was in his place earlier when the Paymaster General acknowledged that the reduction of 3,200 in staff numbers as a consequence of the merger was a guess—it does not come from a precise analysis but from examining how such mergers have been managed in the past. Does he think that it is sensible to produce such numbers, which are very sensitive for those people affected, in such a manner?

John McDonnell: We can always rely on my right hon. Friend the Paymaster for her integrity and honesty. She gives straightforward answers to questions and, although I missed that part of the debate, her response does not surprise me. Indeed, that was the flavour of the discussion in the Treasury Committee and it is contained in the report. At different times, we have had different figures. The overall number of staff savings has been a moveable feast, and that is an issue not only for this merger, but for Gershon.

I have some anxiety about this proposal—not in principle, because the merger may prove to be successful. My concern is that if the merger takes place with a predicted number of more than 3,000 job cuts, without detailed information on how the organisation will work, posts may be cut that will be needed later. It might be that we rely on some of the Gershon proposals for savings, especially in relation to the introduction of information technology, but Members on both sides of the House will have their own views on our past performance on IT contracts.

I am concerned that we may lose a large number of professional staff on whom we have relied in the past. We are about to create turbulence within departments that will reduce efficiency of service delivery. We may lose some professionalism in the process, at some cost to us all. That may all happen just at the time we need to collect more revenue because of the taxation gap that has been identified. Is that the time to introduce instability into the system? I would have thought that rather than pluck a figure for job reductions out of the air, which then becomes a target, it would be better to plan the merger, develop the staffing structures, and bring the information back to the House. We should plan for investment in staff rather than reductions in staff.

The evidence that the PCS provided to the Treasury Committee set out the objectives of the service effectively and showed a real commitment on the part of staff to make the process work. However, I would not like to see the merger driven through on the back of staff cuts in a way that alienates a dedicated staff. Should we alienate our employees at the same time as launching what some have described as an attack—the Government call it a review—on other rights that they have had for a long time, especially their pensions?

In the public sector, and in that particular part of it, we shall see the build up of a disgruntled staff who face job cuts and a review on reducing their pension entitlements, yet on whom we are putting an increased burden of tax collection due to the Government's overall fiscal problem with the taxation gap. Instead of a successful merger, we shall have produced something that will be counter-productive to everything that we all want to achieve on the efficient delivery of service.

I am especially concerned about the loss of expertise. A managed merger of this sort must be handled extremely carefully. When we have undertaken such exercises in the past—not just mergers but privatisations, too—we have found that it has taken, literally, a decade to overcome the loss of expertise. We debated the railway industry earlier this week. That is a classic example: the system was privatised, staff numbers were reduced and we lost the very experts on whom we should have relied to develop the new service we wanted to deliver.

Staffing and personnel issues must be handled with incredible care. I cannot accept that blanket job cuts of 3,200 are rational at this stage, before we have even examined the merger and staffing structures in detail. At the end of the day, the cuts will prove counter-productive to the Government's overall policy of increasing tax collection and tackling tax avoidance.

Many Members have mentioned the tax credits experience. As constituency MPs, we all highlight the need for a human being at the end of a telephone to explain benefits and the taxation system, rather than some impersonal computerised system. If the Bill goes through, we are about to lose 3,200 human beings who are desperately needed to explain the system and support our constituents; we should not be putting them on the dole queue where they, too, will have to claim some form of tax credit.

There is support for the Bill, but not for the proposed post reductions. In future, when we consider Bills of this sort, we need much more detail, as a matter of course, about the staffing implications, rather than merely a sentence in the explanatory notes.

4.22 pm

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): I want to make some brief comments along the same lines as those of the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell).

I interrupted the Paymaster General twice during her opening speech to ask about the employment implications of the changes. She courteously indicated that the figure was 3,200, and that was that.

When I entered the House more than 40 years ago, I had great problems, like many MPs, about which party it was right to go along with. I had the impression then, which was right, that the Conservative party was the party of efficiency, which went for change and would look after public money carefully. From the financial point of view, it was probably the party that best served the interests of the community. On the other hand, there was no doubt that the Labour party was the party that cared for people and had more concern for them, and that influenced me. However, having listened to MPs over the years, there is no point in hiding the fact that what worries me now is the impression I have received from recent statements by Ministers, including the one we heard today, that the Labour party is forgetting its care for people.

I live in Southend-on-Sea and meet many people who work there in one of the biggest Customs and Excise operations—our VAT office, which has a fine tradition—so, in all sincerity, I can tell the Paymaster General that I know many of those people. I go to church with them, I go to meetings and dinners with them and they are very worried indeed about their future. Will they have jobs? Is the organisation to be changed dramatically? Will there be transfers to other places? That is a particular concern in a place such as Southend-on-Sea, which has traditionally had more unemployment than elsewhere in Essex and the south. The Paymaster General is a courteous and decent person, so I ask her, please, to realise the extent of the worry and concern that those major changes are causing.

My second basic point is that all the efficiency changes made by the Government are not working terribly well for people. The one big change that we had in Southend-on-Sea was the closure of our social security office and the transfer of the work to Jobcentre Plus or to the new pensions office in Norwich. I can assure the Paymaster General that, whereas pensioners used to like visiting the office in Victoria avenue to talk someone about their problems and to ask for help to fill in their forms, they now face the nonsensical situation of making contact with Norwich.

If the Paymaster General would like to phone that number herself, she would find out about all the nonsense involved in being switched from one place to another and hearing a voice that tells people what to do. In addition, the system is subject to long delays. Bearing in mind the number of people who have come to my surgery—I hold a weekly surgery—that is a horrible state of affairs for the pensioners, because they are not getting the same service and they are very distressed about that.

I hope that the Paymaster General appreciates that the VAT office is one of the major sources of employment in Southend-on-Sea. We have only two major employers: one is called KeyMed and the other, of course, is the department. When an earlier proposal was made to transfer the office to another place, it was accepted that Southend had such a long-standing unemployment problem that some special measures should be taken for us.

What are we trying to do? Of course, it would be easy to say, "Let's scrap all these new plans and leave things as they are." That is difficult for the Conservative party, which works in the interests of efficiency. The Paymaster General should appreciate three things. First, it is desperately important that the local staff should be fully informed of what is happening, when it will happen and whether it will have a major impact on their employment. Secondly, facilities should be provided for meetings and discussions involving employees and trade unions. Frankly, unless that happens, people are simply being treated with contempt. Thirdly, the planned changes should take account of the fact that some areas have a tradition of high unemployment and special provision should be made for them.

Although I would in no way suggest that the Paymaster General is a difficult person or is being unkind, I hope that she appreciate that there is sometimes a danger of forgetting people in the rush for efficiency and change. I also hope that she will appreciate that the people who work in that office are very worried indeed and that they are simply looking for some assurances.

This issue was raised by the Treasury Committee, as the Paymaster General will probably know, and page 7 of the report that was made available today refers to a man called Mr. Varney, who is a Mr. Big in the organisation. He was asked what will happen if the redundancies take place. He was also asked whether the 9,000, 10,000 or 12,500 proposed staff cuts—the figures vary—that result from spending review settlement will involve job losses. He replied that he could not rule out redundancies, but he would try to avoid them. Frankly, a married person buying a house with a mortgage, with two or three children at school, who is suddenly faced with the possibility of being made redundant does not have much to look forward to. If people are made redundant, I hope that the Government will go out of their way to try to ensure that they are offered advice about the alternatives or another form of employment.

I can appreciate the Government's desire to move towards greater efficiency, but as a local MP, I do not particularly like it because I found from the other changes that people previously benefited from personal contact with individuals and that they do not like the fact that they have to contact a remote office in Norwich and must do so by phone and by pressing buttons. That is not an improvement in the service for local people, so I hope that the Government will accept that such changes do not necessarily provide better services. In fact, because of all the problems with computers, people may get a worse service. The main thing is, however, that the people themselves do not think that it is better. They think that it is much worse. I hope the Government also realise that for those who face the possibility of redundancy is it frightening, horrible and cruel. I hope that they will go out of their way to reassure people, in particular those in areas of Southend, where this civil service work is a desperately important part of our local economy.

4.30 pm

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): It is a pleasure to sum up for the Opposition after what has been a high-quality debate. I pay tribute to the Paymaster General. It is true that she spoke for nearly an hour, but the principal reason for that was that she was generous in giving way to hon. Members on both sides of the House. We should acknowledge her courtesy.

I join my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) in thanking the Paymaster General for kindly giving us a briefing on some of the detail of the Bill at the Treasury recently. We were grateful for that. We were also grateful for the whistle-stop tour, following the briefing, of the refurbished Treasury, but we resisted the temptation to pause and measure up the curtains. We felt that that might have appeared gauche. Nevertheless, it was kind of her to take us on the tour, which we enjoyed.

In a thoughtful speech, my hon. Friend explained that we do not oppose the Bill in principle, because it is designed to facilitate the eventual merger of two large Government organisations. However, we are concerned about how the proposed merger is likely to take place in practice, and I shall concentrate on that in summing up our position.

Before I do that, I want to refer to some of the contributions that we enjoyed. The hon. Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard), who served as a member of the Treasury Sub-Committee, spoke knowledgably on the subject. He provided us with some of the background to the proposed merger, including the genesis of the Butterfield report. We are grateful to him for adding that element to our deliberations.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) spoke from the Liberal Democrat Front Bench. He, too, broadly welcomed the Bill, but like us expressed scepticism about the ability to generate material savings over the spending review period. There has been quite a lot of to and fro about that, so we would all welcome clarification of two things. First, what are the specific savings that the Department estimates will result from the merger itself? I am not talking about Gershon in the broader context, but how much public money will be saved as a result of the merger. Secondly, over what precise timetable do the Government expect those savings to be realised? In which year can we expect the full-year effect of those savings to have kicked in? If, for any reason, the Government cannot answer those two pertinent questions on Second Reading, they are in trouble from the word go. We look forward to the Economic Secretary clarifying those two points.

The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) told us about discussions with his local trade unions relating to the merger, including during a recent visit to Luton airport. He amused the House with his valiant attempts to pay duty some years ago on his return from an enjoyable trip to France. As he mentioned consulting the unions, and as that sparked off a spat between the Paymaster General and the Liberal Democrats, perhaps the Economic Secretary will summarise what consultation has taken place with the unions to date, so that there is no confusion. Perhaps he could also say a few words about how the consultation process is likely to be taken forward with the trade unions as the merger rolls out. Given the comments that we have heard this evening, it seems that Members on both sides of the Chamber will be grateful for that clarification.

Mr. Laws: I agree that we need answers on these points. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman might add a further question to the Economic Secretary. Given the vagueness about the figure of 3,200 job losses, perhaps the Economic Secretary can let us know whether, in his discussions with the unions, he will be clarifying with them whether the Government will seek 3,200 staff cuts or a figure close to that, or whether that is, as the Paymaster General indicated earlier, just a broad assessment or guesstimate of what the savings might turn out to be.

Mr. Francois: That seems a pertinent point. Rather than repeat it for form's sake, I am sure that the Economic Secretary has heard it and will do his best to respond to it.

[Mr. Francois]

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon) chairs the Treasury Sub-Committee. We should pay tribute to the thorough and detailed job that that Committee did. On the basis of that work, he spoke knowledgeably about the proposed merger. He, too, argued for more specific information on the likely savings and how they are expected to be realised in practice. I hope that the Minister, having heard the Chairman of the Sub-Committee, has now well and truly got the message and that we will hear clear answers from him.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson) has had something of a grin on his face ever since the result of the north-east referendum. I think that he still has that grin today, particularly when he was contemplating the taxpayer experience as some permanent exhibition. I do not know whether that will ever be established in practice, but if it were, I fear that it is the sort of thing that would have to be propped up with lottery money. The ticket sales might not meet the original estimates.

My hon. Friend also talked about problems arising from the maladministration of tax credits. He made some pertinent points on the basis of the real experiences of real individuals. I shall return to that subject in more detail.

We also heard from the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett). He brings to the House his experience as a tax practitioner over 25 years, I think. If I heard him correctly, he also said that, over those 25 years, he never had cause to lodge a material complaint about the Inland Revenue. I am not certain whether all our constituents could provide such a blanket guarantee but I echo what my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester said from the Opposition Front Bench, which is that we pay tribute to the sometimes difficult work that members of the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise undertake. I emphasise that some of the criticisms that I shall come on to relate to their senior managers and to Ministers rather than to staff at the coal face who are doing the job from day to day.

Mr. Burnett: I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he said. I think that I said that I had not had cause over 25 years to complain about the conduct of the Inland Revenue. I specifically said "Inland Revenue". I had many disagreements with it, but its conduct was, in my view, beyond reproach.

Mr. Francois: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman spent a lively 25 years in dealing with the gentlemen of the Inland Revenue. I am sure also that the House knew what he was driving at, and I wanted to acknowledge the point that he made.

We then heard briefly from the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), who raised the staffing implications of the merger. He made an important point on what is now becoming, in some respects, the impersonal nature of the system and the remoteness that many of our constituents feel when they have to deal with a call centre, especially when they cannot get through to the same person more than once. He introduced an important point and it is one to which I will return.

We also heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor), who is my parliamentary neighbour. He raised particular concern about the staffing implications of the merger. I can well understand that because Customs and Excise has a major facility in Southend. I already know from our informal discussions that he has made representations on this matter on several occasions, as I believe has my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess). The issue affects Southend as a whole. The House will have heard what my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East said this evening on behalf of people in Southend. I hope that his points will be taken carefully into consideration as the merger proceeds.

I also wish to refer to the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley). He served with distinction on the Treasury Committee and was often a thorn in the side of Ministers. To a degree, he has achieved that in this debate. He spoke with particular force about the problems of information technology and how they cause difficulties for our constituents. I now turn to that subject.

Given recent events, we have a strong concern about the risks that might arise from the IT aspects of the proposed merger. Between them, the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise have about 250 different legacy computer systems and deal with 13 million customers, including 3.75 million businesses of varying sizes and complexity. The departments already experience more than 250 million contacts a year, ranging from tax returns, letters and telephone calls to e-mails. The scale of the merger in IT terms alone is therefore huge, as is the potential risk to the Government's revenue stream if it all went wrong.

Unfortunately, even a brief examination of the Government's track record in managing major IT programmes is very far from encouraging. There are already serious problems at the Inland Revenue itself even before the merger commences and several hon. Members have touched on that issue already. The Revenue is now responsible for the administration of the Chancellor's complicated system of tax credits. The computer system designed for that purpose has been exposed as being prone to error, including a particularly unhelpful tendency to overpay tax credits to people in one year and then try to claw them back in the next. My hon. Friend the Members for Hexham and for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) made that point.

The Public Accounts Committee, which examined the performance of the Inland Revenue in this respect, came to a damning conclusion. In a press release of 22 April 2004, the Committee's Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh), commented:

> "The problems that arose when the Inland Revenue introduced the New Tax Credits scheme are well known. It was nothing short of disastrous, with hundreds of thousands of claimants not paid on time, inevitable hardship for some, inconvenience to employers, and disruption to other parts of the Revenue's business. The Revenue should have been more realistic in setting the timetable and have put in place better contingency arrangements."

That is a sword of Damocles to hold over the Government's head.

In facilitating the proposed merger, it will also be important to learn lessons from the recent problems—some of them very serious—at the Child Support Agency. By way of comparison, several years ago the Government decided to transfer CSA cases on to a new bespoke computer system known as CS2. The new computer cost almost £500 million of taxpayers' money but, according to an article on the BBC News website entitled appropriately, "Basically, it doesn't work", operators could be working on the system when it would suddenly lock them out without warning. It would take weeks before the case file could be electronically reactivated and properly dealt with. According to a briefing note from the Library, up to 150,000 cases are now stuck in the CSA system in this way and are effectively unable to proceed.

Ministers are still wrestling with whether to try to fix the existing system or write off a great deal of public money and start again with an alternative. This has been a fiasco, and it led to the resignation of the chief executive of the CSA. Such events must be avoided in the merger that we are discussing, particularly as the merged entity would have to deal not just with individuals but with companies.

It is important to remember that we are not just dealing with statistics, even though some of the numbers for the problem cases involved are very large. I say in all sincerity to the Economic Secretary that these are real people, many of whom rely on receiving money for which they have budgeted in all good faith, but which fails to reach them through no fault of theirs.

Commenting on the syndrome of Government computer failures, the National Audit Office, in its November report on improving IT procurement, a copy of which I have, concluded that the failure of public sector IT contracts is due to a number of key factors, including a lack of a clear link between the project and the organisation's key priorities, a lack of effective engagement with stakeholders who will need to use the system, and a lack of clear senior management and ministerial ownership and leadership. That is a damning indictment from the NAO, in addition to the previous one from the PAC.

As the merger is implemented, it will be important to try to avert what might be described as ordeal by Government call centre. Too many of our constituents experience a substandard service because the Government switch work into call centres backed up by inefficient or unreliable computer systems. The syndrome, which is all too familiar to many CSA and Inland Revenue tax credit customers, can be summarised as follows.

The Department's computer generates a letter that is incorrect on an account that was previously operating well. The aggrieved constituent telephones the number on the letter and is put through to a departmental call centre. After the electronic rendition of "Greensleeves" or whatever the music happens to be, they get the inevitable menu of options. Having fought their way through that, they are eventually put through to a member of staff. They give their reference number and the details, and attempt to explain the specifics of their case. That is all taken down and the caller is told something like, "I will send an e-mail to our computing department and have it sorted out for you. Don't worry."

Two or three weeks later the constituent receives another letter showing that nothing has happened and nothing has changed. Frustrated, they ring up the call centre again, are put through to a different person and go through the whole saga a second time, only to discover a fortnight or so later that again the problem has not been put right. The problems with tax credits and overpayments are a perfect example of the syndrome. Eventually, in a state of high dudgeon, the constituent arrives at their Member of Parliament's constituency surgery to vent their wrath. I am sure a number of hon. Members have had that wonderful experience already.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): My hon. Friend is outlining a problem that many constituents have experienced. Constituents of mine have been advised by the person at the call centre to ring their MP, as that is the quickest way to get their problem resolved. That demonstrates the problems that constituents face with the computer systems already in place, dealing with the CSA and tax credits. The Paymaster General shakes her head, but that is a common concern that constituents raise with me. They are told that the MP is there to sort things out.

Mr. Francois: I thank my hon. Friend for that pertinent intervention. I did not intend to mention individual constituency cases, but I, too, have had people who have come to see me at my constituency surgery because someone at a call centre has advised them that the only way they will get their problem sorted out is to see their Member of Parliament.

In fairness to the Minister, it appears to be the Child Support Agency that is the worst offender, but the Inland Revenue is not far behind with its maladministration of tax credits. I know that Ministers do not like to hear it, but that is stark reality.

Dawn Primarolo indicated dissent.

Mr. Francois: I remind the Minister that the system is supposed to help people and provide them with value for money, not to drive them mad. We must do better than we are doing at present. People out there deserve better than they are getting from people in here. I cannot stress that strongly enough to the Minister.

In conclusion, we are not opposed to the Bill per se, but we are concerned about how its provisions will be implemented. Specifically, we are worried about the degree of risk inherent in the information technology aspects of the merger, given that the new system will be expected to handle more than 250 million contacts in any one year. Were there to be another foul-up on the scale of the Child Support Agency, the threat is not just that it would cause widespread confusion among the taxpayer and business community, as it undoubtedly would do, but that the Government's revenue stream would start to dry up as a result.

For this merger, we will need a combined system that provides a high-quality service to both taxpayers and companies and ensures that they receive genuine value for money in return for the considerable capital costs that are likely to be involved. Crucially, we need evidence of clear ownership and leadership by

[Mr. Francois]

Ministers. When that falls to future Ministers in a Conservative Government, we will endeavour to provide it.

4.49 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): This has been a full debate, and I shall try to do full justice to the detailed contributions made by nine hon. Members from both sides of the House since my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General opened it earlier this afternoon.

The Bill is important and will bring important changes. It concerns the machinery of government, but it matters to 30 million HMRC customers, including 4 million businesses around Britain. It enables the early steps in bringing together the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise—full integration is a long-term, large-scale undertaking. As my right hon. Friend said, the process goes beyond a simple merger between two departments.

Between them, the two departments collect £400 billion in revenue each year. They pay out £17 billion in tax credits and a further £9 billion in child benefit, and they handle almost 40 million telephone contacts. The two departments employ 100,000 staff, operate from more than 300 locations, run 250 separate IT systems and carry out a wide range of functions from traditional tax gathering and assurance to enforcement of the minimum wage, payment of tax credits, facilitating British exports and securing the UK's frontiers. Between them, Customs and the Revenue have a proud history of more than 1,000 years' service to the British state and the British people. I pay tribute to their professionalism, their technical expertise and their commitment to the public service ethos, which have been the special hallmarks of both departments over the years.

Some have questioned the case for integration. Earlier this year, Gus O'Donnell, the permanent secretary at the Treasury, produced the O'Donnell report, which examined not only the case for integration but a couple of other options not involving integration. It set out the clearest conclusions on the case for integration, and I refer hon. Members on both sides of the House to page 6:

"The case for organisational change rests on potential improvements in customer service, effectiveness and efficiency. It results from an analysis of * international experience, which has shown that the current separation of direct and indirect taxes in the UK, as opposed to organising around functions and customers, is behind best practice;

* the functions of the revenue departments, which shows that there are benefits from bringing them closer together;

* the experience of closer working between the departments since 1994, which has been promising but limited in its results; and

* the success of the creation of the Department for Work and Pensions, with the formation of several customer-oriented agencies, including the integration of benefits and employment advice in Jobcentre Plus".

The Treasury Committee has been in no doubt about the sense in creating a single Revenue department. I, like others, pay tribute to the hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Fallon), who led the work on the recent report, and to his colleagues, both past and present, who have contributed to this afternoon's debate. Last month, the Sub-Committee produced its report, which welcomed the decision to merge the two departments and reminded us, as the hon. Member for Sevenoaks did this afternoon, that the Treasury Committee, under different chairmanship, recommended a merger in 2000.

The Sub-Committee observed that witnesses believe that the merger should produce benefits for both taxpayers and the Government. It endorsed what the Government saw as the pragmatic approach adopted in this initial Bill to create HMRC, which will be followed by further work. Finally, although this is not related to the Bill, the Committee endorsed steps to strengthen the Treasury's capability in the area of strategic tax policy making.

In that respect, the Committee was reporting afresh on an issue that was first examined by one of its predecessor Committees in 1863, although that Committee published two reports that year which came to exactly opposite conclusions on amalgamation. The Committee chaired by the hon. Member for Sevenoaks has had no such second thoughts. Indeed, it made recommendations to the Government about proceeding on integration. It made further recommendations on quantifying the expected costs and benefits; on ensuring that business as usual is a top priority during the merger period; on proper parliamentary scrutiny, including a second stage of legislation for any substantive changes; and on safeguarding the confidentiality of taxpayer information. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General explained that we have taken those recommendations into account in framing the Bill, and she set out the Government's point-by-point response to them.

I shall try to do justice to the very detailed contributions that hon. Members made to the debate, starting, if I may, with the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie). He said that as a country we are very lucky in our Revenue departments; we would share that sentiment. He said that he worked with both departments in the 1980s; I fear that he may have to wait for a little longer than a few months until he gets the chance to do so again. He mapped out the rationale for integration and quoted a section of the O'Donnell review, which summarised the principal benefits on page 7 of its report.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: So soon? By all means.

Mr. Tyrie: I also pointed out that the Government have not provided the quantification of those benefits that is necessary in taking this decision, and that the project has real downside risks whereby if it goes wrong it could be very costly for the country in terms of lost yield. I would not want the Minister to paint a picture suggesting that we are giving unalloyed and unqualified support to the merger.

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman did indeed make a substantial contribution to the debate. If he will be patient, I propose to move on immediately to his point about costs and benefits, then to deal with the concerns that he expressed about IT, as one of at least six of his points that I intend to respond to directly.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned cost-benefit analysis of integration, as did the hon. Members for Yeovil (Mr. Laws), for Sevenoaks and for Hexham (Mr. Atkinson). All did so in the context of being generally favourable to the plan to integrate the two departments. Essentially, their questions concerned detailed cost-benefit analysis of full integration. Let me try to explain the situation. A change management centre has been set up for the departments with the specific role of identifying and tracing the benefits that may flow from integration. As part of that, it will ensure that all proposals for bringing work together are tested to identify the benefits that they deliver and to establish proper priorities for the integration work. Of course, the National Audit Office will subject the new department to scrutiny and monitoring on efficiency and effectiveness, just as in the case of its predecessors; and any legislation on reforms that are required will be accompanied by a regulatory impact assessment that will spell out the anticipated costs and benefits.

I remind the hon. Member for Chichester that, as my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General said, until this House gives the Bill its Second Reading, the departments do not have the legal authority to spend money to analyse and model the options in sufficient detail to quantify the costs and benefits that can flow from integration in the way that he seeks. Clause 38 provides for expenditure by HMRC in carrying out all its functions.

Mr. Tyrie: Does the Economic Secretary seriously suggest that we do not have figures from the Government on costs and benefits because of some legal bar to their beginning the preliminary work?

John Healey: There is no ducking the fact that there is a legal bar until the HMRC is closer to being formally constituted. There is a bar on deploying resources. It is obvious that, until more detailed plans are worked out about how integration can be effected to secure the general purposes and gains that the O'Donnell review sets out, it is not possible to quantify the costs and the benefits precisely. I shall shortly spell out the costs and benefits analysis that we were able to set out in the regulatory impact assessment that accompanies the Bill.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Economic Secretary for his courtesy. The NAO report on IT procurement that I mentioned in my speech contains a list of recommendations to the Government from Sir Peter Gershon from the time that he spent at the Office of Government Commerce. One recommendation, on page 3 of the executive summary of the report, states:

"No government initiative (including legislation) dependent on new IT to be announced before analysis of risks and implementation options has been undertaken."

How does he square that with his comments?

John Healey: I shall deal with IT, if the hon. Gentleman, like the hon. Member for Chichester, will be patient. Let us be clear: the Bill and the changes for which it provides do not directly depend on changes and integration in IT.

The regulatory impact assessment confirms the figure of 3,200 for staff savings as a direct benefit and gain of the integration of the two departments. Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs is committed to delivering those figures from integration as part of its efficiency plan up to 2007–08. Let me be clear and direct: the savings from those 3,200 posts, including the associated overheads, could be £100 million of a total of £507 million that the department will save by 2007–08. Those are Gershon savings.

Mr. Tyrie: Are they to do with the merger?

John Healey: They are indeed, but they are not entirely dependent on it.

Mr. Tyrie rose—

John Healey: I am sorry but I need to explain the point to the hon. Gentleman again. The staff savings that flow directly from integration are set at 3,200—HMRC has signed up to deliver that target by the end of 2007–08. The costs of those posts plus the associated overheads could be approximately £100 million. That is part of a total saving, set at £507 million, that the department will achieve by the end of 2007–08. They are Gershon savings and include additional savings on posts through integration. Those efficiency savings will save at least £507 million by the end of 2007–08. Hon. Members should not regard that as new information, because in September a 16-page note, entitled "HMRC Efficiency Technical Note" was produced on the department's efficiency plan. Hon. Members will find plenty of information in that publication that they do not seem to have.

Mr. Laws: The Economic Secretary says that the information is available. It did not appear to be available to the Paymaster General earlier. I am grateful that he has corrected her comment that the £500 million savings were down to the merger. Will he clearly answer two other questions? He said that the figure of 3,200 was a target for job cuts that had been signed up to. However, the Paymaster General admitted earlier that the figure was a guesstimate of savings. Is it appropriate to sign up to a target of 3,200 job reductions on the basis of a guesstimate? Will there be any net savings from the Bill in the period of the existing spending review?

John Healey: The existing spending review is entirely consistent with the period that I have just outlined, to 2007–08. The savings involved will flow from the posts. The hon. Gentleman has failed to see what has been going on in other Departments as part of the general efficiency drive in Government. This is precisely the nature of the targets that have been set and signed up to. Department by Department, senior managers and Ministers are examining how they can be realised. There is nothing different about this stage of the process for HMRC.

Mr. Tyrie: rose—

John Healey: I am going to make some progress, if I may. I want to move on to a point that the hon. Gentleman raised earlier, and which was also mentioned by the hon. Members for Sevenoaks and for Yeovil. The provisions in the Bill are not a downgrading of the Inland Revenue oath, as the hon. Member for

[John Healey]

Sevenoaks tried to argue. The statutory duty set out in clause 17 places the staff of HMRC under the same strict obligations as the Inland Revenue oath does, but in a modern guise. Protecting customer confidentiality will remain an essential characteristic of the new department, as my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General spelled out earlier, and all staff will continue to take their obligations on confidentiality extremely seriously.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): I would like to pay tribute to my colleague, the Chairman of the Sub-Committee, the hon. Member for Sevenoaks, for his work on this inquiry. It was a very productive inquiry: the fact that Customs and Excise and the Committee worked together was very good, and the fact that the Treasury has taken up our suggestion is very welcome. Confidentiality was a concern for us, however. Will the Minister assure us that he will ensure the confidentiality of each department, and that that will be in the Bill?

John Healey: I can give my right hon. Friend that assurance; it is indeed in the Bill.

Mr. Fallon: The Minister has not quite reassured me on the specific point as to whether the statutory declaration will continue to be practised. Is it to be wrapped up inside the employment contract, or will members of the service still make the statutory declaration in front of a witness when they join?

John Healey: The staff will have a statutory duty, which will be binding on them, regardless of what they have already signed. As my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General said, the statutory duty set out in the Bill replaces the Inland Revenue oath and for the first time extends it across former Customs and Excise matters, giving statutory backing to existing duties of confidentiality under employment contracts across a wider range of functions.

The hon. Member for Chichester raised the question of information technology, as did the hon. Members for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) and for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley). The Paymaster General and I know only too well how central information and communications technology is to the delivery of the essential functions of both revenue departments. As we look forward to their integration and to the formation of HMRC, we are creating a single chief information office which will bring together the planning for both organisations. I want to make it clear that HMRC will not have a single operating environment. Both departments have many systems at present, a number of which are stand-alone systems that are likely to remain so under HMRC. As Members would expect, detailed contingency plans and disaster recovery arrangements are already in place, together with strategic sites for back-up. However, I do not accept the argument of the hon. Member for Chichester that it would be appropriate to publish that information.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Yeovil for his general support for the change that we are proposing. He says that he can see the potential benefits of integrating the departments, as we can, and he came to the same conclusion as the Treasury Committee that gains were more likely to come from integration than from the further closer working of the two independent departments. He outlined the three principal objectives involved: the further closing of the tax gaps; the provision of a better service to business and individual customers; and the efficiencies that can be gained. I say to him that the focus is certainly not only on the efficiency savings that could come from integration, although it is true to say that, on Budget day, when the integration was confirmed, the focus of the media was very much on those savings. The lengthy O'Donnell report, the policy and plans in place in both departments to improve services to taxpayers, and the public service targets that are set for HMRC to continue to reduce tax gaps, will all, I hope, reassure him that this is not a merger that will be driven by efficiency savings alone.

Mr. Laws rose—

John Healey: I will give way one last time. I am sure that other Members who have contributed to the debate would like me to be able to answer their points as well.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the Economic Secretary for giving way. I remind him that he has almost two hours in which to respond, so there is no particular hurry. I have accepted that we will not get an answer from him on the issue of net cost, but does he really think that setting an arbitrary target for job reductions of 3,200 for this merger, which we now understand is based only on a guesstimate from other mergers, is the right way to get the support of the staff for the significant changes that he has discussed today?

John Healey: It is not an arbitrary target—it is a realistic target. What has been done for HMRC is exactly what has been done and is being pursued in other departments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford (Mr. Beard), who has served for some time with distinction on the Treasury Committee, urged us not to lose sight of the wood for the trees. Like the hon. Member for Yeovil, he stressed the main concern, which should be to close the tax gap, as he put it, and reduce it almost to the point of elimination of evasion. I want to underline that HMRC has public service targets set throughout the current spending review period and throughout the period of the initial stages of integration, which cover reducing the amounts of unpaid VAT to the Exchequer and reducing the underpayment of direct taxes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath and Crayford also gave some indication of the potential gains for business: a single inspector; single inspection visits; and a single point of contact. I am sure that he looks forward to the publication, which my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General mentioned, of the consultation paper on further steps and changes in powers in January. We look forward to his views and those of the Treasury Committee as part of that consultation. He was also concerned that integration should not distract the departments from their continuing duties. The Treasury Committee was right to stress that, and Ministers have made that clear to the new chairman, David Varney, who has certainly made it clear to his staff that that cannot be the case.

The hon. Member for Sevenoaks asked why the Government have changed their mind since 2000, which was a point echoed by the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds. It is less that we have changed our mind than that we have undertaken a serious study, led by the permanent secretary to the Treasury, which gives us a better basis as Ministers to take such a decision to move to integration. It is also based on a couple more years of experience in government of such large-scale mergers than when the Committee first took evidence and produced its report. I welcome the second report from his Committee, as I have made clear, and its conclusions.

The Committee urged us to treat this as a staged process, and to evolve the new department rather than to do it in one go, although, curiously, the hon. Members for Sevenoaks and for Hexham then started raising concerns about the second stage of the process. I hope that the former will be reassured by confirmation that the consultation on this second stage will begin in January, and that it is clear to him that we do not expect that to be completed in time for the setting up of the new department under this Bill. My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has made it clear that we regard the Finance Bill in 2006, or appropriate legislation, as the likely timing for introduction of the succeeding stage. Of course, we will delay no longer than necessary, as to do so would be to delay gaining the benefits that we set out to achieve from integration.

On the concern raised about geographic location and the move of Customs and Revenue staff to Parliament street—I will come on to the similar point made by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) in a moment—location is not an issue. The existing convention whereby Ministers and their officials do not intervene in individual cases will be strictly maintained. As now, Ministers and their officials will not have access to individual taxpayer and customer information in the Treasury.

The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon asked where the new RCPO staff would be housed. They will have two offices, one at New King's Beam house in London and one at Ralli Quays in Manchester. They will share those larger Government buildings with some HMRC staff and some staff from other Departments. However, the respective operational areas will be quite distinct. RCPO staff will report directly to their new director, who will be accountable to the Attorney-General and not to Treasury Ministers.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the extra staff in the Customs and Excise Prosecutions Office since the line of accountability led to the Attorney-General rather than Treasury Ministers. The new arrangement is settling down, as he said, and the numbers have also been settled: there are just over 200 staff. The hon. Gentleman also asked about resources for the extension of the functions of the IPCC to the new HMRC. They are still being agreed, and for reasons that he will understand I cannot yet give him a definite answer. He asked about confidentiality, the principle of new powers, the quality and nature of investigators' training post-Butterfield and the external scrutiny that we deem necessary for investigators post-Butterfield. I look forward to discussing and probing those matters with the hon. Gentleman in Committee.

I will pass on the tributes paid by my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins) to the excellent job done by Customs and Revenue staff. He urged us to be prepared to invest in, among other things, more staff when there is a case for doing so, and my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) mentioned what he described as our "spend to raise" programmes. What we have done in the past has had an impact on the VAT gap, and helped to close the gap in the collection of tobacco excise duties. I was a little concerned when my hon. Friend was reciting his experiences at the port, until he explained that they had happened 15 years ago. He will recall that one of our first moves when we came to office in 1997 was to cancel the Conservatives' planned cut of 300 Customs posts.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: My hon. Friend is a great friend of mine, but he has only just come in, and I want to respond to points made by those who have been present and contributed to the debate.

I pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington as chair of the all-party PCS trade union group, which is one of the most active all-party groups in Parliament at present. He spoke of the improvement in the information that we publish with Bills, but felt that details of staffing changes were still not full enough. As I said earlier, the aim is to cut 3,200 posts as a direct result of integration. That has been signed up to as part of the efficiency plan for the new department, to be delivered by the end of 2007–08.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: No, I will not. I want to finish my response to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington. He will know of the opportunities we are providing; of the redeployment and reskilling of staff affected by the cut in the number of posts; and of our determination to avoid compulsory redundancies whenever we can; and he will know that plans for the development of the new department, and plans for efficiency savings, are being fully discussed with the trade unions.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir Teddy Taylor) asked—

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. It is obvious that the Minister is not prepared to give way at this point.

John Healey: The hon. Member for Rochford and Southend, East waited patiently to make his contribution, and is still in his place. Understandably, he is worried about the employment implications of a number of changes affecting Customs and Excise, and not just its integration with the Inland Revenue. I appreciate the concern that he feels as a diligent constituency MP, and I certainly appreciate the uncertainty felt by the staff. I hope that the reassurances that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington will also help to reassure the hon. Gentleman and his constituents. Any changes will be fully discussed with the trade unions and with the staff affected. Ministers and senior managers are very conscious of the need to settle the precise plans and the implications for particular posts as soon as possible. As my hon. Friend asked, neither Ministers nor senior managers will forget the people in the departments in making these changes, because they remain at the very heart of everything that we do.

The Paymaster General and I were encouraged by the broad support that we received for the Bill in all parts of the House this afternoon, and we both believe it right that detailed scrutiny should take place in Committee. I should make it clear that, as the Treasury Committee advised and as Members have urged today, we cannot proceed without this legislation. The Bill legally establishes HMRC. It allows it to spend money in carrying out its functions, to deploy resources more flexibly on single visits and returns, and to pool information that Customs and Revenue officials currently cannot share. Although it is currently possible to achieve a good deal of close working and joint activity, a single Revenue department structure and management will indeed bring better strategic focus and benefits to all the department's customers. It will help to tackle the tax gap, to reduce costs for honest taxpayers, and to enable much more coherent and integrated future developments.

Beyond creating a single new department, we have also taken the opportunity provided by the Bill to establish a new and fully independent prosecutions office—the Revenue and Customs Prosecutions Office—and to extend the remits of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary and the Independent Police Complaints Commission. Together, they will provide the extra, external scrutiny of HMRC's criminal investigation work that is a direct consequence of accepting and putting into practice the Butterfield review's recommendations.

In summary, the Bill allows for the legal establishment of HMRC. It confirms the transfer of existing powers for the administration of tax and duty regimes, not their extension. It reinforces the principle of, and protection of, taxpayer confidentiality. It strengthens the independent scrutiny and inspection of criminal investigations work. It sets up a new prosecutions office that is fully independent of HMRC, and will report directly to the Attorney-General. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

COMMISSIONERS FOR REVENUE AND CUSTOMS BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A (6),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on 13th January 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the day on which proceedings on consideration are commenced.

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords amendments or on any further message from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Question accordingly agreed to.

COMMISSIONERS FOR REVENUE AND CUSTOMS BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) expenditure of the Commissioners for Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs,

(b) payments to or in respect of the Commissioners or their staff,

(c) rewards,

(d) expenditure of the Director of Revenue and Customs Prosecutions,

(e) payments to or in respect of the Director of Revenue and Customs Prosecutions,

(f) payments to or in respect of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Constabulary,

(g) payments to or in respect of the Independent Police Complaints Commission, and

(h) any increase attributable to the Act in sums payable out of money provided by Parliament under any other enactment,

(2) payments out of the Consolidated Fund to enable the Commissioners to make payments or disbursements, and,

(3) the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Heppell.]

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Income Tax

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Georgia) Order 2004 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 17th November, in the last Session of Parliament.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Question agreed to.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have you received a request from the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to give an oral report about the two documents published today? She appeared on television and answered a large number of questions from journalists, but no one in the House is able to question her about the fact that we shall meet neither our Kyoto targets nor the 20 per cent. target set by the Government. Today, it has been announced that 43 per cent. of new homes have broken the regulations that she laid down to ensure that they were energy efficient. Surely, the issue should be debated in the House and not on the television and radio.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As Mr. Speaker is always keen that Departments make important announcements to the House first, may I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to investigate why on this occasion a very important result in terms of our climate change programme was released to the media first, and not to the House? Secondly, could you investigate the delays that I encountered today in getting hold of the relevant documents to understand precisely the terms of the announcement that had been made?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The first answer—to the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer)—is that I have received no request from a Minister to make a statement. The House will know that it is up to the Government to decide how they make information available to the House. That is a matter of judgment, and from time to time there will be differences of view about how that judgment is exercised; it is a matter for the Government in each case.

I understand that the documents are available to Members, but if there has been a delay I will certainly ensure that it is investigated.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In a reply given during Health questions yesterday by the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), on the new dental contract, the hon. Lady suggested that negotiations with the British Dental Association were going reasonably well, yet within hours of her making those comments the British Dental Association withdrew. The hon. Lady had plenty of opportunity during subsequent supplementary questions—not least from me—to correct that erroneous impression. Given the collapse of the talks between the BDA and the Government, would it be in order for the Minister to come to the House to correct the erroneous impression she made?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would certainly be in order, but it is entirely up to the Minister whether that opportunity is taken. I am sure that opportunities are open to the hon. Gentleman, or his colleagues, to pursue the matter if that is what they wish to do.

PETITION

Care Homes

5.43 pm

Jeff Ennis (Barnsley, East and Mexborough) (Lab): I wish to present a petition on behalf of my constituent, Mr. Eddie Gardner, and well over 3,500 residents of Mexborough in my constituency.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of residents of Mexborough,

Declares that the proposed use of former care homes on Manvers Road, Mexborough, as a hospital for people with mental illnesses is unacceptable because Cambian Healthcare has failed to communicate with local people during the early stages of the project leading to confusion about its purpose, fear about its suitability and lack of trust in the company.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to commission an independent review of Cambian Healthcare's proposal.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Eye Treatment

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Joan Ryan.]

5.44 pm

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I am pleased in one way at least to have the opportunity to raise in the House this evening a very sad case that involves one of my constituents. I want to do the best that I can for my constituent, and I hope that, when the Minister replies, he will be able to give him hope about the way forward to try to deal with his very difficult health condition.

My constituent, Mr. Adrian Patrick, lives in Newhaven. He is a relatively young man—he is only 31—and he has been a chef by profession, but he now cannot work because, sadly, he is going blind, which is a tragedy at that age. That is sad, but it is also a matter of anger, however, because the means to keep his sight may be available but its use is being blocked by, of all people, the management of Moorfields Eye hospital.

Mr. Patrick suffers from a condition that is a form of uveitis, which essentially attacks the jelly between the eyeball and the retina, causing a disconnection. Although the erosion is gradual, the effect can be sudden. Such a disconnection can be triggered by something as simple as the individual who is affected bending his or her head in the shower. One eye has already gone, and the race must now be on to save Mr. Patrick's remaining eye. Such is his condition that he is already eligible for blind registration.

I want to run through the chronology of the key events. Mr. Patrick contacted me for the first time on 6 August 2003, when he told me that his consultant, Professor Susan Lightman at Moorfields had, since November 2002, wanted to prescribe for him a certain drug, infliximab, to try to help his eye condition but was being prevented from doing so. I wrote on that same day to the local PCT in Lewes—the Sussex Downs and Weald primary care trust—to raise the matter with it, based on the fact that the PCT had been contacted directly by Professor Lightman but had refused to fund the treatment.

The position that the PCT has taken—it is a difficult one for it—is, as I shall explain, to try to mediate between the different elements of Moorfields Eye hospital. In the response to me on 26 September 2003, the PCT's chief executive, Fiona Henniker, wrote:

"It is not normal practice for a hospital doctor to approach a commissioner direct to ask for money above and beyond the sum already agreed in the service level agreement."

So the PCT wanted approval from Moorfields direct, rather than simply an application from my constituent's consultant. I raise that issue now because it is relevant, as I shall explain later, in respect of a letter that I received from one of the Minister's colleagues, Lord Warner, in considering this matter.

The PCT's position was not normal practice, and one of the questions that I want the Minister to clarify—I hope that he is able to do so—is the exact relationship between the three elements of the triangle in this sad saga: first, the PCT, the commissioning body in normal circumstances; secondly, the management at Moorfields hospital; and, thirdly, the consultant.

Is it possible for a consultant to secure funds from a PCT if the consultant believes that the release of those funds is appropriate and the PCT is happy to do so; or must the PCT always have approval from the management of the hospital where the consultant works? Despite a year and a half of looking into the case, I am still not entirely clear about the legal position in respect of that matter. If the Minister can clarify that in his remarks, I should be grateful. According to the PCT, Professor Lightman subsequently presented a protocol to the drugs committee at Moorfields on the use of the drug infliximab, but that was rejected.

The letter that Professor Susan Lightman wrote to the commissioning manager of my local PCT on 7 February 2003 is relevant to the history of the case. She gave evidence to the fact that infliximab helps uveitis and enclosed several abstracts which suggested that that was the case. So at an early stage, the consultant supplied evidence that the drug could be effective in dealing with the condition.

At the end of a long exchange of correspondence between Moorfields and my PCT, a reply was received from the Adur, Arun and Worthing PCT. My PCT had felt that it should not be deciding the matter and it had been referred to a specialist funding panel. In fact, there was a process error involving my PCT, which took some months to come to light, and that caused a further delay for my constituent.

The reply from the Adur, Arun and Worthing PCT, acting on behalf of my PCT, said:

"My response to the request"— for funding—

"is that we have a fully inclusive agreement with your Trust"— the Moorfields Eye hospital trust—

"to cover the treatment of patients registered with Sussex GPs . . . It is therefore not appropriate for clinical departments to make direct approaches for additional funds. I would like to make it clear that my response is based purely on our contractual arrangements. It does not imply agreement or disagreement to the use of an unlicensed drug for your patient".

In other words, both PCTs have taken the position that they do not want to intervene in whether the drug is used, but to leave it to the management at Moorfields to arrive at a conclusion with the consultant at Moorfields. I shall demonstrate that it has been impossible to reach such a conclusion because the consultant and management have been at variance throughout the process. In the meantime, of course, my constituent is going slowly blind.

I received a reply from Sussex Downs and Weald PCT to my next letter on 13 January 2004. It again reiterated its position. That letter, also from Fiona Henniker, stated:

"This matter is very much an internal one for Moorfields NHS Trust. Unfortunately, Mr. Patrick is the subject of a difference of opinion within Moorfields NHS Trust about how new drugs should be introduced. Moorfields NHS trust has not asked"

the PCT

"to fund treatment for Mr. Patrick."

At this stage, cost is not an issue. The problem appears to be the suitability or otherwise of the drug. The PCT quoted an extract from the letter that Moorfields sent to it, which stresses that the only issue is whether the drug is appropriate.

However, the PCT conceded in the letter:

"we do on occasions fund patients who are having unproven treatments, if we are satisfied that this will provide good quality evidence to help in the evaluation of a potential new service."

So, first, the position appears to be that the PCT is prepared to fund "unproven" treatments and, secondly, there appears to be a situation in which the PCT would agree to fund a consultant, even if the consultant's own trust is not willing for that arrangement to take place. That is where the confusion lies. Again, it comes back to the triangular nature of the arrangements between the three participants—my PCT, the Moorfields trust and the consultant who works for that trust.

Given the uncertainty with the PCT, I wrote directly on 23 January to the chief executive of Moorfields Eye hospital, Mr. Ian Balmer. In my letter I included the following paragraph:

"Can I ask you to set out exactly what the position is that you have reached, and if it is one which is contrary to the wishes of my constituent"— my constituent is happy to have this drug tried; he is aware of the potential side effects but he still wants to go ahead with it—

"whether you would now reconsider this issue, given both his direct wish and the views of your own specialist?"

I indicated in my letter the urgency because all the time it is possible that my constituent may go blind almost overnight, given the nature of the condition from which he suffers.

I am sorry to say that my letter did not engender the speedy and considered response from the chief executive for which I hoped. It was with some surprise that I had to indulge in a good deal of chasing up before I received a reply. I am disappointed by the laggardly way in which the chief executive appears to have dealt with the case and with my correspondence. I had to ring his office on 12 March to remind him that I had not had a reply. On 23 March, having had no reply to my earlier phone call a further 10 days back, I had to write to him again. I can assure the Minister that it is not the sort of letter that I normally write. I wrote:

"If I have not received a reply within the next 7 days I shall be raising my constituent's case and your failure to respond to my letters both with the Health Minister and on the Floor of the House of Commons."

That was sent after I had given Mr. Balmer two months to deal with the case of my constituent, who was about to go blind.

Having faxed that letter, there was a reply the same day. He wrote:

"There is not sufficient or new evidence to support the use of Infleximab"— by the way, he spells it incorrectly—

"routinely in patients with chronic sight threatening posterior uveitis who are unresponsive or refractory to other treatment modalities. In the absence of this evidence, including effectiveness, a formal protocol-driven ethically approved evaluation needs to be conducted for local experience of appropriateness, clinical effectiveness and safety."

So he raised concerns about whether it is appropriate for the drug to be used for this particular condition.

The second bullet point in the letter was as follows:

"There also needs to be a formal agreement with the partner Trust for the administration of the drug infusions. This currently does not exist."

It is true that it does not exist. It does not exist because the PCT has been unable to get one from Mr. Balmer and his management team, notwithstanding the wishes of the consultant. It is rather disingenuous to say that an agreement does not exist when he has been the person, as far as I can tell, who has prevented the agreement from being reached in the first place.

Most depressingly of all, Mr. Balmer writes:

"I am afraid we cannot find a way forward for this particular patient at the moment".

That is not exactly the sort of message that my constituent wants to hear from the chief executive of the Moorfields Eye Hospital NHS trust, the stated purpose of which, presumably, is to help people with eye conditions. It took Mr. Balmer two months to tell me that he could not find a way forward.

I then wrote to the Secretary of State about the matter. I explained the position and in quick time—far quicker than Moorfields Eye hospital—I received a speedy response from the Minister's colleague, Lord Warner, on 21 April. Lord Warner, in his helpful letter, stated:

"You may find it helpful to know that a hospital consultant can prescribe any product, including any unlicensed product, which they consider to be a drug necessary for the treatment of their patients under the NHS. When a patient is being treated at a hospital, the consultant can arrange for the supply of any drug, even one not normally available on NHS prescription, provided that the PCT or NHS Trust agree to supply it at NHS expense."

That offers a wide remit to any consultant. Rightly the Minister continues:

"GPs and hospital doctors are, of course, ultimately responsible for their own prescribing decisions".

It is absolutely right that that should be the case. Lord Warner concludes:

"It is therefore open to Mr. Patrick's consultant to prescribe Infliximab for him if it is considered safe and of therapeutic benefit."

It is clear from Lord Warner's letter that the decision should remain with the consultant. The consultant takes it on his or her head when taking a prescribing decision. That is subject only to the PCT or the NHS finding or funding the supply, and this drug is reasonably expensive. My constituent wonders whether that is an issue—everyone denies that it is—in his case.

According to the Minister and the Government, the consultant can supply

"any product, including any unlicensed product which they consider to be a drug necessary for the treatment of their patients under the NHS".

However, the NHS trust for which the consultant works will not supply it and the PCT in my area will not fund it because it does not want to cross the management at Moorfields. As the Minister will gather, we have a drug that the consultant wishes to prescribe, that my constituent wants to try and that, according to the Government, the consultant is empowered to prescribe under the NHS, but its prescribing has been blocked by the management at Moorfields Eye hospital, a body from which we might expect help for people with sight difficulties.

The Minister will realise that I have gone round the houses in an attempt to find a way forward, but each body appears to send the matter to someone else. I asked the PCT to reconsider its decision and, on 5 July, it wrote back to me. The PCT in my patch has been helpful and has done its best in a very difficult position between a rock and a hard place to find a way forward. I have no complaints about its approach. Its letter expressed its considered view and said:

"We cannot, and would not, attempt to force Moorfields to prescribe a drug when their clinical governance body has decided that the evidence does not support its use."

There we are. The PCT rebuts the idea that there may be any cost consideration and adds:

"We have and will continue to be guided by Moorfields as to the appropriateness of this drug."

That does not reflect Lord Warner's view that the consultant could prescribe the drug and the PCT could fund it. The two positions are at odds.

We have moved on from November 2002 when my constituent's consultant first wanted the drug prescribed through to the middle of 2004 and we have got no further forward despite the consultant's determination to prescribe it. Professor Susan Lightman has set out her position in blunt language. For example in a letter to me of 3 December 2003, she said:

"The letter from the Chief Executive is completely inaccurate and does not reflect the situation at all."

She has been battling away for her patient as I hope that I am for my constituent.

Having reached this point, the next thing I did was to get back to Mr. Balmer, the person who had taken two months to reply to my letter and had done so only because I said that I might raise the matter in the House of Commons. After many phone calls, many attempts to find him and after ringing his secretary on a number of occasions, I finally got to speak to him on 23 July. He held to his position that it was not a matter of money, but of the "lack of any proof that the treatment works"—that is the phrase he used; I wrote it down at the time.

I said to Mr. Balmer that if he had genuine concerns about using an unlicensed product, his consultant did not and, with respect to Mr. Balmer, the consultant was a medical person and not a manager. However, if Mr. Balmer did not want to use the product, I asked him about his plan B. Without a plan B, my patient will go blind. No plan B is there from Mr. Balmer. As he had said:

"I am afraid that we cannot offer a way forward for this particular patient at the moment".

I asked him to make inquiries to find out whether there was any way that he would reconsider the decision of the Moorfields management to block its consultant from prescribing the drug. If that were not possible, I asked him to come back to tell me how he would help in another way to save the sight of my 31-year-old constituent. He promised to do so. Almost five months on, I am still waiting for a reply from Mr. Balmer, the chief executive of the trust. In case he has forgotten, I assure the House that we have telephoned him from my office on more than one occasion and asked him to ring me, but he has not done so.

Mr. Balmer has shown great discourtesy to my constituent, to a Member of Parliament, which is less important, and to the process whereby MPs represent their constituents. He has effectively written off my constituent and appears to be content to let him go blind—not a very happy analysis of a chief executive of a trust designed to help people with sight difficulties. If nothing else comes out of the debate, I hope the Minister will have inquiries made about why Mr. Balmer seems to be incapable of answering an MP's letters or phone calls about a constituent who is going blind. It is not good enough. Mr. Balmer should examine his conscience.

As regards the way forward, we are told that cost is not the issue. The arrangement with the PCT has been a red herring. I believe the PCT would be willing to fund the treatment if Moorfields management withdrew its objections. The issue is whether it is appropriate for the drug to be used for the particular condition. My constituent's consultant, Professor Susan Lightman, is in no doubt. She has provided me, the PCT and no doubt her own management with examples in which the drug has been used. She sent me, for example, an extract from the department of ophthalmology and visual sciences at Queen's medical centre, Nottingham. It is entitled "Infliximab in the treatment of refractory posterior uveitis" and begins:

"Purpose: To determine the efficacy and safety of infliximab in the treatment of refractory posterior uveitis."

In order not to delay the House unduly, I shall read only the conclusions:

"Infliximab is effective in the treatment of sight-threatening refractory posterior uveitis. However, patients should be thoroughly screened for tuberculosis before treatment and followed up closely during and after therapy with infliximab."

Professor Lightman also sent me an extract with the same title, "Infliximab in the Treatment of Refractory Posterior Uveitis" from the American Academy of Ophthalmology, which reported the following results:

"Four of the 5 patients who were treated with infliximab responded to the therapy with resolution of uveitis within 5 weeks of the first dose and were able to discontinue all other immunosuppressive therapy. These 4 patients did not experience any adverse effects of infliximab."

It worked for four out of five patients.

A young man with a promising career is going blind. He has already lost one eye and, because of his condition, could lose his other eye at any time. His professional consultant believes there is a possible way forward for him through the prescription of infliximab. She has demonstrated that it has been tested elsewhere, and the results that she has found suggest that it can be effective without, in the cases referred to, side effects.

There may well be side effects. My constituent accepts that, but he is young, he is going blind and he wants to try the treatment. His consultant wants to prescribe it for him and, in my view, he should be allowed to undertake that trial. He should be allowed the chance to save his sight. If he cannot save his sight in that way, what is plan B? It is not sufficient for the chief executive to say that nothing more can be done for this patient. I do not want to condemn my constituent to blindness when a possible solution is there, waiting for him. I hope that in his reply the Minister will give him some hope.

6.9 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Dr. Stephen Ladyman): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on securing this evening's debate. I have no doubt that his constituent is grateful for the interest that he has taken in the matter over a long period of time.

I regret the fact that the hon. Gentleman has had such a torrid time getting responses. It is difficult to see what excuse there might be for the lack of courtesy that he experienced.

I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has corresponded with both the primary care trust and the relevant acute trust, which are the appropriate bodies to deal with the issue. I sympathise with Mr. Patrick. It is a tragedy for a young person to be losing their sight and not to be responding to treatment. I doubt whether any hon. Member would not sympathise with him—indeed, we sympathise with all people who are not responding to the available treatments.

I listened carefully to the points that the hon. Gentleman made, but I hope that Mr. Patrick and he accept that my powers are limited. Furthermore, I hope that he agrees that, in line with patient confidentiality, it would not be appropriate for me to comment in detail on the individual aspects of that particular case. He may have been given leave to raise those issues in public, but I have not, so I must largely limit myself to general comment.

The hon. Gentleman raised several points about the handling of Mr. Patrick's case by Moorfields eye hospital and his local primary care trust. The first reason why my powers are limited is because the key trust involved, Moorfields eye hospital, is an NHS foundation trust. Foundation trusts are independent organisations that are no longer accountable to the Department of Health or to Ministers. Instead, they are accountable to four other groups and bodies: first, their members, via a board of governors; secondly, primary care trusts, for the delivery of NHS services; thirdly, Monitor, the independent body responsible for regulating foundation trusts; and fourthly, Parliament, which is responsible for the legislation that creates foundation trusts.

Because of foundation trusts' independent status and separate, local route of accountability, Ministers are no longer in a position to comment on or become involved in their day-to-day activities. We also have no powers of direction or intervention over those trusts. Freeing foundation trusts from the backstop of the Secretary of State's powers of direction and Department of Health control means setting out and applying clear sets of rules for the regulation of foundation trusts and intervening only when things go wrong, which is the task of the foundation trust regulator, Monitor.

Monitor needs to ensure that foundation trusts are fully compliant at all times with their terms of authorisation—a sort of licence to operate—and the legislation, so that they deliver NHS services to NHS patients effectively, efficiently, economically and confidently. It has powers to intervene where necessary in the running of a foundation trust in the event of failings in its health care standards or other aspects of its activities that amount to a significant breach of the terms of its authorisation. That ensures that a foundation trust that is failing to meet its obligations can be brought back into line. Monitor will intervene only if it feels it necessary.

In this particular case, I am aware that Monitor has considered Mr. Patrick's treatment, which it considers a matter for Moorfields eye hospital. That brings me to the specifics on the approval or non-approval of the treatment, and I stress that the issue does not concern funding. Instead, this is a case in which the PCT and the trust have not prescribed a drug because it is not licensed for that particular indication and because no new evidence exists to support its use. When a patient is treated at any hospital, whether or not that hospital is within a foundation trust, the consultant may prescribe any drug, including unlicensed medicines, as appropriate. That is what my noble Friend Lord Warner said in his letter to the hon. Gentleman. However, trusts have multi-disciplinary drugs and therapeutics committees that oversee the clinical and cost-effective use of medicines within their organisations, and all prescribing should have the support of that committee.

Of course, consultants are ultimately responsible for their own prescribing decisions. They should always satisfy themselves that the medicines that they consider appropriate for their patients can be safely prescribed, that patients are adequately monitored and that, where necessary, expert hospital supervision is available.

In March 2002, the National Institute for Clinical Excellence recommended the use of Infliximab for highly active rheumatoid arthritis in adults who have failed to respond to at least two standard drugs. However, Infliximab is not licensed in the UK for the eye condition that Mr. Patrick has and there is no sufficient or conclusive evidence to support its use for that condition, hence the decision taken by Moorfields.

A group of experts—the drugs and therapeutics committee—has decided that the potential harm to the patient from this treatment, including severe blood disorders and septicaemia, outweigh the unproven benefit for his condition at this time. I stress that the decision was taken by the drugs and therapeutics committee, which is a committee of experts, not a group of managers or people without expertise in such matters. Moorfields, as advised by its drugs and therapeutics committee, does not currently include this drug within its supported formulary.

If I might offer a glimmer of light at the end of the tunnel, I am assured that the position could change as further evidence regarding the efficacy and safety of the drug in ophthalmic treatment becomes available. At the moment, however, the trust's position is that further research will need to be done before the clinical governance body will review the decision. I understand that the trust will continue to explore other possibilities that might help Mr. Patrick and other patients, including access to existing or future research trials.

As the hon. Gentleman spoke, I was struck by the length of time that this case has gone on. That might indicate that the clinical governance body last reviewed it before some of the evidence that he brought to the House's attention was available. One of the courses of action that could be taken, if it has not been done already, is for the consultant to put that body of evidence before the body and ask whether it considered it before making its decision.

I understand that it was hoped that a research programme could be set up in the Moorfields area that might have been able to help Mr. Patrick, but unfortunately that has not happened.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the relationship between the trust and the primary care trust. Sussex Downs and Weald, the PCT that commissions services for residents, including Mr. Patrick, has considered the case. The PCT has a contract for specialist eye services with Moorfields, and general services are available locally. However, the specialist treatment that Mr. Patrick's consultant recommended is not supported by the trust, and therefore the PCT cannot fund it. I am assured by the PCT that, if different treatment options that were licensed for Mr. Patrick's condition were suggested, or if sufficient clinical evidence emerged to support the use of this unlicensed treatment, the PCT would consider funding. However, the PCT has made it clear that it cannot and would not attempt to force Moorfields to prescribe the drug when its clinical governance body has decided that the evidence does not support its use. The decision was not taken by accountants or managers, nor by the PCT. Like Moorfields, the PCT did not decide against the treatment for financial reasons.

Clinical governance is the collective responsibility of the clinicians at the hospital. Those clinicians have decided that the available evidence does not support the use of Infliximab in ophthalmology at the present time. The PCT has made it clear that it will continue to be guided by Moorfields as to the appropriateness of the drug as and when further clinical evidence is forthcoming.

If a drug is prescribed privately, the clinician will be bound by codes of clinical governance but will be held entirely responsible for the consequences if the clinician decides to prescribe it. But when, as in this case, a drug is prescribed or requested to be prescribed on the national health service, the NHS must share responsibility for the decision.

The rules for arriving at decisions about the drugs that can be prescribed, the validity of the evidence of efficacy and risk and the balance of the two are, therefore, agreed with the clinicians at the trust and they cannot be overturned by an individual clinician. Of course, that clinician has the opportunity to put forward reasons and make the case for the drug to be prescribed. The clinician has the opportunity to bring forward evidence that he or, in this case, she thinks has been overlooked and can even explore the opportunities for becoming involved in trials to establish that evidence. However, in the absence of that evidence, or having failed to establish a convincing case, the clinician cannot expect to have his or her personal judgement put in the place of that of his or her colleagues. He or she cannot try to make the case that everyone else's judgment is flawed.

I assume that the consultant has based the view that the drug may help the hon. Gentleman's constituent on evidence. If it is strong enough to convince the consultant, it should also be strong enough—if the consultant puts the case—to convince the clinical governance committee. I therefore encourage the hon. Gentleman to speak to the consultant to ascertain whether new evidence, which the committee has not yet considered, has recently emerged, and to have another go at making the case. If the consultant can be convinced, so can the committee.

Politicians should not question the good faith of those who made the decision—that would be disingenuous to say the least—and claim that the decision must have been made on the ground of cost. The decision in the case that we are considering was not made on that ground, although I can understand why the hon. Gentleman is becoming angry with the trust's chief executive if he cannot even get information or responses to correspondence.

As I said earlier, I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's constituent but I cannot and will not intervene. I certainly would not want anyone to see the decision changed until safety issues are resolved. However, if the hon. Gentleman and his constituent are dissatisfied with the answers that they have received from the trust, Mr. Patrick can, of course, complain to Moorfields about his treatment.

New regulations—the National Health Service (Complaints) Regulations 2004—came into force on 30 July this year. Although those regulations do not require foundation trusts to have a local complaints procedure, they will more than likely have their own process for addressing patients' concerns. In any event, patients can complain to the Healthcare Commission and ultimately the health service ombudsman if they are unhappy with the treatment that they have received from a foundation trust. Mr. Patrick can also complain about the actions of the PCT if he wishes by first setting out his concerns to the PCT. If he remains unhappy, he can approach the Healthcare Commission and, ultimately, the health service ombudsman.

The hon. Gentleman said that he was satisfied with the efforts that the PCT had tried to make on his constituent's behalf and I am pleased to hear that. However, he is clearly far from satisfied with the efforts of Moorfields. I therefore strongly urge him to consider the complaints route and, if necessary, approach the Healthcare Commission. The chief executive reports to a board at the foundation trust. If the hon. Gentleman believes that the chief executive is not dealing with the issue appropriately, he might wish to approach members of the board and ask for the issue to be raised. The Healthcare Commission will make Monitor aware of all complaints that relate to foundation trusts. It will therefore be told of the matter if the hon. Gentleman pursues a complaint.

I hope that the matter reaches a satisfactory conclusion but I must stress again that it is for the NHS to resolve on the basis of evidence and expert clinical opinion. It is not a matter of money—it never was—and to suggest that that is the case is deeply unfair and, more important, will mislead Mr. Patrick and may indeed give him false hope.

Norman Baker: I accept that this is not a matter of money. I merely reported that my constituent was beginning to think that it might have been, given the apparent intransigence and the difficulty in securing an outcome.

Dr. Ladyman: It is fair of the hon. Gentleman to say that. Let me stress that, following the inquiries that I have made in preparing for this debate, I have received assurances that this is not a matter of funding but of evidence. It is a question of getting evidence about efficacy in regard to the condition that Mr. Patrick is suffering from and evidence on safety issues. If that evidence can be presented, the decision can be further reviewed.

I suggest that the hon. Gentleman and his constituent find out whether the consultant believes that all the latest evidence has been put to the governance committee so that it can reconsider the issue. I also suggest that they consider complaining about the matter to the Healthcare Commission, if the hon. Gentleman feels that that is the appropriate route to take, and to consider ensuring that members of the board of the foundation trust are aware of the issue and the way in which it has been handled, and of Mr. Patrick's dissatisfaction with the way in which it has been handled.

I will ensure that the official record of this debate is passed to the chief executives of the primary care trust and of the Moorfields trust. I will ask them to read it carefully and to consider whether they are acting on the latest evidence and whether they could, on reflection, find any way to help Mr. Patrick.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-six minutes past Six o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

The Secretary of State was asked—

Miners' Compensation

1. Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): What action she is taking to ensure fair payment of compensation to coal health claimants. [203414]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): In the past four years, as part of the largest health-compensation scheme in the world, the British Government have paid more than £1.1 billion to compensate more than 171,000 miners for injuries relating to vibration white finger, and more than £1.2 billion to more than 221,000 miners for injuries relating to respiratory diseases. We have paid a total of £2.3 billion to nearly 400,000 people, with individual payments of up to £130,000 for vibration white finger and £370,000 for respiratory disease. We have paid a total of more than £75 million in the most affected constituency.

Mr. Watts: When does my hon. Friend expect full payment to be made to private mine claimants?

Nigel Griffiths: The House will be pleased to note that we have made compensation payments to miners who spent all or part of their working lives in private mines. However, I regret that it took far longer than it should have done to persuade private mine owners to accept their liabilities and agree a formula for compensation for 2,600 miners who have submitted claims. I have asked for claims to be expedited so that payments can be made as quickly as possible.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): The Minister cannot stress strongly enough the fact that the hold-up in many cases is for miners who worked for British Coal and subsequently for private employers such as Cementation—there is a long list—when the pits closed. The net result is that miners worked for those companies for a few years. British Coal is prepared to settle as a result of the Government's intervention, but the private mine owners are holding out. My hon. Friend must lay it down strongly that they must pay their fair whack of the bill and get the matter settled.

Nigel Griffiths: I am certainly willing to do that—indeed, I have been doing that. Private mines use two excuses: first, they dispute the length of time people spent in the mines; and, secondly, it is suggested that the amount of dust to which they were exposed in the private mines might have been different and that, therefore, matters could not be proportioned for someone who had worked for former British Coal for 80 per cent. of the time and for a private mine for 20 per cent. of the time. We have said that that is nonsense and asked for the proportion to be worked out in relation to the amount of time spent in private mines. I understand that all the private mines have now agreed to that. Payments have already been made to some miners but, to my mind, that is not only four years too late but far too late. We will certainly convey a strong message to private mine owners.

Mr. Bill Tynan (Hamilton, South) (Lab): My hon. Friend knows that some of my constituents have received substantial sums from the fund. Does he know that more than 3,000 miners in the United Kingdom have received less than £200, whereas solicitors have received substantial funds for those cases? Will he confirm that there is an agreement on a minimum payment of £500 for every ex-miner who suffers from respiratory disease? If that is the case, when will the payments be made?

Nigel Griffiths: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for championing the case of miners who have received woefully inadequate payments. That has happened because compensation payments can be drastically reduced, for example, if a miner had a history of heavy smoking. I have been pressing for a minimum compensation payment of £500 to be funded out of the solicitor's fee, which is £2,300 per case. Solicitors have agreed that in principle and I urge them to implement that agreement in full without further delay. So far, we have paid solicitors more than £400 million for their services. I do not want any delays in making the minimum payments of £500.

Fraud

2. Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston) (Lab): What action the Government are taking to address intellectual property crime and the trade in counterfeit goods. [203415]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): On 10 August, we published details of a new national strategy for intellectual property crime to ensure that the Patent Office, the police and trading standards officers work together more effectively to tackle counterfeiting.

Ms Stuart: Will the Secretary of State acknowledge the tremendous contribution that the creative industries make to this country's prosperity and condemn those who illegally copy video games, other videos and DVDs? They not only undermine our future prosperity, but the funds that those illegal activities generate are often used for serious organised crime. Will my right hon. Friend therefore assure me that the Government will not only condemn people who do that but take action against them?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Britain is a world leader in the creative industries, and I completely condemn the counterfeiters who threaten jobs and profits in those industries. It is estimated that about a quarter of the counterfeiters are also involved in drug smuggling and money laundering. That is why we are strengthening our efforts here and working with other Governments internationally to try to catch the criminals behind the counterfeiting.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford) (Con): I share the Secretary of State's view that this form of fraud is significant and important. What would she say to businesses in my constituency and elsewhere about the fact that missing trader fraud—or carousel fraud, as it is also known—has increased significantly in recent years? What steps has she taken over the past six months to try to address that problem?

Ms Hewitt: As the hon. Gentleman says, this is a matter of real concern, and we have asked trading standards officers and the police to work more effectively together to deal with the problem.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the work that she is doing on intellectual property and counterfeiting matters, but will she acknowledge my disappointment at the apparent insufficient zeal that is being displayed by the Department of Trade and Industry in pursuing those UK companies, their associates and agents, who, it is alleged, have been involved in bribery and corruption, and who will now be subject to far less severe strictures than had been expected when the first announcement on this matter was made in the spring of this year?

Ms Hewitt: I am sorry that my hon. Friend is disappointed. In fact, the new bribery and corruption laws will provide us with some of the strongest anti-corruption laws in the world. I am sure that he agrees, however, that we should not impose unnecessary bureaucratic regulations on our exporters. We should work with them and demand only the information necessary to ensure that they comply with our bribery and anti-corruption laws, which is precisely what we and the Export Credits Guarantee Department are doing.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): Does the Secretary of State agree that, while the entry of China into the World Trade Organisation was a welcome move, China has serious deficiencies in its approach to the protection of intellectual property rights? What steps have the Government taken to help China through those deficiencies, and what success have they had?

Ms Hewitt: I completely agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of China's entry into the WTO. I have taken every opportunity—most recently, when I was in Beijing in October—to raise the issue of counterfeiting and piracy with the Chinese Government. They are aware of the problem, and I am glad to say that British companies operating in China are now beginning to see evidence of a more effective approach by the Chinese authorities. However, we will keep the pressure up, in order to protect the intellectual property of our companies.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): My right hon. Friend is quite right to say that people are moving out of the drug trade into counterfeiting. In Scotland, we have done a lot of work, particularly under the provisions of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, to get money back from the drug barons. Will she assure me that the Government will do their level best to ensure that the counterfeiters are also dealt with under those provisions, so that we can get the money back from people who are taking food out of the mouths of others, particularly those in the music industry? If things go on like this, it will have a detrimental effect on the music industry.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right. I have discussed this matter frequently, particularly with representatives of our music industry. We shall certainly ensure that the police do everything possible to use the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002 against these criminals, and the Serious Organised Crime Agency that we are establishing will also improve the way in which we deal with this kind of organised crime.

Fisheries

3. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What progress the Government have made with the introduction of safeguard measures to prevent the dumping of salmon from non-EU countries. [203416]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Nigel Griffiths): The European Commission imposed provisional safeguard measures in August to levy additional duty on imports above a certain level. With our strong ally in this cause, Ireland, we continue to press the case of Scottish salmon farmers.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that answer. Indeed, I commend the Department, and the Minister for Trade and Investment, the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Alexander), who I know has acted in this area, for their efforts to date. Unfortunately, however, aquaculture in my constituency remains an industry under the cosh, and safeguarding measures, important though they are, can help only in the short to medium term. In the long term, the industry needs a level playing field on which it can compete with countries such as Norway. That will involve the elimination of some of the extra regulatory burden and charges such as Crown Estate rents. Such charges do not have to be paid by the industry in Norway. What will the Minister do to progress that agenda?

Nigel Griffiths: The Department of Trade and Industry has been working closely with the Scottish Executive and colleagues there who make representations about the tremendous pressures on the industry. My right hon.

Friend the Secretary of State has written to each member state counterpart to press the case, and our co-sponsor, Ireland, is supportive as well. This issue will be subject in early January to a proposal from the European Commission, and it is hoped that a decision will be taken by the end of next month, with measures being introduced at the beginning of February.

The hon. Gentleman will know, as he takes a keen interest in this issue, that there is no certainty of support from other member states, but I have outlined just one of the steps that my right hon. Friend has taken. The Prime Minister has also made representations, as have other Ministers. We are acutely aware of the pressure that the industry is under, and will do what we can to alleviate that. The best way of supporting it, however, is to ensure that it is not subject to any sort of unfair competition.

Mr. Calum MacDonald (Western Isles) (Lab): May I, too, pass on the gratitude of the industry to the Minister, his colleagues and officials who have been fighting the case in Brussels? Is he aware of the latest figures from the Norwegian Directorate of Fisheries, which show that the Norwegian industry has been losing £100 million a year over the past three years? Is that not strong evidence of the existence of illegal and underhand subsidies being paid to that Norwegian industry?

Nigel Griffiths: Certainly, I know that my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade and Investment has discussed these issues directly with Norway. I am particularly grateful to him for briefing me on that issue earlier this week. We know of the concerns of my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. MacDonald), how hard he presses the interests of his constituents, and the meetings that he has had with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and others. We are aware of the issues and want to make sure that other member states, which seem more sympathetic to Norway and the practices that have come in for great criticism than to the problems facing his constituents and our colleagues in Ireland, address this issue. We believe that we have the firm support of the European Commission in this matter, and my right hon. Friends are making sure that they apply as much pressure as they can and advance the arguments with the 23 other member states, to make sure that we get a successful resolution early in the new year. We realise the threat that is posed to our industry.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): Will the Minister bear it in mind, before he goes down the traditional Labour-EU protectionist route—which militates against the interests of the British consumer and, in this case, those of a poorer country, too—that these safeguards would cause Norwegian salmon to be exported to third countries to the detriment of Chilean producers, who in many instances are considerably poorer, and who have a right to sell their salmon, too?

Nigel Griffiths: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman speaks for the House in relation to this matter, but let me touch on an issue that I have not covered: Chile. We are aware that it was excluded from the provisional measures because its imports were assessed as being less than 3 per cent. of the EU value. I do not see Norway as a poor country, and I do not believe that if there are unfair subsidies, anyone in the House would support them.

UK Competition Law

4. Mr. Parmjit Singh Gill (Leicester, South) (LD): What discussions she has had with retailers, publishers and wholesalers regarding changes to the Vertical Exemption (Exclusion) Order. [203417]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): Over the past 18 months, DTI Ministers and officials have had discussions with all parts of the newspaper and magazine industry about the proposal to remove the exemption of vertical agreements from prohibition under UK competition law.

Mr. Gill: I thank the Minister for his answer. He will be aware of the current deadlock in the industry and the impact that changes to the newspaper and magazine supply chain will have on the viability of small independent retailers. Given the vital role that small independent retailers and newsagents play in our communities, particularly the 254 small retailers and newsagents in Leicester that sell less than £300 worth of newspapers a week and are particularly at risk, will he assure the House that he will seek a resolution to the deadlock and provide legal certainty before 1 May 2005, when the competition law changes take effect?

Mr. Sutcliffe: As the hon. Gentleman will know, there has been a great deal of discussion about the vertical agreement. Indeed, as I studied it horizontally this morning I saw a clear need for both sides of the industry to consider the impact of last year's decision so that they would have time to think about how they should come together. DTI Ministers have met representatives of all sectors, including the National Federation of Retail Newsagents, and are well aware of the issues that concern them. The Office of Fair Trading is also talking to the industry, and we hope to make some announcements along the lines that the hon. Gentleman wants by early spring.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that small independent newsagents in every constituency in the country are being increasingly squeezed by the superstores? They have always had a problem with the wholesalers. We want those small newsagents to survive, because they are an important part of the community network throughout our constituencies.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I agree that it is vital to maintain the small newsagent network. Newsagents have been assiduous in expressing their views about their relationship with the wholesalers. The OFT's purpose in talking to both sides of the industry is to secure an agreement, and I hope that one can be reached.

Post Office

5. Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): If she will make a statement on the future of the Post Office. [203418]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The Government have invested more than £2 billion in the Royal Mail and the post office network since 1999. We have appointed a strong management team to the Royal Mail, which is successfully turning the business around. I am delighted to announce that I am reappointing the chair, Allan Leighton, for a further three years.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I am sure the Secretary of State realises that the post office network plays a vital part in keeping rural communities together. The closure of post offices such as the one in Watermoor in Cirencester, leaving the elderly and the vulnerable to walk an additional three quarters of a mile, is extremely unwelcome. What will the Government do to prevent further closures once funding ends in 2008?

May I make a positive suggestion? Should not all post offices be able to sell all Government services—passports and driving licences, for instance? That would enable them to remain more viable than they would be otherwise.

Ms Hewitt: I know that the hon. Gentleman is extremely concerned about the impact of the Watermoor closure. Both Postwatch and the Post Office thought about it very carefully. I understand that most customers are already choosing to shop in Cirencester, and there are direct bus services from Watermoor to the main branch in the town centre. [Interruption.] There are bus services to the centre. As for rural services, we have indeed extended funding until 2008. I know that the Post Office is making enormous efforts to find an alternative to the branch that is currently in Tesco in Wootton-under-Edge, which is also in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. I am sure he will regret the fact that Conservative public spending cuts would mean less money for the post office network in future, not more.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I welcome the reappointment of Allan Leighton as chairman of the Post Office, but does my right hon. Friend share my concern about the way in which the consultation process works? She and I, along with the late Jim Marshall, wrote many letters to try to prevent the closure of post offices in our Leicester constituencies, but our representations were rejected. Petitions were presented, but Post Office officials refused to meet Members of Parliament before the deadline. It looks as though decisions are made and the consultation process is a farce. When she welcomes Mr. Leighton to his reappointment and invites him for a cup of tea and a mince pie at the Department, will my right hon. Friend ask him to have another look at a process that leaves everyone frustrated?

Ms Hewitt: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, but in fact, we took steps last January, after considerable concern had been expressed in the House, to strengthen the consultation process and sort out the problems that had arisen. I simply do not accept his assertion that that process is a sham; indeed, as a result of it, 400 Post Office proposals were either withdrawn or changed. In the case of Leicester, I am glad to say that, as a result of the representations made by my hon. Friend and I and the late Jim Marshall, two post offices that had been slated for closure—in Clarendon park and Abbey lane—have been reprieved.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): The Secretary of State may be aware that yesterday I was in her constituency—I did her the courtesy of informing her in writing—and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Gill), looking at the installation of Community Point in post offices, which have sadly been let down by the failure to follow up the Your Guide experiment. Does she accept that this initiative by the National Federation of SubPostmasters might offer the way forward, the ultimate objective being that at least 5,000 of these Community Point units be installed throughout the country? Will she undertake to ensure, through the office of the e-envoy, that Departments across government use this service, which can print out up-to-date Government forms and eliminate the risk of stocking out-of-date ones? It could ensure that all post offices are used as a Government information network, to the benefit of their own business and of the public. Will she ensure that this experiment actually delivers the results that Your Guide did not?

Ms Hewitt: As I think the hon. Gentleman is aware, the very good Your Guide experiment, in which we invested nearly £25 million, simply did not deliver the increase in customers that the sub-post offices were looking for. However, the investment that we have made has proved enormously successful, in that 21 million bank account customers are now able to do their banking at post offices, thus hugely increasing the Post Office's potential customer base. I certainly hope that the current Post Office experiment in e-government connections will prove successful, and I shall discuss this issue with the Minister for the Cabinet Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ruth Kelly), and with the Post Office, directly.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): While I welcome the changes that were made last January, there is still huge concern about the urban reinvention programme consultation process. Decisions are being made, and consultation is then taking place upon their implementation. Although such changes happen in only a minority of cases—including in my own constituency—this process falls a long way short of the assurances that the Post Office gave to the Trade and Industry Committee last year, which Ministers subsequently gave to me. Communities should have a say in the planning of their local post offices' facilities, but that is simply not happening.

Ms Hewitt: I understand my hon. Friend's concern, but the Post Office has more branches than the whole of the banking and building society systems put together, and because there are simply too many branches for the number of customers, it is just not possible for our sub-postmasters and sub-postmistresses to make a living. In order to get proper community involvement in these decisions, we changed the consultation process so that decisions are made on an area basis, instead of one by one. I am afraid, however, that even with the very substantial support that we are providing for post offices, it is up to Post Office Ltd.—the management—to decide which branches will be viable in future, and to ensure that 95 per cent. of its customers, and if possible more, are within a mile of a post office branch. That is the way to get a strong post office network that can deliver for customers and go on playing a strong role within communities.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): Is the Secretary of State aware of the continuing concern of many pensioners about the new system for paying pensions at post offices? The blurb says that they are not supposed to give their PIN to anybody, but what about those pensioners who rely on a neighbour to collect their pension because they are house-bound? Giving their PIN away exposes them to a considerably greater risk than simply asking someone to pick up their pension, but what are they supposed to do, particularly if they do not have a neighbour who is a close friend?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. I am glad to say that recent Department for Work and Pensions customer research shows that the vast majority of customers are happy about opening a Post Office card account and using the associated card. Of course, the system was designed to take account of the point that he makes, so that an elderly person who cannot collect the benefit at the post office can make an arrangement for a trusted person to do so on their behalf. I will check the precise point, but my understanding is that, in those circumstances, another person can be given their own PIN in order to get the cash payment. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman with further details on that point.

Marine Renewable Energy

7. Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): What support her Department is giving to the marine renewable energy sector. [203420]

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): We have announced a £50 million marine renewables deployment fund that will provide continued support to wave and tidal stream technologies. That builds on the £15 million of research and development support granted to the sector since 1999.

Mr. Challen: Does my hon. Friend agree that Britain has the skills, the ability and the resources to become a world leader in wave and tidal energy technologies? The opportunity must not be frittered away as previous Governments frittered away our opportunities with wind power. In that context, will the Minister do everything he can to speed up the delivery of the £50 million? I understand that there is some disappointment in the industry that the funding is subject to further consultation, which does not end until next August.

Mr. O'Brien: I certainly agree with my hon. Friend that this country has the skills and resources necessary to become a world leader in the area of wave and tidal technology. I plan to put forward a consultation paper in January, but the consultation will be short, lasting only about four weeks. We hope to make an announcement at Easter and to start to deploy the funds shortly afterwards. I do not know where my hon. Friend got the month of August from, but it is wrong, as we plan to deploy the money well before then.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): The Minister will be aware that one of the greatest supports that could be given to marine renewable energy would be to have transmission charges that encouraged rather than undermined renewables in the north of Scotland. He will also be aware that last week Ofgem delayed a decision on transmission charges, saying that further work needed to be done. Obviously, without knowing the level of transmission charges, it is very difficult for renewable operators to plan ahead. Will the Minister give us some idea of the time scale for taking a decision on those charges?

Mr. O'Brien: We have had discussions with Ofgem about its view on the transmission charges regime and it assures me that it still hopes to be able to hit the original target date of April for putting the better system of transmission charging in place. We hope that the transmission charging system will operate effectively. There has been some further delay and further consultation on the part of Ofgem in relation to determining the right mechanism for charging. As I said, though, Ofgem assures us that it still expects to hit the delivery date of April.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): One of the challenges of offshore power generation is indeed the cost of transmission charges to the mainland grid. I wonder whether any joint talks have taken place between those planning offshore wind generation and those planning offshore wave and tidal generation? It would seem to me to be common sense to use common transmission networks.

Mr. O'Brien: Since the Energy Act 2004, which came into force in July this year, there have been considerable consultations between both offshore and onshore organisations and companies, and Ofgem. A report is expected to be published shortly on how best to make progress on the issue of transmission. It is important to get it right, so it is important to conduct the consultation in a way that takes account of the needs of both offshore and onshore wind transmission.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): In a genuine and constructive effort to help the Government avoid being just all talk and to accelerate the realisation of a UK marine renewable energy source, will the Minister agree to meet me and my constituent, Mr. Alex Southcombe, who has invented WaveMaster—an outstanding innovation currently being successfully trialled? On the basis of my research, it provides one of the best early prospects of commercially enhancing this important marine renewable.

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I am happy to meet the hon. Gentleman and his constituent.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: I am delighted to hear that and look forward to doing it quickly.

Does the Minister therefore concede that banking everything on wind turbines, especially on land, which attract such understandable hostility because of their effect on local communities and amenity, is heading Britain in the wrong direction? Does he agree that the development of the widest mix of renewable technologies is now, more than ever, a matter of urgency, given the reality of climate change and the Prime Minister's humiliating admission yesterday that his Labour Government are projected to fail to deliver on their manifesto pledge to cut greenhouse gas emissions by 20 per cent. by 2010?

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I am just trying to remember quite where the Tories were on funding wave power or renewables. Their funding was pretty well non-existent. The Government are on course to overshoot our Kyoto target of 12.5 per cent. of the basket of greenhouse gases. We are on target to achieve 14 per cent. We have additionally set ourselves a higher target of getting to 20 per cent. by 2010, and we have always said that it would be tough to hit that target, but we have six years to go. We cannot insulate the UK from the impact of climate change, which affects the whole northern hemisphere, but we are putting a range of funding into the renewables exercise and certainly are not committed to just one funding package. There is £500 million for low-carbon technology—including £50 million for marine technology—as well as £66 million for biomass energy, £31 million for solar photovoltaics and £170 million for offshore—not onshore—wind farms. We are also funding research into the hydrogen economy. What the Tories completely failed to do, we are delivering on.

Renewable Energy

8. Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): What steps she is taking to ensure that wind energy makes a full contribution to her renewable energy targets. [203421]

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): We aim to generate 10 per cent. of electricity from renewables by 2010. The renewables obligation, together with the climate change levy, will create £1 billion per annum in financial support for renewables by 2010, including £117 million in capital costs for offshore wind farms, £10 million of which will be for Scroby sands, off the coast of my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Blizzard: If we are to stand any chance of meeting our renewables target, is it not vital that wind energy developments that are commercially available now proceed as quickly as possible? We have gone offshore because of the slow pace of onshore wind farm development, but is not there a risk that offshore developments could be obstructed by unreasonable objections? For example, although there is no evidence that wind farms adversely affect birds, some environmental organisations are gearing up to take a strong line. Will my hon. Friend ensure that unreasonable objections do not obstruct the development of offshore wind farms? Do we not all have to learn to co-exist if we are to reduce CO_2 emissions and tackle global warming?

Mr. O'Brien: My hon. Friend is right to say that we all have a vested interest in ensuring that we tackle the problems caused by climate change. It is also important that discussion of wind farms be based on facts rather than myth. The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has advanced some concerns and we are studying them so that we can obtain a factual basis and people can be sure that they make decisions on wind farms on the basis of the reality rather than fears and concerns.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): There is plenty of evidence, not just from this country but from California, that wind turbines are the cause of death of many birds. Would not it be better if the Government concentrated on redoubling their efforts on energy conservation? A small increase in energy conservation would far outweigh the huge subsidies paid for the useless and inefficient wind turbines littered throughout the country.

Mr. O'Brien: My great concern is that the Conservatives are getting themselves into a position in which they are running down the whole concept of wind turbines, which are the only feasible way in which we can hit the 2010 target of achieving 10 per cent. of electricity from renewables. The Conservatives are creating a massive credibility gap for themselves. By offering a local veto on planning decisions, they are not recognising that there is a national as well as a local interest. In effect, they are offering little or no response to climate change issues, which is bad not only for the Conservative party but for serious political debate on climate change in this country.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that the best places for renewable energy sites would be existing generation locations, especially nuclear and former nuclear power stations on the coast? Will he look carefully at licensing arrangements with the new Nuclear Decommissioning Authority so that we can loosen restrictions to ensure that wind and other renewables can be tied into those stations?

Mr. O'Brien: We have just issued new planning guidance, which sets out a long-range strategy for dealing with applications for renewables, not just for wind technology but for a series of other renewables, and will enable various opportunities to be realised and deal with various concerns. Our objective is to encourage growth in renewables and my hon. Friend's point about identifying the areas where renewables would be most appropriate is a good one.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): As the hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Dr. Iddon) said, one problem with wind farms is the high cost of their connection to the grid; another is that they can connect to the grid only through overhead transmission lines, which are costly, environmentally unfriendly and lose an enormous amount of electricity. How does that square with the Minister's renewable energy policy?

Mr. O'Brien: The creation of a new transmission infrastructure is a key issue on which Ofgem is consulting. Following the enactment of the Energy Act 2004 in July, Ofgem started a wide consultation on how we can ensure that we have the right transmission systems for both onshore and offshore wind generation. The same applies for renewables in the broader case, where we are building up micro-generation and considering how even homes can feed back into the grid the extra energy that they might create.

Mr. Kevin Hughes (Doncaster, North) (Lab): Although I agree that we need to develop renewable energy sources, does my hon. Friend agree that, where there is a cluster of applications such as those that completely surround the site of special scientific interest at Thorne Moors in my constituency, they should be looked at as a whole and not on a site-by-site basis?

Mr. O'Brien: At present, the planning rules require that various applications be considered on their individual merits. We are looking at how we can ensure that cumulative applications, where a series of applications is in situ, can be considered in terms of their overall impact on an area. In some situations, that can be done with one inquiry, while in others there will be individual inquiries for different applications, but it should still be possible to consider the cumulative effect of all the applications in those individual inquiries.

Inward Investment (South Yorkshire)

9. Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): What steps she is taking to improve inward investment in South Yorkshire. [203422]

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): UK Trade and Investment promotes the UK as the top inward investment location in Europe and works in partnership with all the UK's development agencies to attract the maximum inward investment. UK Trade and Investment is expanding its inward investment operation and will make further resources available to Yorkshire Forward, which is the inward investment promotion agency for Yorkshire and Humber.

Ms Munn: I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that South Yorkshire is a great place to live and work but that it has also been one of the poorest regions of the European Union and receives objective 1 funding. As the future of regional funding is still unclear, can she give me an assurance that the Government will make getting investment into Britain's poorer regions a high priority, ahead of other regions?

Jacqui Smith: I agree with my hon. Friend about the attractions of South Yorkshire. I can assure her that the three quarters of regional funding that comes domestically from the Government have made an important difference in South Yorkshire. Over the past year, the regional development agency alone helped to create 16,500 jobs and 730 new businesses, and brought in £275 million of private sector investment. Of course, all that activity is under threat from cuts proposed by both Opposition parties.

Africa

11. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What policies she intends to pursue during the UK presidency of the European Union in relation to trade with Africa. [203425]

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Ms Patricia Hewitt): During our presidency of the EU, we will seek to make significant progress on the Doha development round, including a successful conclusion to the World Trade Organisation ministerial meeting in Hong Kong in the autumn. A successful development round would deliver enormous benefits to Africa and other developing countries.

Hugh Bayley: The "Everything but Arms" agreement offers the potential for greatly increased exports from the poorest countries in Africa to Europe, but that potential, sadly, has not been realised in a large increase in the volume of exports. What proposals will my right hon. Friend take to her colleague Trade Ministers in the EU for changes of policy to use that agreement in a way that substantially increases the export opportunities for the poorest countries in Africa, which, in turn, of course, would increase the opportunities for us to export goods to them?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point, and the most practical change that we can make is to alter the rules of origin, which restrict the capacity of the least developed countries to take advantage of preferential access. In the longer term, of course, we must deal with the problem of tariff escalation on value-added goods to enable African countries, in particular, to produce not only primary produce, but industrial goods as well.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): The common agricultural policy is inefficient, costly and extremely damaging to the export potential of developing countries, particularly those in Africa, which all hon. Members would seek to help and assist. What positive, aggressive action will the Government take to amend the CAP to achieve what the world wants: a fair deal for the poorest countries of the world with agricultural industries?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman is right and he will be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs played a key role last year in negotiating new, radical reforms to the CAP. I am delighted to say that, since then, the EU has signed up to an end date for the export subsidies on agricultural products that are devastating to developing country farmers. We still have more to do and we continue to press hard for a substantial reform of the sugar regime. Again, that is vital in Africa. We are helping to lead the way on all that in Europe and will continue to do so to help to make poverty history.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, Maryhill) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may have had the opportunity to read early-day motion 333 on the proposed economic partnership agreements between the EU and African countries. They are bilateral agreements that seek large-scale liberalisation of African trade, but they fail to discuss the terms of the CAP. Does she share my concerns that such agreements could undermine the benefits of the multilateral negotiations that are offered at the WTO and that they fail to address the development needs of African countries, which are badly hindered by the CAP?

Ms Hewitt: Our current system of European trade preferences with countries in Africa, the Caribbean and the Pacific is simply not compatible with WTO rules. That system must be replaced by 2008. We are negotiating economic partnership agreements with those countries, so that they can continue to gain as much access to European markets as possible, but we are absolutely clear that the agreements must be negotiated in a way that enables the development needs of those countries to be met. I am glad to say that we have already given some €20 million to those countries to help them to negotiate agreements that will be good for their people.

Energy Markets (Western Europe)

12. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): What discussions she has had with her European Union counterparts on progress in liberalising energy markets in western Europe. [203426]

The Minister for Energy and E-Commerce (Mr. Mike O'Brien): Ministers have frequently discussed the development of the EU's internal energy market with other member states. I recently met the new Commissioner for Energy, Mr. Andris Piebalgs, and raised the issue of the EU gas market, in particular, with him a few days ago. We are looking for further steps by the Commission, in particular, to ensure compliance with the 2003 gas and electricity directives.

Dr. Cable: Does the Minister agree that one reason why British manufacturers, in particular the engineering industry, suffer high energy costs is that they cannot get access to low-cost competitive gas supplies because of the monopoly exercised over the German and Dutch pipeline and the lack of common carriage? What concrete legal action can he take to ensure that the principles of the directive, the single market and the European competition rules are enforced?

Mr. O'Brien: We need to ensure that there is broader liberalisation of the market for energy in the European Union. We have ensured that the Commission is aware of our wish to see that liberalisation proceed apace. The aims of the 2003 directive, which are binding on other member states, require a legal unbundling of network activities from supply, the establishment of a regulator, the publication of network tariffs, the reinforcement of public service obligations and the introduction of monitoring of security of supply. In dealing with some of the problems that the hon. Gentleman identified, especially with regard to Germany, we are engaging not only with the Commission, but with other member states directly to ensure that we move forward with that liberalisation.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): Is not the biggest problem with the market in Europe the fact that the consolidation of companies took place ahead of liberalisation—exactly the opposite of what happened in this country? That makes it difficult for consumers on the continent to switch suppliers and, indeed, difficult for companies in this country to compete on the continent in the way that the continental companies compete in the UK. What can the Minister do about that?

Mr. O'Brien: I agree that the problem arose because the European market developed differently from the UK market. However, directives place obligations on European member states. We have made it clear to the European Commission that, for gas in particular, which is more of a problem than electricity, we want it to apply those directives. The directives were passed, they were broadly accepted and now they have to be applied.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

The Minister for Women was asked—

Pension Gap

20. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What recent discussions she has had with the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions regarding the pension gap for women. [203435]

The Minister for Women and Equality (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I regularly meet my right hon. Friend to discuss a range of issues, including women's pensions. Today's women pensioners, of course, benefit substantially from the pension credit, winter fuel payments and so on. The state second pension and the home responsibilities credit are helping women in particular to build better pensions for the future.

Mr. Carmichael: I thank the Minister for that answer, which highlights the complexity of the situation that faces women pensioners and, indeed, all pensioners. She will be aware that the average state pension for women is £51 a week. As a result, some 63 per cent. of women pensioners rely on means-tested benefits. She may also be aware that the National Association of Pension Funds reported this week that a citizen's pension based on residency would be

"do-able, affordable and achievable within six years".

Will she join the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions in veering towards the implementation of that idea?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman is right that most women who have retired do not get the full basic pension. There is no doubt that, for future generations of pensioners, and of women in particular, the citizen's pension would deal with that problem. That is why I welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend is looking at the option of a citizen's pension. We will do so, of course, in the context of the final report of the review group led by Adair Turner.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Does not the fact that, for all sorts of reasons that are not of their own making, so many women get to pensionable age without achieving a full set of stamps prove that, if we followed the advice of some other political parties to put all our money into the basic state pension, we would do nothing to tackle the pensioner poverty that many women face? Will it be a major aim of a third term for a Labour Government to ensure that we abolish pensioner poverty for women?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right. We have already done an enormous amount—I see it every day in my constituency—to tackle the shocking problem of pensioner poverty that we inherited. If we had simply linked the basic pension to average earnings, we would have given the poorest pensioners far less help than we have given them through the guaranteed minimum pension and now the pension credit. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions for their enormous effort and the success that they have had in reducing poverty among the current generation of pensioners.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest) (Con): How can the Minister come to the Chamber and praise the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what he has done on pensions when, in fact, every year since assuming office he has taken £5 billion or more from pension funds? In 1997, Britain had more money in funded pension funds than the rest of the European Union put together, but now we are in a worse position than most other comparable countries entirely as a result of the actions of this Government and the Chancellor. Of course, it is women, whose pension funds tend to be the smallest, who have suffered most. After seven years in government, for the Minister to stand there and say that as far as the basic state pension—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was wondering when the hon. Lady was going to stop.

Ms Hewitt: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I regret that the hon. Lady, for whom I have a great deal of respect, was not willing to give us credit for what we have done for women who have already retired. They have benefited hugely from the pension credit, the winter fuel payment and all the help, including free television licences and so on, that we are making available both to people who have retired and to future generations of pensioners. I hope that she supports, as I do, the home responsibilities credit and the state second pension, which make an enormous difference to women who are now in work, and the Pension Protection Fund to protect people who have contributed to their occupational pension but whose firms have simply walked away. I think that she should give credit where it is due.

Sandra Gidley (Romsey) (LD): I am pleased that the Minister has an open mind about the citizen's pension, but does she acknowledge that many women receive lower pensions because they are carers? The nature of caring means that many of them are part-time carers who also hold down a part-time job. They do not pay contributions, so has she considered introducing a carer's credit to help them to have a pension in their own right in the shorter term?

Ms Hewitt: The home responsibilities credit, both for the basic pension and the state second pension, is already helping some women with caring responsibilities. I agree that more needs to be done to support carers and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions is looking at that.

Engineering

21. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What steps she is taking to encourage women to graduate in engineering; and if she will make a statement. [203436]

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): The UK Resource Centre for Women in Science, Engineering and Technology was launched in September to tackle the barriers that hinder female participation in these sectors throughout the career lifecycle. In particular, it will support higher education institutions to aid the retention and progression of female undergraduates on science, engineering and technology courses and into the labour force.

Michael Fabricant: I am grateful to the Minister. In fact, I have a brochure produced by the resource centre, so we are thinking alike. I do not know whether she saw the Richard Dimbleby lecture last night—I had the privilege of attending it—which was presented by James Dyson, who promoted engineering in this country. Is she aware that, in China, 60 per cent. of graduates are in science, engineering and technology but that the figure is only 35 per cent. in this country? Of that 35 per cent., only 5.3 per cent. are women, so we have a long way to go. What steps will she take to ensure that 50 per cent. of engineering students are women?

Jacqui Smith: There has been progress in the past 10 years. The increase in the number of female science, engineering and technology graduates has been larger than the increase in the number of their male counterparts. However, we still have a long way to go, which is why the resource centre was set up. It will also find ways, as the hon. Gentleman rightly said, to overcome misapprehensions about engineering, which is no longer about grubby, heavy industrial workplaces but at the cutting edge of our economic success. The manufacturing forum, for example, which met for the first time last week, brings together representatives from business, trade unions and so on. One of its key priorities is improving the image of manufacturing, particularly so that we can attract the many skilled and talented women engineers, both for their own good and for the success of UK manufacturing and engineering.

Public Companies

22. Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): What steps she is taking to encourage increased representation of women on the boards of public companies. [203437]

The Deputy Minister for Women and Equality (Jacqui Smith): On Tuesday, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry launched the DTI's new booklet, "Building Better Boards", to coincide with the publication of the new female FTSE figures, which show that 17 per cent. of all new directorships went to women in 2004. Those figures are better, but they are not good enough, which is why the booklet and advice issued by the DTI spells out the business case for diversity and the different ways in which companies can develop and recruit a much wider range of talent.

Valerie Davey: I congratulate my right hon. Friend and the DTI on that booklet and on their work to ensure that board members in companies are drawn from the widest calibre of candidates. Can she do anything further for the 31 companies in the FTSE 100 that still have no women on the board?

Jacqui Smith: First, like my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on Tuesday, we can communicate the business advantages: for example, businesses with women on the board experience an increased return to equity. Secondly, we can make sure that talented people who have gained board experience in the voluntary sector are better enabled to get on to boards in the private sector, which is something that we are working on alongside the Cass business school. Thirdly, we can set an example in government by the way in which we use the head-hunter contract. We expect that contract to bring the widest range of people on to public sector boards, which should impact on good practice in the private sector.

Business of the House

12.32 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 13 DECEMBER—Opposition day [1st allotted day]. There will be a debate entitled "The Government's Failure to Improve School Discipline" followed by a debate entitled "Family Justice". Both debates arise on an Opposition motion, followed by proceedings on the Consolidated Fund Bill.

TUESDAY 14 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the Mental Capacity Bill.

WEDNESDAY 15 DECEMBER—A debate on "European Affairs" on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

THURSDAY 16 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the School Transport Bill.

FRIDAY 17 DECEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 20 DECEMBER—Second Reading of the Identity Cards Bill.

TUESDAY 21 DECEMBER—Motion on the Christmas recess Adjournment.

I should like to inform the House that the business in Westminster Hall for January will be:

THURSDAY 13 JANUARY—A debate on the reports from the Environmental Audit Committee on environmental crime and the courts and environmental crime: fly-tipping, fly posting, litter, graffiti and noise.

THURSDAY 20 JANUARY—A debate on the report from the Work and Pensions Committee on the work of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive.

THURSDAY 27 JANUARY—A debate on fire safety.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for the business. Will he join me in expressing the House's condolences upon the death of security officer Mark Peters following a road traffic incident yesterday? Mr. Peters had worked here for almost seven years and had given very good service. Our thoughts are with Mrs. Peters, their two children and their whole family.

Will the Leader of the House join me in congratulating the other place on the improvements now being made to the Constitutional Reform Bill, particularly the saving of the Lord Chancellor, who will remain a lawyer and who will sit in the other place for many years to come? Will he confirm that when the Bill reaches us, the Committee stage will be taken on the Floor of the House, as is usual with constitutional measures?

Is the Leader of the House able to report on any progress on my request for a full foreign affairs debate so that we can discuss the situation in Africa and the middle east?

May we have a statement on the new contract for NHS dentists? On Tuesday this week, the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), having previously claimed that "dentistry's sorted", said that the reforms were "proceeding on time", and went on to claim that

> "dentists recognise that we are moving in the right direction . . . and . . . we will be able to implement the new contract by October."—[Official Report, 7 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1027–1029.]

Today we hear that the British Dental Association has withdrawn from discussions because the new contract will mean that dentists are not able to spend enough time with each patient. The Leader of the House is always saying that we are safer with Labour—not our teeth, though. May we have that debate?
